I'd like to say I knew in law school that Barack would be a presidential candidate. But I didn't. Like many of my colleagues, I knew he was different -- more mature, intellectually rigorous, politically adept and capable of demonstrating real leadership -- than your average law student.

And we all had our suspicions that he would do something interesting in politics, but few if any of us had the foresight to predict that he would become the sort of national figure he is today.

Fast-forward to August 2004, sitting in one of the last rows, near the ceiling, of the Fleet Center in Boston, in the moments leading up to Barack's speech to the Democratic National Convention. The crowd was electric. We were surrounded by dozens of young volunteers, frantically waving Obama placards. He hadn't said a word yet, but the anticipation was palpable. By the time he was done, the crowd had exploded. My wife and I looked at each other, frankly amazed. This was the guy we ate doughnuts with at midnight?

And yet, in retrospect, one could see the seeds of his strengths today in his days at the Law Review: his ability to lead, to guide a group of politically diverse -- and divisive -- people toward a common goal, to wrestle intellectually with some of the most difficult and complex problems of the day, understand different perspectives and take a position based on principle but made all the more sound by his appreciation of alternative points of view.

I feel about Barack the way I do about my sons. He worked with us on Mayor Harold Washington's election, and on important issues such as job-training programs and getting asbestos out of the projects.

No matter what Barack did, he was thorough. When he brought plans to us, they were all laid out. He told us who we were supposed to see and who we were supposed to talk to. We had no expertise. We were just basically housewives and ministers. But when we had town hall meetings, Barack always stayed in the background. He would say: "It's not my community, you're the ones who have to be out there. The first thing people will say if they see me is, 'Who is he?' I have to empower you so that you will be able to express yourself well."

He kept us so energized. When we found a cause, he never said, "Well, you can't do that." He said, "I'll look into it, I'll bring you all the material you need." He has a way of making you want to follow him, and failing is not a part of anything you feel. Because if he said it was going to work, it was going to work.

It wasn't like he was bossing us around, though. If anything, we bossed him around. He was in Chicago without a family, so we made sure that he would eat right. He usually stuck to just sandwiches. We would go out to dinner with him sometimes and we would ask him, "Have you eaten today?" and he would laugh and say, "Yes, I did, I had breakfast."

He talked to everybody. He was right in the middle of us. The older people love a respectful young man, and he certainly was that. We hated to see him go. When he came to us and told us that he had decided to go to Harvard, it was very sad, but we knew he wanted to go.

Now when I look at him with his family, and I see him with those little girls, I think it's just fantastic. That's something I didn't know whether I'd live long enough to see, because when I first knew him he was just so into his work. We always had an idea that he was going into politics. One of the women in the organization said, "Well, when you make it to Washington. . . . " And he just started laughing and said, "Yes, of course you'll be at my inauguration."

The month after the 2004 Democratic convention, the Obamas visited my family in Martha's Vineyard for a much-needed vacation. Barack is an avid jogger, and one morning he went out for a run by himself in our secluded neighborhood. When he returned to the house an hour later, Michelle, our children and I were eating breakfast. As he entered the kitchen he had a look of complete disbelief on his face. "You aren't going to believe what happened to me," he said. "A guy took my picture as I jogged by!" He was completely mystified that somebody would be interested in a picture of him. Michelle just rolled her eyes and the girls ignored him completely. So now people take his picture all the time and he is still often surprised by the attention. As for the recent paparazzi shots of him on a beach, I called him the day I saw them and said teasingly, "I've seen you in a swimsuit and I don't remember you looking so buff." He was absolutely mortified.

I was in my office in the church and he just walked up to the door. My church sits in the neighborhood, way off the main thoroughfare, so you had to be coming here to get here. And Barack just walked up and rang the bell. He said he was going through the neighborhood trying to talk to pastors about community organizing. My first impression was: Who is this skinny guy and what is he selling? But he wasn't selling anything. He just asked me what was important to me. I was really impressed with the fact that he spent more time listening to me and trying to hear what I thought was important in the neighborhood, rather than my experience of people coming in and telling me what I ought to do. He was more concerned about listening and hearing my ideas and asking: How can we get this done together?

The biggest lasting thing that Barack brought to this neighborhood is that he got a bunch of African American Protestant pastors to sit down at a table with white Catholic priests to say all of us are in the community, let's find a way to work together and get it done.

Australian Leader: Al-Qaeda Wants Obama (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia (AP) — Australia's conservative prime minister slammed Barack Obama on Sunday over his opposition to the Iraq war, a day after the first-term U.S. senator announced his intention to run for the White House in 2008.

Obama said Saturday at his campaign kickoff in Springfield, Ill., that one of the country's first priorities should be ending the war in Iraq. He has also introduced a bill in the Senate to prevent President Bush from increasing American troop levels in Iraq and to remove U.S. combat forces from the country by March 31, 2008.

Australian Prime Minister John Howard, a staunch Bush ally who has sent troops to Iraq and faces his own re-election bid later this year, said Obama's proposals would spell disaster for the Middle East.

"I think that will just encourage those who want to completely destabilize and destroy Iraq, and create chaos and a victory for the terrorists to hang on and hope for an Obama victory," Howard said on Nine Network television.

"If I were running al-Qaeda in Iraq, I would put a circle around March 2008 and be praying as many times as possible for a victory, not only for Obama but also for the Democrats."

Howard has defied widespread domestic opposition to the war, keeping about 1,400 Australian troops in and around Iraq, mostly in non-combat roles. He is seeking a fifth term later this year, and recent polls suggest voters are increasingly unhappy about his refusal to set a deadline for withdrawing Australian troops from the Middle East.

"You either rat on the ally or you stay with the ally," he said. "If it's all right for us to go, it's all right for the Americans and the British to go, and if everybody goes, Iraq will descend into total civil war and there'll be a lot of bloodshed."

Decoding The Debate Over The Blackness Of Barack Obama (NYT)

By Brent Staples

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Those of us who were born black in the years just after World War II had front-row seats for the collapse of American apartheid. We started out confined to all-black communities and schools at a time when skin color was still destiny. But as segregation gave way, many of us were vaulted out of this sequestered world and into colleges, jobs and walks of life that had been closed to us pretty much since the nation's founding.

The rush of upward mobility produced the inevitable identity crisis, which led in turn to endless discussions about the meaning of blackness in a world where skin color was beginning to matter less and less.

At their best, these discussions, held in college dorm rooms at night, were probing, serious and heartfelt. At their worst, they turned into lectures by the race police — '60s-era ideologues who characterized blackness not as a matter of individual interpretation or choice, but as a narrow set of attitudes and experiences that were said to make up the authentic black identity.

Back then, black Americans who came from successful, suburban and upwardly mobile families were regularly dismissed as white or inauthentic. The authentic black experience, it was said at the time, was limited to the hard-core, impoverished upbringing that black people often chose to brag about, even when they had actually grown up with private prep schools in the lap of luxury.

The race police ran rampant in the black community itself, but were rarely heard in the white world. But they have been parading up and down Main Street since Senator Barack Obama of Illinois — the son of a black African father and a white American mother — made clear that he intended to seek the Democratic presidential nomination.

The arguments being raised about Mr. Obama's blackness — or his lack of blackness — seem positively antique at a time when Americans are moving away from the view of ancestry as a central demographic fact and toward a view that dispenses with those traditional boundaries. Even so, the complaints about Mr. Obama provide an interesting opportunity to examine the passing of the old and the rise of the new.

The claim that the candidate isn't really black because his mother is white carries little weight under either system. It makes no sense at all to the young Americans who checked more than one box when identifying themselves by race in the last census. They subscribe to a fluid notion of race and seem perfectly willing to let people describe themselves racially any way they choose.

Nor does the charge make sense in the black community itself. That community has historically and eagerly embraced as black anyone and everyone with any African ancestry to speak of. That embrace often included interracial families, who lived in black communities long before they were accepted elsewhere. It included even blue-eyed, sandy-haired people like the civil rights leader Walter White, whose black ancestry was imperceptible to the naked eye.

The carpetbagging black Republican Alan Keyes opened up this racialist can of worms when he opposed Mr. Obama in the Illinois Senate race back in 2004. Badly outmatched and reaching for any brick he could find, Mr. Keyes blurted out that Mr. Obama was not black because he was not descended from slaves. The Daily News columnist Stanley Crouch later seemed to second that view, saying that Mr. Obama had not "lived the life of a black American."

The heritage of slavery is of course central to African-American life. But that is a fairly recent recognition for many of us who grew up black in the second half of the 20th century. Black families like mine dealt with the stigma and humiliation of slavery by simply suppressing it. My older uncles, for example, grew up in regular contact with relatives who had been born into slavery, but never mentioned it to me. Silence about slavery at home was matched by neglect of the topic at school. As a result, I was nearly 40 years old and writing a book about my family when I stumbled upon the news of my enslaved relatives in a newsletter from a small historical society.

The claim that Mr. Obama has not lived the typical African-American life is closer to the nub of what bothers his black traditionalist critics. Their complaint goes right back to the race police of the 1960s who decreed that the only authentic black experience was one that featured hardship and crushing encounters with racism, preferably with an urban American backdrop.

Mr. Obama missed out on that part while growing up an introspective child, longing for his missing father, in Hawaii and Indonesia. He stumbled onto the mysteries of race in his own good time and pursued them in his own way. His quest took him to an impoverished community on the South Side of Chicago, where he worked as an organizer in an infamous public housing project before discovering his vocation as a politician.

His critics are at least right when they describe his journey as a departure from the customary stereotype. But they are fundamentally wrong when they try to argue that the journey described in his affecting 1995 memoir, "Dreams From My Father," is somehow incompatible with blackness.

At bottom, the hue and cry over Barack Obama's identity stems from a failure by black traditionalists to recognize multiracial versions of themselves. Soon enough, perhaps by year's end, however, the Obama story, which seems so exotic to so many people now, will have found its place among all the other stories of the sprawling black diaspora.

Stop Him Before He Gets More Experience (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

AS the official Barack Obama rollout reaches its planned climax on "60 Minutes" tonight, we'll learn if he has the star power to upstage Anna Nicole Smith. But at least one rap against him can promptly be laid to rest: his lack of experience. If time in the United States Senate is what counts for presidential seasoning, maybe his two years' worth is already too much. Better he get out now, before there's another embarrassing nonvote on a nonbinding measure about what will soon be a four-year-old war.

History is going to look back and laugh at last week's farce, with the Virginia Republican John Warner voting to kill a debate on his own anti-surge resolution and the West Virginia Democrat Robert Byrd seizing the occasion for an hourlong soliloquy on coal mining. As the Senate pleasured itself with parliamentary one-upmanship, the rate of American casualties in Iraq reached a new high.

The day after the resolution debacle, I spoke with Senator Obama about the war and about his candidacy. Since we talked by phone, I can't swear he was clean, but he was definitely articulate. He doesn't yet sound as completely scripted as his opponents — though some talking-point-itis is creeping in — and he isn't remotely defensive as he shrugs off the race contretemps du jour prompted by his White House run. Not that he's all sweetness and light. "If the criterion is how long you've been in Washington, then we should just go ahead and assign Joe Biden or Chris Dodd the nomination," he said. "What people are looking for is judgment."

What Mr. Obama did not have to say is that he had the judgment about Iraq that his rivals lacked. As an Illinois state senator with no access to intelligence reports, he recognized in October 2002 that administration claims of Saddam's "imminent and direct threat to the United States" were hype and foresaw that an American occupation of Iraq would be of "undetermined length, at undetermined cost, with undetermined consequences." Nor can he be pilloried as soft on terrorism by the Cheney-Lieberman axis of neo-McCarthyism. "I don't oppose all wars," he said in the same Chicago speech. "What I am opposed to is a dumb war."

Now that Mr. Obama has passed through Men's Vogue, among other stations of a best-selling author's cross of hype, he wants to move past the dumb phase of Obamamania. He has begun to realize "how difficult it is to break through the interest in me on the beach or that my wife's made me stop sneaking cigarettes." He doesn't expect to be elected the leader of the free world because he "can tell a good joke on Jay Leno." It is "an open question and a legitimate question," he says, whether he can channel his early boomlet into an electoral victory.

No one can answer that question at this absurdly early stage of an absurdly long presidential race. But Mr. Obama is well aware of the serious criticisms he engenders, including the charge that he is conciliatory to a fault. He argues that he is "not interested in just splitting the difference" when he habitually seeks a consensus on tough issues. "There are some times where we need to be less bipartisan," he says. "I'm not interested in cheap bipartisanship. We should have been less bipartisan in asking tough questions about entering into this Iraq war."

He has introduced his own end-the-war plan that goes beyond a split-the-difference condemnation of the current escalation. His bill sets a beginning (May) and an end (March 31, 2008) for the phased withdrawal of combat troops, along with certain caveats to allow American military flexibility as "a big, difficult, messy situation" plays out during the endgame. Unlike the more timid Senate war critics, including Hillary Clinton, Mr. Obama has no qualms about embracing a plan with what he unabashedly labels "a timeline."

But he has no messianic pretensions and is enough of a realist to own up to the fact that his proposal has no present chance of becoming law. Nor do any of the other end-the-war plans offered by Congressional Democrats — some overlapping his, some calling for a faster exit than his. If a nonbinding resolution expressing mild criticism of President Bush's policy can't even come to a vote in the Senate, legislation demanding actual action is a nonstarter. All the Democrats' parrying about troop caps, timelines, benchmarks, the cutting off of war funding, whatever, is academic except as an index to the postures being struck by the various presidential hopefuls as they compete for their party's base. There simply aren't 60 votes in the Senate to force the hand of a president who, in Mr. Obama's words, "is hellbent on doing what he's been doing for the last four years."

Unless, of course, Republicans join in. The real point of every Iraq proposal, Mr. Obama observes, is to crank up the political heat until "enough pressure builds within the Republican Party that they essentially revolt." He argues that last week's refusal to act on a nonbinding resolution revealed just how quickly that pressure is building. If the resolution didn't matter, he asks, "why were they going through so many hoops to avoid the vote?" He seconds Chuck Hagel's celebrated explosion before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, when "he pointed at folks" and demanded that all 100 senators be held accountable for their votes on what Senator Hagel called "the most divisive issue in this country since Vietnam."

That's why Mr. Obama is right when he says that the individual 2008 contests for the Senate and the House are at least as important as the presidential race when it comes to winding down the war: "Ultimately what's going to make the biggest difference is the American people, particularly in swing districts and in Republican districts, sending a message to their representatives: This is intolerable to us."

That message was already sent by many American voters on Election Day in 2006. Rahm Emanuel, the Illinois congressman who, with his Senate counterpart, Chuck Schumer, oversaw that Democratic takeover, smells the blood of more Republicans in "marginal districts" in 2008. His party is now in the hunt for fresh candidates, including veterans of Iraq and Afghanistan. Such is the sense of impending doom among House Republicans that their leader, John Boehner, told CNN on Jan. 23 that he could render a verdict on whether the latest Bush Iraq strategy is "working" in a mere "60 to 90 days."

In the Senate, even the rumor of a tough opponent is proving enough to make some incumbents flip overnight from rubber-stamp support of the White House's war policy to criticism of the surge. Norm Coleman of Minnesota started running away from his own record the moment he saw the whites of Al Franken's eyes. Another endangered Republican up for re-election in 2008, John Sununu of New Hampshire, literally sprinted away from the press, The Washington Post reported, rather than field questions about his vote on the nonbinding resolution last week.

My own guess is that the Republican revolt will be hastened more by the harsh reality in Iraq than any pressure applied by Democratic maneuvers in Congress. Events are just moving too fast. While senators played their partisan games on Capitol Hill, they did so against the backdrop of chopper after chopper going down on the evening news. The juxtaposition made Washington's aura of unreality look obscene. Senator Warner looked like such a fool voting against his own principles ("No matter how strongly I feel about my resolution," he said, "I shall vote with my leader") that by week's end he abruptly released a letter asserting that he and six Republican colleagues did want a debate on an anti-surge resolution after all. (Of the seven signatories, five are up for re-election in 2008, Mr. Warner among them.)

What anyone in Congress with half a brain knows is that the surge was sabotaged before it began. The latest National Intelligence Estimate said as much when it posited that "even if violence is diminished," Iraq's "absence of unifying leaders" makes political reconciliation doubtful. Not enough capable Iraqi troops are showing up and, as Gen. Peter Pace told the Senate last week, not enough armored vehicles are available to protect the new American deployments. The State Department can't recruit enough civilian officials to manage the latest push to turn on Baghdad's electricity and is engaged in its own sectarian hostilities with the Pentagon. Revealingly enough, the surge's cheerleaders are already searching for post-Rumsfeld scapegoats. William Kristol attacked the new defense secretary, Robert Gates, for "letting the Joint Chiefs slow-walk the brigades in."

Washington's conventional wisdom has it that the worse things go in the war, the more voters will want to stick with the tried and true: Clinton, McCain, Giuliani. But as Mr. Obama reminds us, "Nobody had better Washington résumés than Dick Cheney or Donald Rumsfeld." In the wake of the catastrophe they and their enablers in both parties have made, the inexperienced should have a crack at inheriting the earth, especially if they're clean.

Clinton Cheered In N.H.; Some War Foes Skeptical (POL)

The Politico, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. – Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton returned to New Hampshire on Saturday for the first time in a decade, making two campaign stops that drew more than 2,500 supporters – but also skeptics who questioned her 2002 vote to authorize the invasion of Iraq.

Many came to see what they said might be history in the making, if the New York senator becomes the first female candidate to win her party's nomination for president.

Mothers brought daughters. Fathers towed along sons, who were urged to absorb the moment. Adult women tucked copies of Clinton's memoir under their arm, and yelled "You go, girl" from their seats.

"Come on, I'm a '60s girl," said Joan Chamberlain, the director of a local Berlin arts group. "She inspires me to hope again."

Clinton chose Berlin City Hall, the heart of an old paper mill town more than three hours north of Manchester, to debut her presidential campaign in the nation's first primary state. The setting seemed downright cozy compared to the packed bleachers of Concord High School's gymnasium, where she spoke later in the day to more than 2,000 people.

"There are people who think or say to others that it might be difficult to elect a woman president," Clinton told about 500 people in Berlin. "My response to that is we will never know until we try.

"I am obviously very proud to be a woman," she continued. "But I am not asking you to vote for me because I am a woman. I am asking you to vote for me because I believe I am the most qualified person to hit the ground running in 2009."

Clinton delivered a similar 25-minute stump speech at both stops, promising to establish universal health care coverage, lower the cost of college tuition and bring U.S. troops home from Iraq.

She also repeated a line she started using two weeks ago in Davenport, Iowa, in response to critics about her stance on the Iraq war: "If I was president in 2003, this war never would have begun. If I am president in 2009, I will end it."

The line brought the crowd to its feet in Berlin and Concord but did not appease everyone.

Her top rivals for the Democratic nomination have gone further than Clinton. Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois has opposed the war from the start, and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina has repeatedly called his war vote a mistake.

"Can you say the war authorization vote was a mistake?" Roger Tilton, a 46-year-old Nashua financial adviser, asked Clinton in Berlin. "I – and probably a lot of other Democratic primary voters – feel that until we hear you say that, we are not going to hear all these other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded with her usual talking points.

"Knowing what I know now, I would never have voted for it," she said. "I have taken responsibility for my vote. The mistakes were made by this president who misled this country and this Congress."

It was Clinton's shortest answer of the 90-minute town hall meeting – and it drew hearty applause – but it did not satisfy Tilton, who later said he wanted to hear her say that the vote was a mistake.

At both stops, Clinton paced slowly in front of the crowd, her hands clasped in front of her. Afterwards, she shook hands and signed autographs.

She fielded questions on the economy and the federal deficit, New Hampshire's status as the first primary state (she supports keeping it that way), and her position on egg donation for stem cell research ("I have to think about egg donation. I don't want to give a flip answer").

In Berlin, where a paper mill was shuttered in the last year, Clinton focused on job creation, highlighting her work assisting similar rural communities in upstate New York.

And Clinton occasionally dropped the name of the other Clinton – Bill, the former president who stayed home in Chappaqua, N.Y.

"It is great having a full-time political counselor," she said. "And he was pretty jealous this morning when I was leaving to come here."

She vowed to do one thing differently than her husband: "Not so many Dunkin' Donuts stops."

Clinton Campaigns In New Hampshire (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H., Feb. 10 -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y) faced tough questions over her 2002 vote to authorize the war in Iraq during a town hall gathering Saturday in this small mill city tucked away in the far northeastern reaches of the state.

The response to Clinton's visit to New Hampshire, her first since 1996, was typified by Roger Tilton.

Tilton, a financial consultant from Nashua who had risen at 4 a.m. to make the drive north, asked Clinton to apologize for her vote. She refused -- reiterating her stance that "I have taken responsibility for my vote."

Tilton was unmoved. "Until she says it was a mistake, she won't get my vote," he said.

The exchange highlighted the challenge Clinton faces in her still-new candidacy for president. She must convince Democratic primary voters, who tend to be strongly opposed to the war in Iraq, that her pragmatic approach to ending the conflict is the right one.

Complicating that task is that her two main rivals for the Democratic nomination -- Sen. Barack Obama (Ill.) and former senator John Edwards (N.C.) -- have spoken out strongly against the war. In his formal announcement of his bid for president Saturday, Obama mentioned his proposal to withdraw U.S. combat troops from Iraq by March 2008.

Despite the pointed questioning on Iraq, Clinton remained the poised front-runner that state and national polls make her out to be. She deftly answered questions on rising college tuition, immigration and the situation in Darfur. On health-care reform, which Clinton unsuccessfully tackled as first lady, she was unbowed about the need to expand coverage.

"I am going to be right back up on that horse of universal health-care coverage, and we are going to ride," she promised.

The crowds that gathered to hear Clinton were considerable. Hundreds packed the Berlin City Hall on a frigid morning for the chance to see and hear her; thousands more lined the wooden bleachers at Concord High School in the state capital later in the day.

For many it was their first in-person exposure to Clinton, and there was considerable curiosity about how she would handle the back-and-forth repartee on which New Hampshire voters pride themselves.

"I'd like to like her," said Nathaniel Gurien of North Conway. "Now that she is running, she has to show us what she's made of."

Much of Clinton's rhetoric was aimed doing just that -- she cast herself as an ordinary woman who has lived an extraordinary life. She described her upbringing in a "middle-class family in the middle of America in the middle of the last century" and asked the audience to help her avoid gaining weight while in the state and stopping too often at Dunkin' Donuts.

She invited two teenagers in the crowd to come to the stage to hand her a sticker supporting New Hampshire's bid to continue holding the first primary in the nation. She shook hands with both, drawing a roar from the crowd.

She headed off questions about whether a woman could be elected president in 2008 before they were even asked. "We'll never know until we try," Clinton said.

On issues, she was vague, choosing to focus on her accomplishments during her six years in the Senate rather than on specific proposals. Asked what she would do to reform the health-care system, Clinton was careful not to lay out a plan and instead turned the question back to the audience. On energy independence, Clinton advocated several modest measures but offered no broad proposal.

But it was Iraq and Clinton's position on the issue that served as the focal point of the day. Even those who were obvious supporters pressed for assurances that she believes the war was a mistake. One woman, who prefaced her remarks by telling Clinton, "You go, girl," asked her to better explain her 2002 vote.

Clinton said her vote did not give President Bush the authority to conduct a "preemptive war," and she cited comments she made to that effect at the time.

"He should not have been trusted with the authority we gave him," she said. Clinton also noted that she has advocated capping the number of troops in Iraq at the January 2007 level and supports proposals to cut off funding for Iraqi security forces if progress is not made in limiting the violence there.

Clinton refused to accept the view that the Senate's effort to pass a nonbinding resolution condemning the president's plan to send more U.S. troops to Iraq is a meaningless exercise.

"We are working to change the president's policy," she said. "Getting change in our system is difficult. I'm still in the arena. I'm still fighting."

Not everyone was convinced.

"She's very politically calculating and careful," said Chuck Henderson of North Conway. "I want someone who has courage and is fearless."

In New Hampshire, Clinton Owns Up To Her Vote On Iraq War (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

CONCORD, N.H., Feb. 10 — Campaigning in New Hampshire for the first time as a presidential candidate, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton came under criticism at two appearances on Saturday for voting in 2002 for military action in Iraq, and even refused one man's request that she say that her vote was a mistake.

While warmly received overall on this, her first visit to New Hampshire since 1996, Mrs. Clinton also sought to inoculate herself from the occasional Democratic antiwar anger. At a forum with 2,000 people in the state capital here, she first blamed President Bush for misusing her vote to go to war preemptively, and then obliquely questioned the Iraq positions of her two leading rivals for the Democratic nomination, Senator Barack Obama of Illinois and John Edwards, former senator of North Carolina.

While she did not refer to either by name, she said she could not solve Iraq by delivering a strong antiwar speech (like Mr. Obama gave on Saturday) or by calling for an immediate withdrawal of troops to end the war (as Mr. Edwards has done).

"It's very easy to go around saying, 'end the war now,' " she told about 2,000 people in a high school gymnasium here. "If we had a Democratic president, we would end the war."

"I know that there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage, but we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change," she said about Iraq at another point. "I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not how our country works."

And in a nod to Mr. Edwards's fierce criticism of the war since leaving the Senate, she said, "I'm still in the arena — I'm still fighting to get those 60 votes," a reference to the number of voters that Senate Democrats are trying to muster for a nonbinding resolution opposing Mr. Bush's war plan.

Mrs. Clinton's 2002 vote poses political peril for her candidacy; she has not repudiated her vote, as Mr. Edwards has done of his, and she lacks the record of consistent criticism against the war of Mr. Obama, who was not in the Senate in 2002. During one forum early Saturday in the economically struggling city of Berlin in northern New Hampshire, Mrs. Clinton used tough language to blame President Bush and his advisers for Iraq, asserting that they came into power in 2001 with an "obsession" to oust Saddam Hussein and resolve the "unfinished business" of the first Persian Gulf war.

"From almost the first day they got into office," Mrs. Clinton said, "they were trying to figure out how to get rid of Saddam Hussein. I'm not a psychiatrist; I don't know all of the reasons behind their concern, some might say their obsession."

While she tried to keep the audience of 300 people in Berlin focused on Mr. Bush, she was forced at one point to account for her own history on Iraq. One audience member, Roger Tilton of Nashua, asked her "right here, right now, once and for all, without nuance" to call her 2002 vote "a mistake."

"Until we hear you say that, we're not going to hear all these other great things you've said," Mr. Tilton said.

In response, Mrs. Clinton repeated her standard talking points that she would never have cast it if she had had the intelligence information that she had now.

She also tailored some of her remarks to the economic struggles of Berlin, a city of about 8,000 people that has been shedding jobs from its pulp and paper mills.

“I think there is a great opportunity for using wood for a fuel of the future, just like it was a fuel of the past,” Mrs. Clinton said. “If we can provide the right incentives, and we can give people the extra help we need by tax incentives and other ways of creating new jobs, we can begin to do this.”

In Concord, Senator Clinton also criticized President Bush for not asking Americans to make sacrifices or commitments. When an audience member reminded her, sympathetically, that Mr. Bush had suggested that Americans go shopping after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001, Mrs. Clinton picked up on that line.

Although Mrs. Clinton did not bring former President Bill Clinton with her, she tried to turn his popularity in New Hampshire to her advantage at several points, though she joked she would not be following his political playbook entirely.

“Probably the only thing that I’ll try to do differently from my husband is not so many Dunkin’ Donuts stops,” Mrs. Clinton said, evoking the lore of Mr. Clinton’s snacking habits during the 1992 presidential campaign. “I honestly think Bill gained about 20 pounds in the New Hampshire primary, and I cannot afford that.”

Clinton Draws Crowds In First NH Stops (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 11, 2007

Hillary Clinton talked about issues ranging from health care to education and the environment yesterday, but the Democratic presidential front-runner was sent a clear message that a burning issue in the first-primary state is how to end American bloodshed in Iraq.

In her first visit to New Hampshire in more than a decade and her first as a presidential candidate, the New York senator was welcomed enthusiastically to town hall-style meetings attended by 350 in Berlin and more than 1,500 at the Concord High School gymnasium, where huge banners saying, "Let the Conversation Begin," were hung from the rafters.

Clinton called it a "nostalgic" visit, recalling the support her husband, former President Bill Clinton, received from state primary voters in 1992, when his second-place finish revived his struggling candidacy.

"We are forever in your debt," she said.

Most questioners Clinton faced yesterday were friendly, if not adoring. Only a handful pressed her hard and those who did focused on Iraq.

Roger Tilton of Nashua was in the Berlin audience calling on Clinton to recant her 2002 vote in favor of a resolution authorizing President George W. Bush to invade Iraq.

In Concord, third-year law student Monique Cesna first told Clinton, "You go, girl," but then questioned her "seeming contradiction" between the 2002 vote and her current strong call for an end to the war. David Tiffany of Hollis asked why she had not taken a stronger leadership role to stop funding for the war.

Clinton said that most congressmen who voted to authorize the invasion did not know that Bush "would so misuse the authority we gave him." She noted that when she voted in 2002, she said on the Senate floor "that it was not a vote for a pre-emptive war.

"Knowing what we know now," she said, "we would never have voted to give this President the authority at all because he should not have been trusted with the authority we gave him."

Tiffany asked her why, if she is truly opposed to the war, she has not used "the power of the purse" and advocated cutting funding for the military action. "You seem to want to have it both ways," he said.

Clinton answered that she and other Capitol Hill Democrats "are working to try to change the President's policy. I know there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage that we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change. I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not the way the system works."

She said that in the Senate "you've got to get 60 votes to do anything," and any strong anti-war legislation would likely require two-thirds House and Senate super-majority majorities to override a presidential veto.

"I'm still fighting to try to get those 60 votes," she said, "It's easy to go around saying, 'End the war now."

Tiffany, a registered independent who said he almost always votes Democratic, said later, "I don't see her as one of the leaders in looking for a quick fix in Iraq. She is against using the power of the purse to bring the troops home, and I think our military families have done more than anyone has a right to ask them."

He said that while he has not decided who he will support, "I'd have to say that at this point I'd prefer almost any Democrat over her."

In Berlin, Tilton told Clinton he was not in the mood to listen to her other policy ideas.

DOJ_NMG_0130681

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," Tilton said. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters -- until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

In response, Clinton repeated her assertion that "knowing what we know now," she would not have voted for the resolution.

Later, Tilton said was inclined to support either Democrat John Edwards or Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., who announced his candidacy Saturday.

In Concord, Clinton said that since Iran and Syria are apparently funding much of the insurgency in Iraq, the U.S. should have dialogues with those nations.

"I think one of the rules of warfare is to know your enemy and to know what makes them tick and how to influence them," she said. "It is not smart strategy to say that you will never talk to bad people."

Clinton lost a battle as first lady to nationalize the U.S. health care system, but said yesterday, "I believe we can get to universal health care coverage. I know probably better than anyone that it's not going to be easy, but I believe that we're going to build a consensus in our country where it will be unstoppable."

Asked by Sarah Dustin, a long-time advocate for the underprivileged, what she would do to help single mothers give their children better lives, Clinton said that "everyone who works should get a level of income that lifts them out of poverty." She said that in addition to the earned income tax credit, "we need even new ways to help support particularly single parents."

Clinton criticized the Bush administration's "failed policies and misplaced priorities" on domestic spending, saying that one year of Bush tax cuts for those who earn $1 million or more cost $73 billion, or about $10 billion more than a low-income energy assistance program.

She voiced support for stem cell research and a woman's right to choose. She criticized Bush's "No Child Left Behind" law and called for more college aid and loan forgiveness programs for college students.

In Berlin, Clinton sought to focus on her plans to revive struggling small-town economies, universal health care and making college more affordable.

"I'm starting in the North Country for a simple reason -- I want to be a President who represents all of America," she said. "Our small towns, our rural areas, places that need some extra help and attention to be as prosperous in the 21st century as you were in 20th century.

Clinton entered the Concord gym to a loud, long ovation to the early 1990s song, "Right Here, Right Now," and was introduced by freshman U.S. Rep. Paul Hodes as a "great leader" with "fierce intelligence," "a passion for change" and an "enormous heart.

"I know New Hampshire will love her," said Hodes, who clarified later he was not endorsing any candidate for President.

Today, Clinton plans to attend house parties in Manchester and Nashua before a town hall meeting in Keene.

People Had Points To Make To Hillary (NHUL)

By Michael Cousineau

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 11, 2007

CONCORD – Dave Tiffany made it into the Concord High School gymnasium yesterday, wanting to make his point that now was the time to bring American troops home from Iraq.

He carried his feelings for all to see.

"Quit stalling. Bring our troops home," read his sign.

The Hollis man waved his message 45 minutes before New York Sen. Hillary Clinton was set to start a "conversation" with voters in the first presidential primary state.

Tiffany wanted to start the conversation early. The crowd cheered and applauded.

The senator's campaign staff, however, didn't like the message. A man wearing a "Hillary staff" badge took away his sign.

"They don't want it to be a real conversation," Tiffany said. "They want it to be a one-way conversation."

Tiffany was told he would be able to ask the Democratic presidential candidate a question during the town hall-style meeting and would get his sign back later that day.

The staffer who took away the sign said he couldn't talk to reporters. "I'm just the crowd guy."

Nearly two hours after losing his sign, Tiffany stood up in the bleachers and got the senator's attention.

"Welcome back to New Hampshire, where we believe in free and uncensored honest debate," he said.

"I do, too," she said.

He then pressed her on why she "won't use the power of the purse" to bring American troops home immediately.

Mrs. Clinton said she was working to change President Bush's policy.

DOJ_NMG_0130682

"I know there is a great deal of frustration and anger and outrage that we can't just wave a magic wand and make things change," she said. "I wish we could. I wish I could give a speech and it would all be different, but that's not the way the system works."

Signs and banners are commonplace in campaigns, but one receiving special attention at Concord High School had a non-partisan message.

English teacher Joanne McGlynn, an adviser to the Presidential Candidates Club, carried the 3-foot-long banner hoping to collect Clinton's signature to join those of two other potential White House hopefuls: Mark Warner of Virginia and Tom Vilsack of Iowa.

"A Required Stop on the Road to the White House?" the banner read. The question mark, she explained, was used because some candidates hadn't decided yet whether to run. Warner ultimately decided to take a pass for '08.

"We also didn't want to be too full of ourselves," she said.

Clinton staffers made the meeting happen, escorting the candidate to meet the students, pose for pictures and add her mark.

"Concord High -- Follow your dreams! Go Crimson Tide!" and signed it Hillary Rodham Clinton. She had to ask Sara Wilkinson, a Concord High junior, what the day's date was before adding that to the banner in black pen.

Meanwhile, Deb Crapo of Rye and Nancy Richards-Stower of Merrimack, early supporters of Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential run, held up their own homemade signs welcoming Sen. Clinton and gaining the attention of a gaggle of photographers.

Crapo said the pair had been hopeful Mrs. Clinton would run for President some day. "What Bill used to say to us is She's even smarter than me folks.'"

The only female presidential candidate experienced a microphone malfunction.

"Is there something I am supposed to switch?" she asked. "I'm not good at this technology stuff, guys."

When a staffer pulled up her jacket in the back to adjust her wireless microphone belt pack, she said, playfully: "Nobody look."

Then, she added, "I am wired, that's for sure."

After she reached full volume, Clinton called her first visit to New Hampshire since announcing for President "a really nostalgic trip for me in a lot of ways because in 1992, the people of New Hampshire were so kind to Bill and me."

Not quite four years later, Mrs. Clinton filed the required paperwork and $1,000 check at the State House in Concord for her husband's re-election bid. Now, she is the one that will have her name on the New Hampshire primary ballot.

"In fact, my husband is quite jealous that I'm here and he isn't," she said.

"I want to thank all the old friends who are here -- people who have been with us through good times and difficult ones," she said.

During the closing weeks of the 1992 primary campaign, Clinton faced allegations of having an extra-marital affair and draft dodging. He weathered the storm, finishing second here and declaring himself "The Comeback Kid."

She said she loved the personal campaigning required in New Hampshire, "but I'm going to make one change from my husband's campaign. And I want all of you to help me keep to this: not so many Dunkin Donuts stops."

For nearly an hour after her conversation, Clinton rewarded the crowd -- not with doughnuts but with plenty of autographs and photo opportunities.

Hillary Deflects Pressure To Repudiate Iraq Vote (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. (AP) -- Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton faced tough questions yesterday from New Hampshire voters skeptical about her stand on the Iraq war, including one who demanded that she repudiate her 2002 Senate vote to send U.S. troops into battle.

In her first presidential campaign visit to the early-primary state, the New York Democrat sought to focus on her plans to revive struggling small-town economies, universal health care and making college more affordable. But at a crowded town-hall meeting of about 350 people, Mrs. Clinton was peppered with questions about Iraq.

Her toughest questioner was Roger Tilton, 46, a financial adviser from Nashua, N.H. Mr. Tilton told Mrs. Clinton that unless she recanted her vote, he was not in the mood to listen to her other policy ideas.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," he said. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters, until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

In response, Mrs. Clinton repeated her assertion that "knowing what we know now, I would never have voted for it," and said voters would have to decide for themselves whether her position was acceptable.

"The mistakes were made by this president, who misled this country and this Congress," Mrs. Clinton said to loud applause.

Later, Mr. Tilton said he was not satisfied with her answer and was inclined to support either former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina or Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois. The latter announced his candidacy yesterday.

"I love what she says about health care; I love what she says about capping troop levels; I love what she says about the war now," he said, adding he would remain undecided until she offered a clearer answer.

Mrs. Clinton's refusal to recant her vote has been a sore point for many liberal Democratic activists, who tend to vote heavily in the party's primaries.

Mr. Edwards has said his vote was wrong. Mr. Obama was not in the Senate in 2002, but has opposed the war from the outset.

Mrs. Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic nomination in 2008, has strongly criticized the Bush administration's conduct of the war, most recently in strong terms at a Democratic National Committee meeting. She promised to end the war if elected president. She also has proposed capping troop levels in Iraq.

For the most part, Mrs. Clinton was received warmly by the audience. People applauded enthusiastically several times throughout her 90-minute appearance.

Mrs. Clinton told the crowd she chose to open her visit in Berlin, a struggling paper-mill town in northern New Hampshire, because the area resembled upstate New York and faced many of the same economic challenges.

"I'm starting in the north country for a simple reason -- I want to be a president who represents all of America," she said. "Our small towns, our rural areas, places that need some extra help and attention to be as prosperous in the 21st century as you were in 20th century."

Hillary Faces Tough Questions On Iraq (NSDY)

By J. Jioni Palmer

Newsday, February 11, 2007

BERLIN, N.H. -- With the snowcapped, windswept peaks of the White Mountains nearby, Sen. Hillary Clinton talked to residents of this city in the northernmost reaches of the Granite State in her first New Hampshire appearance as a candidate for the White House.

She was generally well-received by the overflow crowds, although she had to face tough questions about her position on Iraq.

In this paper-mill town straddling the Androscoggin River, and later in Concord, the state capital, Clinton began what she called a "conversation" that sought to cast her as a political centrist with mainstream values who cares about Main Street.

"I grew up in a middle-class family, in the middle of country, in the middle of the last century," she said, describing her childhood in Illionis to the residents of the state where the first primary will take place.

Her upbringing, she said, instilled a conviction that any parent could provide a better future for their children through their own hard work and that the government would provide an infrastructure to make that happen.

"There was a basic bargain in America: If you did your part, if you worked hard and played by the rules, then you would be given the chance to go as far as your dreams and your ambition and your hard work would take you," Clinton said. "The other part of the bargain was that your government would be on your side ... I look now and it seems to me we are in danger of breaking that bargain because of the decisions being made by the leaders in our country."

The sounds of Aerosmith and Bob Marley filled the auditorium at Berlin City Hall, and the crowd -- some of whom had driven more than four hours -- rustled with excitement as the time of Clinton's appearance drew near. Some clutched copies of her autobiography, others gripped former President Bill Clinton's. A few carried both.

A button vendor did a brisk business. At three for $10 or one for $5, buyers could choose from among a half-dozen, including one with a picture of Bill Clinton that said "First Gentleman."

Wearing a wireless microphone, Clinton walked around the two venues talking about the need to provide universal health care, pitching energy independence as national security issue and emphasizing her opposition to President George W. Bush's planned troop surge in Iraq.

Clinton fielded questions from the audience -- most dealing with topics she touched on during her opening remarks -- that were largely friendly. But she did take occasional heat for her stance on the war.

Perhaps to head off such queries, Clinton said that if she had been president in 2003 the United States never would have gone to war, and that should she be elected, if the troops are still there, she'd take them out.

DOJ_NMG_0130684

That wasn't enough for some.

"I want to know if right here, right now, once and for all and without nuance, you can say that war authorization was a mistake," said Roger Tilton, 46, of Nashua. "I, and I think a lot of other primary voters -- until we hear you say it, we're not going to hear all the other great things you are saying."

Clinton responded that if she knew then what she knows now, "I never would have voted for the war."

But Tilton, a financial adviser, said he still wasn't satisfied.

"I can't listen to her until I hear her say it was a mistake," he said afterward. "You know what, there were a lot of the people in the Senate [23 members] at the time who didn't vote for it. There were a lot of people in the Senate at the time who voted for it and now say it was a mistake."

Spielberg For Hillary (NOVAK)

Robert Novak, February 10, 2007

Spielberg for Hillary

WASHINGTON – Democratic sources say Hollywood producer Steven Spielberg, previously listed as a probable supporter of Sen. Barack Obama for President, has agreed to host a major fund-raiser for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton.

David Geffen and Jeffrey Katzenberg, Spielberg's colleagues at the DreamWorks film studio, are backing Obama. It was thought that Spielberg was too, but sources say Bill Clinton prevailed on him to help his wife. All three men were generous backers of the former President.

Geffen and Katzenberg are hosting a $2,300-a-ticket reception at the Beverly Hilton Hotel in Los Angeles Feb. 20. A pledge to raise or donate $46,000 is necessary to attend a private dinner with Obama at Geffen's Malibu residence that night.

GOP ETHICS

House Minority Leader John Boehner, addressing Tuesday's closed-door conference of Republican House members, gave a clean bill of health to two California colleagues under federal investigation: Reps. Jerry Lewis and Gary Miller.

If he were not convinced of Lewis's integrity, Boehner told the conference, he would not have approved his continuation as top Republican on the Appropriations Committee. Lewis is being investigated for helping a lobbyist direct millions of dollars in earmarks for clients.

Lewis did not address the conference, but Miller pleaded innocent of wrongdoing in California land transactions. That won Miller a standing ovation, but a few colleagues noted the resemblance to a similar speech to the conference last year by then Rep. Bob Ney of Ohio. On Jan. 19, Ney was sentenced to 30 months in federal prison after pleading guilty to conspiracy in the Jack Abramoff influence-peddling scandal.

BUCKS FOR MCCAIN

Sen. John McCain on Wednesday personally appealed to an invitation-only meeting of some 50 possible supporters to sell $2,300 tickets for a March 21 reception at Washington's Mandarin Hotel that he considers vital to his campaign for the Republican Presidential nomination.

McCain said the money raised for the dinner would be credited to the March 31 Federal Election Commission report on contributions, which he called "the invisible primary" to show fund-raising prowess.

Wednesday's meeting, held in a non-government office building near the Capitol, was attended by both longtime McCain backers and new allies who supported George W. Bush against McCain in 2000.

RETIRING REPUBLICANS

The National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC) staff is contacting GOP House members to get an idea of how many intend to retire and give the Democrats soft targets in 2008.

The NRCC survey follows a report in the Roll Call newspaper that the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee (DCCC) is monitoring more than two dozen House Republicans who are candidates for retirement.

No House Republican has yet announced retirement, and the only GOP senator so far to call it quits is Wayne Allard of Colorado. However, more retirements from both houses are expected as Republicans chafe under life in the minority. No Democratic resignations have been announced, and none are expected from the House. All Democratic senators up for re-election in 2008 have announced they are running again, with the exception of Sen. Tom Harkin of Iowa (who says he has not yet decided).

HELSINKI PURGE

Rep. Chris Smith of New Jersey and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas, Republican members of the Helsinki Commission monitoring human rights, have written protests to illegal firing of four Republican commission staffers after the Democrats won control of Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0130685

The commission's new chairman, Democratic Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, began the firings under oversight of Spencer Oliver, a longtime Democratic operative famed as a victim of the Watergate burglary. Oliver, secretary general of an international body dealing with human rights, was assisting the U.S. commission as an observer. Under the commission's founding laws, three of the committee's four lawmakers must concur in any staff firing.

Hastings is expected to change the commission's focus away from religious freedom in Belarus and European sex trafficking and concentrate on alleged U.S. abuses at Guantanamo.

Campaign Bloggers Caught In Web (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

THE 2008 PRESIDENTIAL campaign has its first official political-religious-technological controversy. Last week, Bill Donohue, president of the Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights, issued a broadside against Amanda Marcotte and Melissa McEwan, two relatively obscure bloggers recently hired by former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards, calling them "anti-Catholic, vulgar, trash-talking bigots." The candidate's response — and the blogosphere's — show how both entities are changing each other.

Donohue's first attack landed on Tuesday. He dug up about 10 instances from the last year in which Marcotte and McEwan bluntly (and occasionally in hyperbolically profane style) criticized the Catholic Church, rebuked conservative Christians or simply used some of the seven words that one isn't allowed to say on TV. For Edwards, Donohue's call for Marcotte and McEwan to be ousted was a double-edged sword. If he refused, he'd invite the wrath of conservative Christians; if he complied, he'd alienate the liberal activists who are key to his campaign. The latter responded by highlighting the words and deeds of some of the people hired by Republican candidates, such as Patrick Hynes, a sharp-tongued conservative blogger who has been a consultant with Arizona Sen. John McCain's campaign.

Edwards — possibly distracted by the universal healthcare proposal he unveiled Monday — let the issue percolate for a couple of days before letting the two women off with a warning: "That kind of intolerant language will not be permitted from anyone on my campaign." The move mollified left-leaning bloggers but not Donohue, who pledged to escalate his publicity blitz against Edwards. At week's end, the battle for control of Edwards' agenda continued, healthcare policy battling blogger controversy for media attention.

The conflict over the bloggers is likely to be just the opening salvo in a wave of guilt-by-association attacks. By trying to gin up support from the blogosphere, candidates are bringing lots of folks into the campaign who've left long trails of (often intemperate) commentary online. So not only do candidates have to worry about having their own gaffes preserved and promoted on YouTube, they may have to distance themselves from what their employees said before coming onboard. Expect this kind of nuttiness to continue until voters show that they care more about a candidate's thoughts than those of the hired hands.

Searching For Mr. Right (NYT)

By Patrick Healy

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

HAVING lost Congress and faith, at times, in President Bush, social conservatives are now holding out for a hero in the 2008 Republican presidential campaign.

But who? And what kind of hero?

Is it the hero of 9/11, Rudolph W. Giuliani, whose support of abortion rights is anything but heroic to social conservatives? Is it the hero against gay marriage in Massachusetts, Mitt Romney, who nevertheless once championed gay rights? Or is it a hero of wartime, John McCain, who has also betrayed them on issues like federal judicial appointments?

Eleven months before the first presidential caucuses, social conservatives are in no mood to compromise; many don't want to settle for Senator McCain, nor can they abide Mr. Giuliani. They want a true believer, reliably opposed to abortion rights, gay rights and gun control, tough on immigration and a supporter of conservative judicial appointments.

But are any second-tier contenders strong enough to carry the mantle of their idol, Ronald Reagan — and also, strong enough to win?

Senator Sam Brownback of Kansas strongly opposes abortion rights and gay marriage; former Gov. Mike Huckabee of Arkansas is a Southern Baptist minister who talks about religion and civic life; and Representative Duncan Hunter appears to have solid conservative credentials. Yet all three are largely unknown beyond their states and Capitol Hill. The same goes for Representative Tom Tancredo of Colorado, who appears to be a one-issue candidate, focused on fighting illegal immigration.

Gone is the sense that social conservatives are a unified bloc. The movement that rose with the candidacy of Ronald Reagan in the 1970s is now fractured over both its messengers and its message. The issues that social conservatives care about most are often overshadowed by Iraq and terrorism, energy and taxes. And if their vote splinters in 2008, their political potency could be sapped.

If these voters split into factions for different Republican candidates, either Mr. Giuliani or Mr. McCain could slip through the middle (while wriggling around the so-called values issues), uniting enough fiscal conservatives and national security conservatives — and moderate and liberal Republicans — to win the party's nomination next year. And Mr. Giuliani, for one, is starting to shade his support for abortion rights in hopes of assuaging opponents.

"A fractured movement is Rudy Giuliani's dream," said Paul M. Weyrich, chairman of the Free Congress Foundation, a conservative research group. "What I hear constantly is, 'We've got to beat Hillary; we can't allow her to be president.'

"What I'm hearing is, 'We hate him, we don't agree with his positions, we feel that his personal life is a travesty — but on the other hand, he probably could beat Hillary.' I hear this over and over again. I keep telling people, don't fall for that."

Yet Mr. Weyrich, a savvy political strategist, knows that if social conservatives are torn on Election Day, many may stay home, and the consequence might be another Clinton presidency. So a moment of political reckoning for social conservatives seems inevitable. Will they give ground on their issues in order to elect a Republican?

"I don't see social conservatives making compromises to win in 2008," said the Rev. Donald Wildmon, founder of the American Family Association, a conservative Christian broadcaster and advocacy group. "Social conservatives don't blindly follow the Pied Piper anymore. We've been disappointed and taken for granted by Republicans at times. I don't think there's any appetite for compromising core values."

Nor should there be, according to Governor Huckabee. In recent interviews, he has artfully tied his religious devotion to broader social concerns. For instance, on NPR last week, he said that reclaiming a nation for Christ was not a matter of proselytizing.

"It means that we would reflect what he reflected, and that is compassion and love," Mr. Huckabee said.

Yet he was also critical of some opponents of abortion rights, suggesting that they focus too much on embryos. "I want to be concerned about making sure every child has music and art education," he said. "There are a lot of things that, to me, are a part of my being pro-life."

Senator Brownback, meanwhile, has told some allies that he will not allow Iraq or economic issues to distract him from talking about social issues. Indeed, in a speech last month, he listed reviving faith among Americans and opposing same-sex marriage as examples of his priorities.

Mr. Romney, the former governor of Massachusetts, has tried to explain his conversion on abortion rights, from support to opposition, with a made-for-television story: As he listened to a Harvard researcher discussing stem-cell science, and the destruction of embryos, he saw the antiabortion cause in a new light.

At some recent conferences for social conservatives, Mr. Romney has used a line that some conservatives find credible: "On abortion I was not always a Ronald Reagan conservative. Neither was Ronald Reagan."

This sort of language also resonates with other conservative wings of the party, like some members of the antitax faction who do not want to get bogged down over whether Mr. Romney is now sufficiently sincere in his opposition to abortion.

"Romney has a one-way, one-time migration on abortion to explain," said Grover Norquist, the head of Americans for Tax Reform. "Senator McCain, meanwhile, was a Reaganite on taxes and then drifted for six years and now wants to come back. Same on guns. Same on judges. He was a two-way migration on several issues, and a lot of conservatives will have a hard time with that."

Yet on a fundamental matter like the life of a fetus, some social conservatives say, the turnabout by Mr. Romney is worthy of skepticism.

"I know people can change, but sometimes when people want to be president, they speak of a change that has not occurred," Mr. Wildmon said. "I like to go with a person whose words match their actions."

Mr. McCain's campaign is counting on a sharp split among social conservatives in the 2008 primary. Mr. Brownback and Mr. Huckabee, his strategists believe, lack the money and organizational strength to mount serious bids that would galvanize social conservatives. Meanwhile, Mr. McCain and Mr. Giuliani are portraying themselves as conservatives on taxes and national security.

"If someone can make a credible case to the social conservatives and have a position on Iraq that appeals to the broad majority of Republicans, you may see an election where the social issues, the moral values issues, are not as central as they were in the past," said Matthew Dallek, the author of "The Right Moment: Ronald Reagan's First Victory and the Decisive Turning Point in American Politics."

Mr. Dallek notes that Mr. Reagan, as governor of California in the 1960s, took steps to support abortion rights and raise taxes. Yet he became a unifying figure for social conservatives because of his staunch anti-Communist credentials, and because he came to embrace their positions opposing abortion rights as well as tax cuts.

"Social conservatives may come to see one of the leading candidates as solid enough on their values issues, while keeping the national focus on the major issue of the day — defeating Communism for Reagan, and fixing Iraq and winning the war on terror for a McCain or a Romney," Mr. Dallek said.

Yet this outcome seems an unlikely prospect to some political analysts.

In a survey of voters in the 2006 elections, the Pew Forum found that so-called values issues like opposition to same-sex marriage and abortion rights mattered the most to white evangelical Protestant voters. Forty-five percent of them ranked values issues highest; 17 percent chose the war in Iraq; and 12 percent cited illegal immigration.

"White evangelical Protestants are not only still a real component of the Republican Party, but they are also concentrated in key primary states like South Carolina, Florida and Virginia," said John Green, a senior fellow in religion and American politics at the Pew Forum. "They are not going away, and it's too soon to say how fractured they will be."

The Limits Of Sunniness (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

In this winter of their discontents, nostalgia for Ronald Reagan has become for many conservatives a substitute for thinking. This mental paralysis -- gratitude decaying into idolatry -- is sterile: Neither the man nor his moment will recur. Conservatives should face the fact that Reaganism cannot define conservatism.

That is one lesson of John Patrick Diggins's new book, " Ronald Reagan: Fate, Freedom, and the Making of History." Diggins, a historian at the City University of New York, treats Reagan respectfully as an important subject in American intellectual history. The 1980s, he says, thoroughly joined politics to political theory. But he notes that Reagan's theory was radically unlike that of Edmund Burke, the founder of modern conservatism, and very like that of Burke's nemesis, Thomas Paine. Burke believed that the past is prescriptive because tradition is a repository of moral wisdom. Reagan frequently quoted Paine's preposterous cry that "we have it in our power to begin the world over again."

Diggins's thesis is that the 1980s were America's "Emersonian moment" because Reagan, a "political romantic" from the Midwest and West, echoed New England's Ralph Waldo Emerson. "Emerson was right," Reagan said several times of the man who wrote, "No law can be sacred to me but that of my nature." Hence Reagan's unique, and perhaps oxymoronic, doctrine -- conservatism without anxieties. Reagan's preternatural serenity derived from his conception of the supernatural.

Diggins says Reagan imbibed his mother's form of Christianity, a strand of 19th-century Unitarianism from which Reagan took a foundational belief that he expressed in a 1951 letter: "God couldn't create evil so the desires he planted in us are good." This logic -- God is good, therefore so are God-given desires -- leads to the Emersonian faith that we please God by pleasing ourselves. Therefore there is no need for the people to discipline their desires. So, no leader needs to suggest that the public has shortcomings and should engage in critical self-examination.

Diggins thinks that Reagan's religion "enables us to forget religion" because it banishes the idea of "a God of judgment and punishment." Reagan's popularity was largely the result of "his blaming government for problems that are inherent in democracy itself." To Reagan, the idea of problems inherent in democracy was unintelligible because it implied that there were inherent problems with the demos -- the people. There was nothing -- nothing-- in Reagan's thinking akin to Lincoln's melancholy fatalism, his belief (see his Second Inaugural) that the failings of the people on both sides of the Civil War were the reasons why "the war came."

As Diggins says, Reagan's "theory of government has little reference to the principles of the American founding." To the Founders, and especially to the wisest of them, James Madison, government's principal function is to resist, modulate and even frustrate the public's unruly passions, which arise from desires.

"The true conservatives, the founders," Diggins rightly says, constructed a government full of blocking mechanisms -- separations of powers, a bicameral legislature, and other checks and balances -- in order "to check the demands of the people." Madison's Constitution responds to the problem of human nature. "Reagan," says Diggins, "let human nature off the hook."

"An unmentionable irony," writes Diggins, is that big-government conservatism is an inevitable result of Reaganism. "Under Reagan, Americans could live off government and hate it at the same time. Americans blamed government for their dependence upon it." Unless people have a bad conscience about demanding big government -- a dispenser of unending entitlements -- they will get ever larger government. But how can people have a bad conscience after being told (in Reagan's First Inaugural) that they are all heroes? And after being assured that all their desires, which inevitably include desires for government-supplied entitlements, are good?

Similarly, Reagan said that the people never start wars, only governments do. But the Balkans reached a bloody boil because of the absence of effective government. Which describes Iraq today.

Because of Reagan's role in the dissolution of the Soviet Union, Diggins ranks him among the "three great liberators in American history" -- the others being Lincoln and Franklin Roosevelt -- and among America's three or four greatest presidents. But, says Diggins, an Emersonian president who tells us our desires are necessarily good leaves much to be desired.

If the defining doctrine of the Republican Party is limited government, the party must move up from nostalgia and leaven its reverence for Reagan with respect for Madison. As Diggins says, Reaganism tells people comforting and flattering things that they want to hear; the Madisonian persuasion tells them sobering truths that they need to know.

McCain Taps Cash He Sought To Limit (WP)

By John Solomon

Just about a year and a half ago, Sen. John McCain went to court to try to curtail the influence of a group to which A. Jerrold Perenchio gave $9 million, saying it was trying to "evade and violate" new campaign laws with voter ads ahead of the midterm elections.

As McCain launches his own presidential campaign, however, he is counting on Perenchio, the founder of the Univision Spanish-language media empire, to raise millions of dollars as co-chairman of the Arizona Republican's national finance committee.

In his early efforts to secure the support of the Republican establishment he has frequently bucked, McCain has embraced some of the same political-money figures, forces and tactics he pilloried during a 15-year crusade to reduce the influence of big donors, fundraisers and lobbyists in elections. That includes enlisting the support of Washington lobbyists as well as key players in the fundraising machine that helped President Bush defeat McCain in the 2000 Republican primaries.

After enduring his own brush with scandal in the early 1990s, when he and four Senate colleagues pressured regulators on behalf of Charles Keating, chairman of a failed savings and loan association, while collecting donations and favors from him, McCain became a leader in the effort to eliminate "soft money" in elections -- large donations from corporations, labor unions and wealthy individuals. In 2002, McCain joined forces with Sen. Russell Feingold (D-Wis.) to finally push through legislation ending soft money and placing strict limits on donations.

But now the contrast between McCain the presidential candidate and McCain the reformer can be jarring. McCain's campaign says that he is still studying whether to forgo the public financing and spending limits he has long supported, but that he will not be handicapped by restrictions his competitors will not face in 2008.

McCain the reformer worked unsuccessfully through Congress and the courts to try to stop nonprofit political groups known as 527s from using unlimited donations to run political ads and fund other activities aimed at influencing voters in the run-up to elections. He reintroduced legislation last week to end 527 donations, but there appears to be little appetite in Congress to pass it.

McCain the candidate now expects Republicans to use the same big-money 527 groups in the 2008 elections to beat Democrats, if the groups remain legal. "The senator believes that both parties should be subjected to an even playing field. If Democratic organizations are allowed to take advantage of 527s, Republican organizations will, too," said Mark Salter, a senior McCain adviser. The senator declined to be interviewed.

McCain the reformer relentlessly argued that six- and seven-figure "soft money" checks that corporations, wealthy individuals and unions were giving to political parties to influence elections were corrupting American politics. "The voices of average Americans have been drowned out by the deafening racket of campaign cash," he warned just a few years ago.

McCain the candidate has enlisted some of the same GOP fundraising giants who created and flourished in the soft-money system, including Bush's fundraising "Pioneers" and "Rangers," who earned their designations by raising at least $100,000 or $200,000 for his campaigns.

At least six of McCain's first eight national finance co-chairmen have given or raised large donations for political parties or 527 groups, campaign and IRS records show. In all, the finance co-chairs have given at least $13.5 million in soft money and 527 donations since the 1998 election.

They include former Bush moneymen such as lobbyist Thomas G. Loeffler and financier Donald Bren, whose personal and corporate donations total in the hundreds of thousands of dollars each in recent elections.

In key states, McCain has enlisted the likes of New York financier Henry Kravis, one of the GOP's largest donors over the past two decades, and Texas energy executive Robert A. Mosbacher, the architect of the Republicans' "Team 100" fundraising machine that helped make soft money a staple of politics by raising $20 million in large donations to help Bush's father win the presidency in 1988.

The big moneymen gravitating to McCain are politically pragmatic. They may not always agree with him, but they say they admire the Arizona senator for his work on campaign finance reform, his Vietnam War record, his support of Bush on Iraq and his recent campaigning for GOP candidates.

"He did things for our country that very few people I know would have had the courage to do," said Brian Ballard, a Florida lobbyist and longtime fundraiser for former Florida governor Jeb Bush who signed on this month to raise money for McCain.

Ballard said most of the big-money players he knows are not fazed by McCain's attacks on the political-money and lobbying systems, calling it more of an issue for consultants who make their living off big donations.

"I myself don't mind him calling out lobbyists when they've done something bad," Ballard said.

Lobbyists have been a favorite target of McCain the reformer, who proposed legislation requiring so-called grass-roots groups that organize average citizens into lobbying forces to disclose their financial backers.

But McCain the candidate switched positions and last month voted against that disclosure requirement after influential GOP groups such as Focus on the Family and National Right to Life strongly opposed the idea. McCain also hired as his campaign manager one of the grass-roots-lobbying industry's key consultants, Bush strategist Terry Nelson.

"When the senator heard from legitimate public-interest organizations in January of last year that a provision in the legislation would unfairly penalize them for Jack Abramoff's behavior, he agreed and withdrew his support for the provision at that time," Salter explained, referring to the lobbyist in prison for fraud, tax evasion and conspiracy.

In December, Sen. Trent Lott (Miss.), a darling of GOP conservatives and lobbyists, acted as a surrogate for McCain at a fundraising meeting with a group of lobbyists at a Capitol Hill hotel. McCain's political action committee has collected donations -- capped at $5,000 -- from several big-name lobbyists, including Loeffler and fellow Bush fundraiser Wayne Berman, whose blue-chip clients frequently have issues pending before Congress and the White House.

"Both Wayne Berman and Tom Loeffler are longtime supporters of the Republican Party, President Bush and Senator McCain," Salter said. "Senator McCain is pleased to have their support."

Ed Rogers, one of Washington's most influential GOP lobbyists and strategists, said the embrace of McCain is not surprising. "Lobbyists are the ultimate pragmatists, and they deal with the world as is," said Rogers, who last year gave $5,000 to McCain's political action committee, though he says he has not yet endorsed a candidate.

Perenchio, now a member of McCain's finance committee, funneled more than $1.4 million in soft money to Republican causes in the 1998, 2000 and 2002 election campaigns, often in amounts McCain used to criticize. For one GOP fundraising dinner in the spring of 2001, for example, he donated $250,000. Perenchio has also been a major donor to the 527 groups formed to exploit a loophole in the legislation sponsored by McCain and Feingold.

Taking their name from a little-known provision of the IRS tax code, the groups began raising large donations -- some in the millions of dollars -- and running ads and funding other activities designed to influence the 2004 presidential election. Federal election regulators have refused to rein in the groups and their donations in the past two elections.

Perenchio gave $4 million to a pro-Republican 527 group called Progress for America, which helped Bush in the 2004 campaign. In the 2006 congressional races, Perenchio gave $5 million more to the same group.

In the summer of 2005, McCain's allies in the reform movement went to court seeking to force the Federal Election Commission to regulate the 527 groups and make them abide by the same donation limits as other political committees.

In a friend-of-the-court brief, McCain and Feingold specifically cited Progress for America as an example of what was wrong with 527 groups. The court filing cited one of the group's pro-Bush commercials -- which starred a 16-year-old whose mother was killed in the Sept. 11 attacks -- to illustrate the impact large donations had on the election. Perenchio was not mentioned.

"The deployment of section 527 groups as the new vehicle for using soft money to conduct political activities to influence federal elections is simply the latest chapter in a long history of efforts to evade and violate the federal campaign finance laws," the McCain court filing stated. "Sadly, it is another chapter in the FEC's failure to enforce the campaign finance laws."

Perenchio declined to be interviewed. Salter said Perenchio's support of McCain "pre-dates the existence of 527s. Perenchio served on Senator McCain's fundraising committee in 2000, and the senator is pleased to have his continued support."

That support has come in a number of ways. Tax records show that Perenchio's Chartwell Foundation donated $100,000 on March 1, 2002, to the Reform Institute, a nonprofit foundation of which McCain was co-chairman and which was advocating the end of big political donations.

At the time, McCain was chairman of the Senate Commerce Committee, which oversees the broadcast industry, and Univision had numerous issues pending before the government. Cablevision, another broadcaster, also donated $200,000 to the McCain foundation around the same time the senator took action in Congress favorable to that company.

McCain's allies in the campaign finance reform movement seem resigned to the fact that he will not abide by many of the principles he advocated for a decade as a reformer, including public financing and its associated spending and fundraising limits.

"Certainly we are disappointed that he has decided not to take the lead in fixing the presidential-financing system he is competing in," said Mary Boyle of Common Cause, the ethics watchdog that cheered McCain's reform efforts for years. "But it is understandable he is opting out.

"It is apparent to us that to run a competitive presidential campaign inside a system that is still broken, that is what he has to do," she said.

A Conversation With Sen. John McCain (STPETE)

By Bill Adair

St. Petersburg Times, February 11, 2007

Q: You've said the Pentagon mismanaged the war from the start, didn't have enough boots on the ground. What makes you think they can get it right now?

A: We've got a new strategy and new leaders and finally a recognition that the previous strategy was failed.

Q: You've been especially critical of Secretary Rumsfeld and Vice President Cheney and how they have handled the war. Why?

A: Particularly Rumsfeld. That latest thing about Cheney was vastly overblown. I said all the administration (is to blame). I've said for months and years, this business of inflating expectations of the American people was wrong. It was "Mission Accomplished," "Last throes" . . . there is a litany of statements (by the Bush administration) that did not comport with reality on the ground. So, for the last three and a half years, I and others have used every possible tool we could to try to get a different strategy. It wasn't just not enough troops. It was the firing of everybody in the Army, it was allowing the looting from the beginning, it was "de-Baathification." There was a failure to make a quick transition to an Iraqi government. Look, these failures have been well-chronicled in Fiasco and Cobra II. It's not John McCain's assessment. It's everybody's assessment of the mishandling.

Q: I read Fiasco and at the end was waiting for Tom Ricks, the author, to say "here's our way out of Iraq." He doesn't sound very optimistic.

A: A lot of people think it's too late (for a solution in Iraq). I don't think so. I think we have a good chance of success with a new strategy and new leadership. But do I think there is a risk of failure? Absolutely. I can't guarantee success. But I can guarantee the results of failure. Fortunately, some Americans are beginning to think about that.It's one thing to be frustrated and say withdraw. But then you've got to think about the consequences of withdrawal – and it's chaos.

Q: How much is your support of the troop increase hurting your presidential campaign?

A: I have no idea and I don't worry about it.

Q: The polls in New Hampshire show a steady decline. Does that trouble you?

A: There is one poll that shows that. There are other polls that show it just steady. But I don't worry about it.

Q: Why don't you worry about it?

A: This is far more important than any political ambitions I might have. I go out to Walter Reed and Bethesda (military hospitals) and see kids who have given one heck of a lot more than I could ever contemplate.

Q: But why be so vocal about this? You've become the most vocal supporter of the plan.

A: I was the greatest critic of the way it was conducted - and I end up being a supporter. It's got to do with my visibility on the Armed Services Committee, the view that people have of me in the country as one of the people who is listened to on national security.

You've got to do what you think is right.

Q: I know you don't like talking about your kids...

A: I won't. I won't talk about my kids.

Q: Why won't you talk about them?

A: I'm doing what I hope is right for every family in America.

Q: But I think anybody who is a parent is going to be struck by the fact that you are calling for a troop increase that could lead to Jimmy going over there.

A: I cannot allow that to be a consideration.

Q: Does duty come before family in this case?

A: I do not talk about my family.

Q: Why do you want to be president?

DOJ_NMG_0130691

A: Because I think we're in very challenging times in America and I think my life and my credentials and my experience and my vision for the future of this nation qualifies me to be president.

Q: You're in a different position now, if not the front runner, one of them. There was always an appeal to McCain as the underdog, as the maverick. Is that going to change the dynamic this time around, that you've become the one to beat?

A: Already, when MoveOn.org is running hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of ads attacking you in January of the odd-numbered year, then you know that certainly the dynamic has changed in some represent. Every comment I make is under a microscope and the attacks from the far left have intensified.

Q: Does that alter your strategy at all?

A: No.

Q: You're a shrewd legislator, you've gone after Abramoff and many others. But being president takes different skills. Why would you make a good president?

A: All my life, I've been involved in national security issues in one way or another, I've been involved in leadership on many many issues, working both sides of the aisle. I have a clear record of legislative achievement. I have been in positions of leadership.

Q: Why are conservatives wary about you?

A: I think because there have been times when I've taken positions that they may not agree with on specific issues. I'll match my record of being a conservative on social, economic and national security issues with anyone.

Q: The Democrats are calling the troop increase the Bush-McCain escalation. . .

A: Actually they're calling it the McCain Doctrine. (laughs)

Q: You like that?

A: Not everybody has a doctrine named after them. I've got to say thanks. The MoveOn.org ad, there's a good shot – they are all shots of me with Bush – of me with sunglasses on. I thought it was a pretty good shot.

Q: You're 70 years old now. You would be the oldest president, even older than Reagan. Are you fit enough to be president?

A: I've got more scars than Frankenstein and I'm older than dirt. But I've learned a few things along the way. Last August, I hiked the Grand Canyon rim to rim with my son Jack. We had a great, great hike…it almost killed me. (laughs)

Q: Do you think you have the vigor . . .

A: I work 16-18 hours a day, seven days a week. Ask anybody who has been on one of these trips to Iraq with me. They say I almost kill them - they call it the Death March. I get 'em up early and come back late at night.

Q: How is your family? Are they ready for this?

A: I think so. They're older. They have certain reservations, of course, but we continue the discussion. I think they are favorably inclined, with a lot of concerns of course. Kids in their teens like to lead their own lives.

Q: Romney has come out the gates fast, with lots of endorsements, particularly in Florida. Do you need to pick up the pace to get your campaign up more quickly?

A: We've got a lot of good support down there. We expect that it will increase over time. I'm very happy with where we are.

Giuliani Praises Bush's Iraq Policy, Foresight (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

SACRAMENTO — Republican presidential hopeful Rudolph W. Giuliani praised President Bush's war leadership on Saturday and mocked supporters of a nonbinding congressional resolution condemning the U.S. troop buildup in Iraq.

The former New York City mayor came to Bush's defense as he promoted his White House candidacy at a California Republican convention. Drawing parallels between Iraq and America's Civil War, Giuliani compared Bush's political troubles to Abraham Lincoln's. When the Civil War was unpopular, Giuliani said, Lincoln "kept his eye ahead."

"He was able to say, 'I know my people are frustrated, and I know my people are angry at me.' " But after weighing public opinion, Lincoln had "that ability that a leader has — a leader like George Bush, a leader like Ronald Reagan — to look into the future," Giuliani said.

Giuliani's defense of the currently unpopular president comes as he is portraying himself as a decisive leader unafraid to buck public opinion.

Several potential Republican presidential candidates, including Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney as well as Giuliani, have supported Bush's plan to add more than 20,000 troops to U.S. forces in Iraq.

The major Democratic candidates have opposed the move. Several are senators who have advocated a nonbinding resolution condemning the buildup.

"In the business world, if two weeks were spent on a nonbinding resolution, it would be considered nonproductive," Giuliani told the lunch crowd, setting off a burst of laughter.

He called the concept "a comment without making a decision." America, he added, is "very fortunate to have President Bush."

"Presidents can't do nonbinding resolutions. Presidents have to make decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president that I would like to be, a president who makes decisions."

Giuliani, who takes liberal stands on abortion, guns and gay rights, avoided those issues in his speech to party delegates, many of whom are staunch social conservatives. They warmly applauded him, giving him several standing ovations for a speech that emphasized tough rhetoric on terrorism and repeated invocations of Reagan and other Republican icons.

"The great moral issue of Ronald Reagan's time was defeating communism, and he understood that," said Giuliani, whose national popularity burgeoned after he led New York through the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks. "The great moral issue of our time is defeating terrorism."

Giuliani spent a good deal of time in Sacramento courting Republican lawmakers, part of his early effort to build the foundation of a political operation in California.

The state, long an afterthought in races for parties' presidential nominations, California is likely to play a much larger role in 2008 because lawmakers are on the verge of advancing the state's primary to Feb. 5.

That could benefit Giuliani, since California's Republicans are somewhat more accommodating to socially moderate candidates than those in other states. He plans to spend Monday and Tuesday in California as well, raising money and introducing himself to key voter groups.

Giuliani made the rounds of Republican constituency groups at the convention, attending small meetings of women, Jews, Asian Americans and lawyers.

But he canceled a plan to take questions from members of the conservative California Republican Assembly. The group's president, Mike Spence, called it "your basic snub."

"His problem is that his views on so many issues are out of the mainstream of the Republican Party," Spence said. "He has a lot of explaining to do."

But Bruce L. Bialosky, a moderate Republican fundraiser in Los Angeles, called Giuliani "an excellent candidate" after hearing his speech.

"He can really connect with the American people," Bialosky said.

"America's Mayor" Praises Bush In State GOP Speech (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci, John Wildermuth

San Francisco Chronicle, February 11, 2007

Sacramento -- Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani, arguing that America is in desperate need of a Ronald Reagan-style optimistic vision, told California Republicans on Saturday that he wants to be a president who will "win the world for a set of ideas ... that I believe come from God."

"We're for freedom, we're for the future, and in order to do that, we need leadership that uplifts us and moves us toward the future," Giuliani told the lunchtime crowd at the state GOP convention, all but formally declaring his candidacy for his party's presidential nomination. "You get to decide who that leader is going to be -- and I wish you'd decide on me."

Asked by reporters afterward when he would make a formal announcement of his 2008 presidential campaign, Giuliani joked, "If you listened to my speech, I may have announced it."

Giuliani, who last Monday filed a declaration of candidacy, is considered one of the early favorites in the GOP 2008 presidential contest with Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Giuliani's sold-out, $60-a-head lunch before 800 California Republicans -- with at least another 100 in overflow rooms -- was a hot ticket at the semi-annual GOP gathering at the Hyatt Hotel.

Giuliani's audience was primed for a lovefest: Excited Republicans in the hall jumped to their feet and cheered when scores of young volunteers waving "I (heart) Rudy" signs marched through the room, where the man introduced as "America's mayor" took the stage to the sound of the Clash tune "Rudie Can't Fail."

Giuliani regaled the crowd with self-deprecating stories of his days as a federal prosecutor, moved them with recollections of the horror of the Sept. 11 attacks and delivered an inspirational call to action regarding the nation's current problems. His speech was interrupted repeatedly by applause, cheers of "Rudy! Rudy!" and several standing ovations from the grassroots activists.

In his 45-minute address and in remarks to reporters afterward, Giuliani lavished praise on President Bush, insisting Bush will have "a very strong place in history," in part because of his "very brave and very wise" decision to go after al Qaeda in Afghanistan after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

"We are very fortunate to have President Bush," Giuliani told the Republican delegates. "Presidents ... have to make decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president I would like to be."

Democrats immediately seized on Giuliani's strong defense of the unpopular Republican president, saying it showed the former mayor is out of touch with voters in California and across the nation.

"Giuliani is part of Bush's three stooges," said state Democratic Party strategist Bob Mulholland, who noted that McCain, Romney and Giuliani "all support increasing the troop level in Iraq."

"When you look at (GOP) Senate candidates running away from Bush, you see the presidential candidates all running with Bush," Mulholland said. "It's almost as though they didn't read the (midterm) election results."

Giuliani, 62, a consultant and financier since leaving office, emphasized his qualifications, saying he had been challenged with "having had a job where I didn't have any choice but to decide, and to make decisions and to move things forward."

Giuliani's speech touched on a number of key issues but steered clear of policy details.

Talking about health care, for example, Giuliani seemed to distance himself from Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger's new universal health care proposal by agreeing that while changes must be made, they should happen under the "free market system."

On school reform, he drew some of his biggest cheers when he called for parents to have more local control over where their children go to school.

In education, he said, "the Republican Party is for parents, the Democrats are for bureaucrats."

On immigration, Giuliani stressed the need for border control and called it a matter of national security.

"We need a (border) fence, and a highly technological one."

Giuliani also said he favored a program that would allow illegal immigrants already in the country to earn legal status. He toughened that stance by saying those immigrants should "display the ability to read and write English," and must assimilate into the American culture.

Still, "Giuliani's endorsement of an amnesty program for people in the country here illegally will not be popular among conservative Republicans," said Jon Fleischman, a newly elected official of the state GOP and publisher of FlashReport.org, a popular Republican Web site.

In addition to the volatile immigration issue, the former New York mayor and his backers were quick to deal with the potential problems a pro-choice, pro-gay rights, pro-gun control candidate could have in a California GOP primary.

Giuliani insisted that his many trips to California over the years will put him in a good position should state legislators continue their fast-track effort to move the state's presidential primary up to early February 2008.

An early vote in California "changes the whole nature of the (GOP) primary," he said.

Giuliani has clearly set his sights on beefing up his support in the state.

He had appearances in Southern California just three weeks ago, and has extended his current statewide swing from a scheduled three days to six days.

Sherry Bebitch Jeffe, a political analyst at the University of Southern California, said Giuliani has electrified Republicans in part because "the McCain momentum has flattened."

She says the Arizona senator is increasingly seen as "the author of the (troop) surge, joined at the hip of an unpopular president and an unpopular war."

McCain, for several years, has been the most vocal advocate of increasing troop levels in Iraq as well as a steadfast supporter of the president. He also has been a vigorous backer of Bush's current plan to add 21,500 U.S. troops to the war.

Many delegates at the convention, even stalwart conservatives, said they are willing to overlook some of what they see as Giuliani's political faults because they think he can win the White House in 2008.

"He has the charisma and the vision for our party," she said. "He's upbeat and positive. ... We may have differences with him, but the bottom line is that we are all Republicans."

Giuliani Announces Candidacy, Or Then Again, Maybe Not (NYT)

By Richard Perez-Pena

DOJ_NMG_0130694

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 10 — Rudolph W. Giuliani made it clear Saturday that he was running for president and half-joked that he had just announced. But in keeping with his recent comments, he chose his words coyly and seemed amused by the news media's obsession with his every nudge toward a formal statement.

Referring to the presidential race as he concluded a speech to a convention of the California Republican Party, Mr. Giuliani said: "You get to decide who that leader will be. I wish you'd decide on me." Then he walked away from the podium as surprised delegates asked themselves whether they had just heard a declaration.

Speaking to reporters a short time later, he said, "Yes, I am committed" to the race. Asked when he would formally announce his candidacy, he said: "I don't know. If you go back to my speech, I think I may have. I'm not sure. I think I did, I'm not sure. I don't know what formally means. We'll figure out how to do it in five places where it gets more attention."

Republican activists have complained in recent months that Mr. Giuliani is not following the script for a presidential campaign, and say he was late in assembling a campaign team and starting serious fund-raising. Most recently, they have said he risks alienating supporters if he does not announce his candidacy, as so many others have done.

Mr. Giuliani seems amused by such concerns, and his advisers say his celebrity allows him to go at his own pace, with confidence that the support and the money he needs will follow.

Mr. Giuliani got a more enthusiastic reception here than he has from Republican party gatherings in most parts of the country. The lunch audience of 800 people — more than the banquet hall at the Grand Hyatt could accommodate, and several hundred more than turned out the night before for Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger — repeatedly interrupted him with standing ovations.

"It's an overwhelming response," said Allan Hoffenblum, a onetime Republican consultant who publishes the California Target Book, a political newsletter. "He is clearly the biggest star for these people. But don't be fooled, most of them are holding their fire." They are probably leaning toward Senator John McCain or Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts governor, Mr. Hoffenblum said.

That was borne out by interviews with dozens of delegates who said they were to Mr. Giuliani's right, especially on social issues. They spoke glowingly — even emotionally — about him, but most said they were not sure they could support him.

"There's no shortage of feeling for him, and he gets really high marks on competence and leadership," said Representative Doug Ose, Republican of California, who has not taken sides in the race. "But so have the other two."

State Assemblyman Ted Gaines endorsed Mr. Giuliani on Friday, although, he said, "I'm more conservative than he is." Mr. Gaines said he was swayed by the thought of who would lead the country through another terrorist attack.

Mr. Giuliani gave one of his most partisan speeches since the November election. He compared himself repeatedly to Ronald Reagan, as unassailable a figure as there is in this crowd, and effusively praised President Bush.

Mr. Giuliani also took a rare series of shots at Congress, describing it as a group of people who could not take sides on difficult issues.

"Presidents have to take decisions and move the country forward, and that's the kind of president I would like to be: a president who makes decisions," he said.

Giuliani Strikes A Note With California GOP (WP)

By John Pomfret

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

SACRAMENTO, Feb. 10 -- Rudolph W. Giuliani came west to learn whether his brand of Republican politics has a chance among party members significantly more conservative than himself. By the time he had received a fourth standing ovation Saturday at the California Republican Party convention, the answer seemed clear.

Equating the U.S. fight against terrorism with the Civil War and the Cold War, Giuliani told about 750 of his party's faithful that failure in Iraq would turn that country into a "massive headquarters for terrorism."

"Having had a job where I didn't have any choice but to make a decision," the former mayor of New York said, "prepares you as best you can be prepared to be the president of the United States."

Asked in a subsequent news conference when he would formally announce his candidacy for president, Giuliani quipped: "If you go back to my speech, I think you'll find one. We'll figure out how to do it in five places so we'll get more attention."

As mayor during the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Giuliani gained worldwide recognition for his leadership in the face of a tragic disaster, propelling the former federal prosecutor onto the national political stage. Giuliani leads the polls in the race for the Republican nomination.

Nevertheless, the Brooklyn-born son of an ex-convict has significant obstacles in his quest to become president.

He has been in the private sector for six years; he still supports the war while the rest of the country is shifting against it; he would be only the second Roman Catholic to win the White House; and his social views -- he is pro-choice, pro-gun-control and pro-gay-rights -- are at odds with those of much of his party.

Still, Giuliani's sometimes meandering, 45-minute speech was received warmly by party enthusiasts, a marked contrast to the tepid response they gave Friday night to their own Republican governor, Arnold Schwarzenegger.

Giuliani called for a broadening of the war on terrorism into a war of ideology similar to the ideological battle of the Cold War between the West and the Soviet Union.

"A much bigger part is about ideas," he said, and "the hearts and minds of people. We've got to get better at selling our life, our economy."

Giuliani, 62, did not shy away from the controversial positions that have put him at loggerheads with some party faithful. He praised President Bush numerous times, at one point seemingly comparing him to Abraham Lincoln. In the news conference, Giuliani said the United States is "very, very fortunate" to have Bush as president, crediting his decision to consider preemptive strikes against potential enemies as "very, very brave."

"I believe that President Bush has a very, very strong place in history," Giuliani said.

Giuliani also waded into the issue of illegal immigration. Many California Republicans consider it one of the nation's most important issues, and a significant portion do not support any program to grant citizenship to long-term illegal residents. Giuliani, however, said that he supports plans to "allow people to earn status" and that he wants to create a way for U.S. industries to find workers.

Many in the audience said they are aware of the gaps between their views and Giuliani's. Nonetheless, several who were interviewed seemed willing to give him a break.

"I'm a Christian, and his views on a lot of social issues are to the left of mine," said Larry Stirling, a retired state superior court judge from San Diego. "But if you have to make a trade-off, I'll make the trade-off for Giuliani. He's been through a trial by fire. He's got gravitas. The first thing a president has to do is protect us. The rest is a secondary consideration."

Giuliani's speech "hit the right tone and the right messages," said Kevin C. Eckery, a Sacramento-based Republican political consultant. "He managed to be true to himself and connect with an audience that is more conservative than he is. It shows he can do it."

California could play a critical role in Giuliani's strategy for winning the nomination. In the past, the GOP nomination was wrapped up before California. But the state legislature is considering a measure to change the primary to Feb. 5, shortly after contests in Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada and South Carolina.

"California's Republicans are conservative, but not as conservative as Iowans or those in South Carolina," said Allan Hoffenblum, a Los Angeles-based Republican political strategist. Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), another GOP front-runner, might be a closer ideological fit for California Republicans than Giuliani, but, Hoffenblum said, "some of them just don't like him."

"Giuliani is by no means a shoo-in," Hoffenblum said, "but if a streak of pragmatism hits traditionally conservative voters, he's got a chance."

Romney, Brownback Makes Pitches To Michigan Republicans (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS, Michigan (AP) — Republicans Mitt Romney, son of a Michigan governor, and Sam Brownback promoted their presidential campaigns Saturday before nearly 3,000 party activists at their state convention.

Romney reminded the crowd that he grew up sharing the Automotive News each morning with his father, George, who headed American Motors Corp. before becoming Michigan's governor from 1963-69.

The younger Romney, himself a former Massachusetts governor, said his father brought many of the lessons he learned from business to the governorship.

"He got Michigan moving again," Romney said, before running through his stands opposing abortion, favoring the restriction of marriage to a man and a woman and backing controls on illegal immigration. "It's time for Republican principles to come back to Michigan again."

Brownback, the Kansas senator who is running as the conservative heart of the party, earned a warm reception with his pledges to protect life and the traditional family.

He also called for wiping out cancer in 10 years and for putting more resources into alternative energy.

"Michigan is going to be a key state in getting that done," he said, noting its efforts to encourage the production of ethanol and biodiesel.

FRONTENAC – Former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, now a presidential hopeful, sought to seal the deal Saturday with many of Missouri's top Republicans by emphasizing his values and vision.

His values include requiring that U.S. schools teach only in English, opposing gay marriage, and guarding the nation against the "Jihadists" who are "intent in causing our entire collapse."

His vision: "We are the hope of this world, and we always will be."

Romney laid out those points, and more, to an enthusiastic crowd of Republicans attending the state party's annual Lincoln Day festivities, held this weekend at the Frontenac Hilton.

Romney's aim: to portray himself as the best mix of conservative values and proven government experience. Earlier, Romney told reporters that any presidential candidate must appeal to Missouri voters because "Missouri is part of the heartland of America and the heartland ultimately decides who the nominee will be."

Romney's message — that the conservative changes he brought to Massachusetts can help the country— fit in with the "reform" message that Lincoln Day speakers emphasized as their party's best hope for wooing back Missouri voters in 2008. Republicans didn't fare so well last fall, when Democrats won both statewide contests, for U.S. senator and state auditor.

Speaker after speaker on Saturday promised to press for dramatic Republican initiatives in Missouri, such as:

·Lt. Gov. Peter Kinder's call for the Legislature "to redouble our efforts to pass a scholarship tax credit'' program so that parents could get a tax break to send their children to any public or private school." He said that was the best way the state could help the city of St. Louis' troubled school system.

·House Speaker Rod Jetton's promise to make English the official language in Missouri. The designation, he said, would offer schools the option to drop programs for children who don't speak English, end the publication of state documents in Spanish, and ease mandates that courts have interpreters for non-English speakers charged with crimes.

·U.S. Sen. Christopher "Kit" Bond's support of proposals to end the state's non-partisan court plan of assembling panels of nominees for governors to fill positions on the supreme and appellate courts and of trial courts in St. Louis, St. Louis County and three Kansas City area counties. Bond, a former governor, said he agrees with Gov. Matt Blunt that the panels too often only have Democratic-leaning choices. The Federalist Society, a group of conservative lawyers, is pushing for changes.

Romney's visit — three days before his official kickoff — was aimed largely at bolstering the substantial GOP ties he's already forged in Missouri. Gov. Matt Blunt is leading Romney's outreach to other governors, while former U.S. Sen. Jim Talent, R-Mo., is a Romney policy advisor.

State Democratic Party spokesman Jack Cardetti that the Blunt-Romney alliance "shows that politics makes for strange bedfellows. Mitt Romney is known for expanding health care in his state, while Matt Blunt is known for slashing it in Missouri."

Talent praised Romney and Blunt as strong leaders willing to confront tough problems. Talent was among several at Lincoln Days who compared Romney to former President Ronald Reagan. "He's created consensus behind big ideas," Talent said of Romney. "He's a person of hope, a person who wants to persuade rather than polarize."

But not everyone is ready to jump on board. Bond said he had no plans at the moment to endorse any Republican presidential contender. Lt. Gov. Peter Kinder said the same thing.

State Treasurer Sarah Steelman, who co-chaired U.S. Sen. John McCain's presidential bid in 2000, remains on the fence about helping the Arizona Republican or any presidential hopeful in 2008.

U.S. Rep. Todd Akin, R-Town and Country, said he was intrigued by Romney and wanted to hear more from him. Akin said he likes the social conservative views of U.S. Sen. Sam Brownback — who's headlining St. Louis County Republicans Lincoln Day dinner March 10 — but wasn't sure if he had a chance.

The congressman added that he was cool towards McCain. Akin said he also had concerns about former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani because he had been married three times.

However, several St. Louis area Republicans informally polled Saturday in the hotel's halls indicated, privately or publicly, that they leaned towards Giuliani. Said former state Sen. Betty Sims, R-Ladue: "He has more of a vision of the future, and understands the effects of terrorism."

Jetton, the state House speaker, told Missouri Republicans that -- regardless of who get the party's nod for president -- they may face election trouble at home in 2008. At least 18 House Republican seats "are in jeopardy,'' Jetton said. A loss of eight would put Democrats back in control.

A Massachusetts Conservative (BOS)

By David Greenberg
The Boston Globe, February 11, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130697

Well before Senator John F. Kerry went windsurfing in 2004, the failed presidential bids of Michael Dukakis and Paul Tsongas had all but doomed Massachusetts Democrats seeking the White House. In former governor Mitt Romney, however, a new kind of Bay State presidential aspirant is now taking the national stage: A conservative Republican who tacked to the center to get elected statewide and now courts the Christian right to win his party's nomination. If the "Massachusetts liberal" has become a national punch line, what of the "Massachusetts conservative"?

In fact, though he's not well remembered today, there was a Massachusetts conservative who not only won the presidency but enjoyed phenomenal popularity throughout his tenure: former governor Calvin Coolidge. Mitt Romney could do worse than to study his example.

The 30th president may strike some as an unlikely source of inspiration. His reputation today is that of the ineffectual "Silent Cal" -- the taciturn, hands-off executive who chomped a cigar while America spent and gambled its way into the Depression. Or he's remembered as the business-friendly exponent of "trickle-down" economics who embodied a fading set of Victorian values such as thrift, industry, and self-reliance that even during his tenure in the 1920s seemed a throwback to bygone times.

Indeed, in recent years, Coolidge's admirers have included mainly diehard conservatives, such as the columnist Robert Novak (who ranks him as his second favorite president), the folks at the Heritage Foundation (who recently screened the first ever Coolidge documentary), and -- no surprise -- Ronald Reagan, who cribbed from Coolidge's speeches and hung his portrait in the Cabinet Room.

The popular image of Coolidge -- of personal reticence and political restraint -- isn't wrong. Five-foot-nine and slender, with wispy sandy hair and a pallid complexion, Coolidge had bony features and a downturned line of a mouth that gave him an air of sternness.

Coolidge's restrained demeanor and personality also expressed a restrained philosophy of governance. He believed in a minimal federal state and a relatively inactive presidency. Deeply attached to his native 19th-century Vermont, he espoused its Yankee mores of piety and parsimony long after they had come to strike many Americans as anachronistic.

Yet to dismiss Coolidge as a vestige of olden days is to overlook his contributions to American politics. Coolidge in fact straddled two ages. Leading the nation during what the sociologists Robert and Helen Lynd, authors of the pioneering sociological study "Middletown," called "one of the eras of greatest rapidity in change in the history of human institutions," Coolidge silently blessed the go-go consumption of the 1920s, even as he shared widespread fears about moral decay.

By epitomizing old-fashioned values -- showing that they could thrive amid the kinetic consumerism -- Coolidge sanctified the so-called "New Era." He offered the public, wrote Walter Lippmann, a "Puritanism de luxe, in which it is possible to praise all the classic virtues while continuing to enjoy all the modern conveniences."

Coolidge was wildly popular in his time and broke ground in self-consciously governing not just as the head of his party or the leader of a particular faction, but as president of all the people. His image -- as sensible and modest, upright and prudent, a uniter and not a divider -- allowed different political groups to see him as one of their own. In 2008, with voters newly wary of ideological zeal, such a Coolidgean strategy just might show the way to the GOP nomination -- and offer Republicans their best shot at holding the White House.

"The chief business of America is business," runs Coolidge's best known aphorism -- and to be sure, his appreciation of 20th-century novelties included, foremost, a respect for the fruits of capitalism. But Coolidge's embrace of modernity revealed itself in subtler ways, including a new style of politics and governance in which candidates were replacing parties as the focus of voters' loyalties.

In the 19th century, politicians ascended through service to their party machinery, voters identified much more deeply as Democrats or Republicans than they do today, and there were few independents. Congress, seen as the people's representatives, set the agenda in Washington more than the president. But in the new century, as Lippmann noted, decisions were being "made by the interaction, not of Congress and the executive, but of public opinion and the executive." Theodore Roosevelt and Woodrow Wilson relied on their own outsized personalities as much as on partisan appeals. They ran for office -- and governed -- by appealing through the new mass media to the still-novel concept of public opinion (still then measured in primitive ways).

Coolidge, too, governed mainly through what Campbell Bascom Slemp, the conservative Virginia congressman whom the president hired as his chief aide, called "direct reliance upon the mass of the people." Holding the presidency when radio, newsreels, and photography were transforming political communication, the tremendously popular Coolidge -- despite his famous silence -- learned to speak directly to the public. According to his vice president, Charles Dawes, "The popularity of Coolidge is due to the fact that he, not [Congress], best understood the people and they him."

What Coolidge understood about the people in the 1920s was their aversion to ideological crusades. In politics as well as personality, he embodied a moderation that fit his age.

This moderation was in evidence from early on in his career, when he began ascending the ladder of Massachusetts state politics. As a legislator, lieutenant governor, and in his two years as governor, he leavened his trademark fiscal discipline with progressive elements that accommodated the popular desire for reform. He vetoed bills to raise legislators' salaries by 50 percent, to upgrade the Boston ferry, and to widen a South Boston thoroughfare. Yet he backed measures to improve working conditions, regulate landlords, fund reforestation projects, and control outdoor advertising. His greatest feat as governor -- restructuring the state government by consolidating more than 100 agencies into fewer than 20 -- married the efficiency of progressivism to small-government conservatism.

It was Coolidge's role in the 1919 Boston police strike that made him a national figure. When cops walked off the job one September night and rioting broke out -- causing much property damage and taking several lives -- Coolidge backed the police commissioner's decision to fire the strikers. "There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time," he wrote to the labor leader Samuel Gompers. The message, cannily released to the press, was classic Coolidge, neatly articulating a common-sense wisdom with a tautness that made it ripe for repetition in newspapers, newsreels, and conversation.

Due to this stringent stand, many historians assumed Coolidge to be a troglodyte on labor issues. But earlier in his term he had helped placate Boston's aggrieved streetcar workers, and in 1912 as a state senator he had mediated a major textile strike in Lawrence. Even his stance on the police strike was widely deemed reasonable, shared by President Wilson, for one, whose said the officers' abdication of their "sacred and direct" duty amounted to "a crime against civilization."

After handily winning reelection in 1919 -- Massachusetts governors then served one-year terms -- Coolidge was hailed as a presidential candidate. Fueling the talk was journalist and public relations man Bruce Barton, a founder of the advertising firm BBD&O, who sculpted the governor's image as the quiet, common-sensical moderate. "The radicals and reactionaries fill the newspapers, but the great majority of Americans are neither radicals nor reactionaries," Barton wrote in Collier's, in the first of many paeans to Coolidge. "They are middle-of-the-road folks who own their own homes and work hard....Coolidge belongs with that crowd."

Barton promoted Coolidge at the 1920 Republican convention. Though his effort failed -- the handsome, undistinguished Ohio Senator Warren G. Harding got the nod on the tenth ballot -- a spontaneous outcry by floor delegates made Coolidge vice president virtually by acclamation. Whereas Harding was famously picked in the old manner, by power-brokers amid swirling cigar smoke, Coolidge acceded in the newer fashion -- by publicity and direct appeals.

When Harding died of a heart attack in August 1923, Coolidge was visiting his father's farmhouse in Plymouth Notch, Vt. -- a tiny hamlet nestled in the Green Mountains where he was raised. The news of the president's passing reached the farm after midnight, and Coolidge was sworn in as president -- by his father, a notary public -- in a small parlor by the glow of a kerosene lamp. Had Coolidge and Barton planned the scene, they couldn't have devised more propitious atmospherics: The spare, rural tableau exuded the New England virtues of simplicity, piety, and duty that Coolidge had long traded on in cultivating his image. The tone for his presidency was set.

Soon after taking over from the late Harding, Coolidge moved to contain the executive-branch corruption scandals -- soon to be lumped under the umbrella term "Teapot Dome" -- that were just surfacing. After some missteps, he named a bipartisan pair of special prosecutors, unloaded tainted Cabinet members, and voiced a pitch-perfect note of condemnation to reassure the public that justice was being done. In contrast to the stench of the Harding pols, Coolidge seemed a breath of fresh Vermont air.

But while Coolidge distanced himself from the sleaze of the so-called "Ohio Gang," he maintained his bona fides with the business world in other ways -- showing his ability to unify most of the diverse elements within the fractious GOP. With Wall Street, Coolidge stayed right by imposing few constraints on business, presiding over a new laxness at regulatory agencies, and, when additional agencies were called for -- such as the Federal Radio Commission, needed to oversee the rapidly growing broadcasting industry -- he blessed an emerging regime that favored the leading commercial networks.

Though many liberals viewed Coolidge as a stooge of business, he retained support from several of the GOP's Progressives -- the former acolytes of Roosevelt who continued to prefer enlightened government activism to raw laissez-faire. Coolidge walked a similar tightrope on cultural issues. On the one hand, he made known his distaste for the decadence of the youth culture and flouters of Prohibition, earning jeers from the era's "smart set." But his public stands on the day's moral controversies convinced most Americans that he was no zealot.

Coolidge shared none of the bigotry of the revived Ku Klux Klan -- though he never mustered a rousing denunciation of the noxious fraternity, even when 40,000 robed members marched by the White House in 1925. He spoke nobly about toleration and religious diversity in America -- even while signing into law immigration restrictions that kept out Southern and Eastern Europeans. He quietly opposed the prosecution of John Scopes for teaching evolution in a Tennessee school, and he supported anti-lynching laws, although he did so with such tepidness that they never passed. Overall Coolidge kept himself out of debilitating controversies, exuding an air of morality but not alienating voters with moralism.

It was a strength, not a weakness, that within his own party Coolidge occupied no clear niche. "He is not easy to classify as either a conservative or a progressive -- the two major lines of political division," noted Bascom Slemp. His personality, not his party or even his platform, commended him to voters. "I have not met anybody who is going to vote for the Republican Party," Barton said in 1924. "They are going to vote 'for Coolidge' or against him."

Clearly, 2008 is not 1924. Too much has changed -- in the nature of the parties, in the values of Americans, in the issues facing the country -- for Coolidge's model to provide any neat formula for presidential candidates today. But it's clear the Republicans will be seeking a new direction. The ideological adventures of the current administration seem to have discredited, with a majority of the public, the brand of hard-line conservatism espoused by George W. Bush in the last two presidential elections, the Newt Gingrich Congress of the 1990s, and even Ronald Reagan in the 1980s (though his genial and folksy -- not to say Coolidgean -- talk of traditional values still bestirs his many admirers).

GOP voters may be looking for a Coolidge-like figure who can espouse the party's traditional pro-business creed without evoking fears of corruption, someone who can project old-fashioned values without prompting anxieties about the power of religious conservatives. Thus John McCain burnishes a trans-partisan, good-government aura. Rudolph Giuliani styles himself a football coach for the nation. Even Romney, when he's not wooing the Christian right, trades on his pre-Big Dig reputation of can-do competence. For one of these men, the forsaken mantle of Calvin Coolidge is waiting to be taken up.

David Greenberg, a professor of history and of journalism and media studies at Rutgers University, is the author of "Calvin Coolidge," recently published by Henry Holt, and "Nixon's Shadow: The History of an Image" (2003).

Profit And Public Health (WP)

THE DEBATE over requiring girls to receive a shot against a sexually transmitted virus that sometimes causes cervical cancer should be about what's in the best interests of these young women. It should not be about the interests of the maker of the vaccine. Regrettably, the two are being confused thanks to a lobbying effort undertaken across the country by Merck & Co. on behalf of its new product.

Merck makes Gardasil, the vaccine approved by the Food and Drug Administration as effective against strains of the human papillomavirus (HPV) leading to most cases of cervical cancer. Merck also, according to reports by the Associated Press and Baltimore Sun, is helping to finance efforts across the nation to persuade states to make the vaccine mandatory for all girls. It has had success in Texas, where Gov. Rick Perry (R) issued an executive order requiring the vaccine, and in Virginia, where bills have passed both houses of the General Assembly. Merck's involvement in Texas has become particularly controversial because Mr. Perry's former chief of staff now lobbies for the company and because the governor has ties to a national women's advocacy group that is active in the campaign and also receives funding from Merck. Mr. Perry's unilateral action cut the legislature, and by extension the public, out of any discussion of the issues and is likely to make public compliance with his policy more difficult.

Merck officials say that they are simply promoting policies that benefit public health: What's more benign than a vaccine able to prevent cancer? We don't disagree either about the efficacy of the vaccine, which the FDA says has been demonstrated in extensive tests, or the argument for its widespread use. There is, though, something unseemly about a company that stands to make billions of dollars driving a debate that already is sensitive because it involves young girls, sex and parental rights. Merck's commercial interests unnecessarily muddy the waters and give critics ammunition with which to attack worthwhile legislation. Indeed, in Maryland the sponsor of such a bill recently pulled the measure after reports surfaced about Merck's lobbying.

The best move Merck can now make is to back off. Happily, that's not necessary in the District, where the only role Merck has played has appropriately been to provide information in response to questions from D.C. Council members. Virginia is a different matter. Sen. Janet D. Howell (D-Fairfax) and Del. Phillip A. Hamilton (R-Newport News), sponsors of bills that passed in the respective houses, are right to push for Virginia to take the lead in fighting cervical cancer. But Merck's help needlessly clouds the issue. While continuing to promote their initiative, the legislators might want to think about how they can bolster public confidence. Returning campaign contributions would be a good step.

Who's Afraid Of The New Economy? (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Once, there was a bridge to the 21st century. But no major Democrat today speaks as confidently about globalization and technological change as Bill Clinton and Al Gore did a decade ago. No major Democrat today speaks as optimistically about free trade as Gordon Brown does in Britain.

DOJ_NMG_0130700

In the Democratic Party today, neopopulists and economic nationalists are on the rise. The free-traders are on the defensive. The Democratic view of the global economy has grown unremittingly grim. When John Edwards talks about the economy, you think he's running for the Democratic nomination of 1932.

Which is why the report to be released tomorrow by the Democratic activist group Third Way is so remarkable. Here is a group of Democratic economists and strategists who are taking on the rising neopopulists.

The first thing their report, "The New Rules Economy," does is challenge the neopopulist depiction of economic reality. Neopopulists are good at describing the suffering in towns like Mansfield, Ohio, and Flint, Mich. But they act as if they've never been to Charlotte or Phoenix, where office parks are shooting up.

The authors of this report, Anne Kim, Adam Solomon, Jim Kessler and Stephen Rose, try to blend all the diverse pieces of American reality, and to expose what they call "the myths of neopopulism."

The first myth, they write, is the myth of the failing middle class. It's true there are more households headed by young and old people, who tend to have lower incomes. But if you take households headed by people in their prime working years, 25 to 59, you find those people are not failing. Their median income is $61,000. If they are married, their median income is $72,000. Those are decent incomes in most parts of the country.

Moreover, their living standards are not stagnant. Between 1979 and 2005, the percentage of prime-age households making over $100,000 in current dollars rose by 12.7 percentage points. As Ben Bernanke, the Fed chairman, said last week, incomes at all levels are rising; it's just that incomes at the upper end are rising much faster.

The Third Way authors also dispute recent warnings of wildly increasing income volatility. The main reason incomes have grown more volatile over the past decades is motherhood, they write. As women play a more significant role in the economy, their movements in and out of the labor force to care for children increase volatility.

The report goes on to challenge the direst warnings about rising credit card debt (household assets have risen faster than debts), rising corporate profits (they are cyclical and pretty much normal for this stage in a recovery) and American decline.

The Third Way authors are not saying everything is hunky-dory — far from it — but they are saying Democrats tend to lose when they are relentlessly grim and when the reality they describe is detached from the reality most Americans experience.

Moreover, they are restating the truth neopopulists are loath to admit: that no nation on earth is better positioned to take advantage of an ever-more-open economy, and today's challenge is not to retard openness but enable more people to take part in it.

The second half of the report describes how government can help people adjust to the new economic rules. Frankly, I wish the authors had been a bit more creative here, asking, for example, why so many people don't heed the huge incentives to finish high school and college. There are deeper mental and cultural processes in play than can be dealt with by the usual mix of tax credits.

Still, the significance of the report is that at least some Democrats have the guts to take on the neopopulists, who are masters of vilification.

In fact, their political method is based on vilification over explanation. They vilify unpatriotic executives, but the vast majority of job losses are caused by technological change, not outsourcing. They vilify overpaid C.E.O.'s, even though their pay packages have nothing to do with the stagnant wages of the unskilled. They vilify foreign governments for not living up to the rules of "fair trade," even though developing countries could enforce every labor and environmental regulation under the sun and their workers would still be cheaper for low-skill tasks.

The neopopulist caucus in the Democratic Party is like the anti-immigrant caucus in the Republican Party. Both speak for loud and angry minorities who have been hurt by globalization. But the party that mistakes their experience for the central reality will doom itself for years to come.

Unmasking Our Pain In New Orleans (WP)

By Lolis Eric Elie

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

The rush begins approximately right now. Even as I write this, thousands of Americans are packing away their inhibitions and preparing to come to my city and go native. They will arrive in the French Quarter uninhibited, as they imagine we are. They will remove their clothes. They will empty their beer-filled guts onto each other's shoes. They will clown for hungry cameras and for journalists eager to capture New Orleans as some distant editor has imagined it. Invariably, the networks will set up their shots in the French Quarter, though none of the major parades and few of the emblematic Carnival activities take place there. Neither the journalists nor the revelers seem to care that our lives, local lives, are elsewhere.

For us, Mardi Gras is family time. We gather on our favorite corners to watch parades with parents and cousins and picnic lunches prepared by grandmothers (then) or bought from fast-food dispensaries (now). We don masks. We drink. We dance. We drink. We yell loudly. We drink. This we do, ever aware that the people on our right and on our left are the same people we will see during more sober times at work, school and church.

America would recognize us in family mode, but we may never be seen that way. Hurricane Katrina confirmed for now, and perhaps forever, the sense that New Orleans is a foreign place attached to the United States by geography, but distant from it in every meaningful way. We are more European, more African, less serious. And we lack the good sense God gave a goose. Why else would we raise our kids among girls gone wild in a hurricane magnet of a city that lies largely below sea level?

When Hurricane Katrina hit, our nation offered us sympathy. Millions of Americans accepted us into their cities. They sent 18-wheelers heavy with goodwill and provisions. Others came here, donned hazard suits and helped us. But I fear this compassion is wearing thin. It has been nearly 18 months. By now, the thinking goes, real Americans, self-reliant Americans, would have picked themselves up by their stiff upper lips and gotten on with life. They wouldn't be waiting for a government check. They would rebuild their homes and their lives with money and fortitude held in reserve.

My mother is a real American. Her difficulties have been minor compared with the setbacks suffered by others in our city. She's 72 years old. A decade ago, she moved into a new house she chose specifically because she thought it was on high, safe ground. She put her all into renovating and decorating it. On Aug. 29, 2005, it was inundated by four feet of water. Her blood pressure began to rise. Her borderline diabetes crept across the border. A pain developed in her left leg. Like many ailments these days, hers seemed stress induced.

From her sister's home in Dallas, she rebuilt. The first contractor she hired disappeared with the down payment. The first doctor said the back pain would go away. The first call to an insurance office put her in touch with a Ms. Bear. From her office somewhere in America, Ms. Bear insisted that my mother could just knock the insulation and roofing materials to the side and sleep in the filth of her waterlogged bed. That's what a Bear would do.

The second contractor was moving quickly among his various jobs, but slowly on my mother's house. Then he developed cancer and stopped moving much at all. (Was it his men who stole the ladder and the toilet and broke that glass table we'd carefully salvaged?) The second doctor recommended back surgery. The insurance company asked for more photos. Several doctors, two chiropractors, one surgery, a dozen letters and scores of phone calls later, my mother is back in her house. About a quarter of her neighbors have returned.

It's lonely there. My mother speaks to her friends long-distance.

Somehow, when people look at us and our city, they don't see my mother. They see the desperate brown faces at the Superdome or hear the otherly accented voices from St. Bernard Parish. They don't see the old man in the Lower Ninth Ward, gutting his house by day and sleeping in it by night because he has nowhere else to stay. They don't see the families cramped in trailers because they have nowhere else to live. They don't see the fishermen in Plaquemines Parish begging to get back to work. Those men need government help to move their boats from the land, where the floodwaters left them, back to the bayous, where they can again ply their trade. That's not the kind of work the Federal Emergency Management Agency is allowed to do.

In the immediate aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, the federal government did a terrible job. No doubt about that. Americans stranded on roofs. Americans without food and water. People in war-ravaged, dysfunctional nations looking at us on television saw that our country could be just as dysfunctional as their own. Domestic politics demanded that our misery be seen as the result either of Democratic Great Society programs or Republican social Darwinism. In fact, neither was apt.

Make no mistake -- the devastation in New Orleans and southern Louisiana was a government-enabled disaster. The U.S. Army Corps of Engineers designed and built the levees and floodwalls that were supposed to protect us. The failure of these structures resulted in the devastation of our city. This is not the crank conspiracy theory of angry New Orleanians. This is the conclusion that the Corps reached in a 6,600-page report, released June 1.

Hurricane Katrina was no more than a Category 2 storm when it hit New Orleans. The levees and floodwalls were supposed to be able to withstand a Category 3 storm. The Corps acknowledged that the flood-control system was badly designed and badly built. "For the first time the corps has had to stand up and say we had a catastrophic failure with one of our projects," said Lt. Gen. Carl Strock, the commander of the Corps.

You may expect that an admission by a government agency that its poor work was responsible for the destruction of an American city would have been big news. But the story of the Corps' admission, released on a Thursday, didn't live long enough to make the Sunday talk shows. The confession was irrelevant. The nation had already concluded that the death of New Orleans was a suicide caused by our irrational desire to live in harm's way.

This blame-New-Orleans attitude has been devastating for us. Though Louisiana suffered far more damage per capita than did Mississippi, our neighbor to the east has received a disproportionate share of federal funding. But neither of us was treated fairly. Six weeks after the storm, Congress passed legislation allowing low-interest loans for Gulf Coast communities to use to pay public employees. But the White House and the Republican leadership in Congress specifically required that the money be paid back, even though such federal disaster loans have generally been forgiven for the past three decades. "Notwithstanding section 417 of the Stafford Act, such loans may not be canceled," the offending passage reads.

In its zeal to punish Louisiana for sins that are largely not of our own making, the federal government has twisted our national priorities so radically as to render them unrecognizable. In this era when homeland security is the nation's paramount concern, there is no enthusiasm for protecting American land along the coast of Louisiana. For the past several decades, we've lost an average of 24 square miles of territory every year. About 40 percent of U.S. wetlands are in Louisiana, but my state experiences 80 percent of the nation's coastal wetlands loss. This loss is crucial to us because hurricanes lose strength when traveling over this land and are thus less powerful when they reach populated areas. Fewer wetlands means more hurricane damage.

Two years ago, before Katrina, the Corps of Engineers and the state of Louisiana estimated that it would take $14 billion to stem the tide of coastal erosion. In December, the lame-duck Congress allocated 34 percent of the federal oil royalties collected off our shores to Louisiana to combat coastal erosion. But we won't get the full amount for 17 years. For the next decade, we will receive about $20 million a year to combat a $14 billion problem.

The latest forecast by coastal experts gives us about 10 years to restore the territory that has been lost south of New Orleans. If we fail to do that, those communities will have to be written off in a couple of decades.

If, say, Cuba or Venezuela had seized 24 square miles of American territory, the call to arms would have been immediate and decisive. But because coastal erosion is an enemy neither foreign nor domestic, we seem willing to surrender to it. We've retreated behind the excuse that New Orleans can't be saved. We've abandoned our can-do pride. In the Netherlands, the Dutch have managed to craft a flood-control system that protects the huge percentage of that nation's land that lies below sea level. These days Americans lack the money, the ingenuity, the patriotism, the humanity of the Dutch.

Much of the wealth of Louisiana lies in our culture. This is the state that gave the nation jazz and Louis Armstrong, Jerry Lee Lewis and Fats Domino. We created two of the nation's signature regional cuisines, Creole and Cajun. Our architecture is some of the oldest and most distinguished in the nation. But it seems that our country views our culture not as a national treasure worth saving, but as further evidence that we are not real Americans at all. But this view could change.

Earlier this month the Corps released the locations of 122 levees that are at risk of failing. They are located in 27 states and the District of Columbia. We New Orleanians have suffered much in the past 18 months. We wouldn't wish such devastation on anyone. But I would like to remind my nation that according to this list, the problems of my home town are not so foreign after all.

I may seem like a foreigner to you when I scream for an independent commission to study government failures in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina, or when I decry the plodding incompetence of FEMA. I may seem like the stereotypical welfare cheat when I argue that the federal government has not invested nearly enough in protecting my state from an even greater future disaster. Indeed, mine may seem like a voice emanating from a distant Southern wilderness. But in truth, the problems of Louisiana are the problems of the United States.

Or, as Ralph Ellison wrote, "Who knows but that, on the lower frequencies, I speak for you?"

Putin Hits U.S. Over Unilateral Practices (WP)

By Thomas E. Ricks, Craig Whitlock

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 10 -- Russian President Vladimir Putin, in some of his harshest criticism of the United States since he took office seven years ago, said Saturday that Washington's unilateral, militaristic approach had made the world a more dangerous place than at any time during the Cold War.

"The United States has overstepped its national borders in every way," he said in an address at an annual international security conference here. "Nobody feels secure anymore, because nobody can take safety behind the stone wall of international law."

Putin criticized the expansion of NATO, saying the alliance's placement of military forces on Russia's borders reduces "the level of mutual trust." He said the U.S. desire to place antimissile systems in Eastern Europe could further upset the international balance of power and embolden the United States in its foreign policy decisions.

The Russian president defended his country's arms sales to Iran as a way of reaching out to that Middle Eastern power, which is under pressure from the United States and Europe to curtail its nuclear program. Russia has supplied some air defense weapons to Iran because, he said, "we don't want Iran to feel cornered."

Dozens of foreign and defense ministers and other officials, including U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and an American congressional delegation, attended the meeting. An Iranian nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, also was present and is scheduled to address the conference Sunday after Gates speaks.

Several U.S. politicians in attendance sharply criticized Putin's remarks, which Russia specialists said were familiar in their assertiveness but unusual in their hostility toward the United States.

The White House also reacted strongly. "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments," spokesman Gordon Johndroe said in a statement. "His accusations are wrong. We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

The back-and-forth underscored the recent stark changes in U.S.-Russian relations. The friendship that was struck when President Bush first met Putin and said he had looked into the former KGB colonel's soul in 2001 has soured as the Kremlin suppressed political opposition at home, used its energy resources to pressure its neighbors and split with the White House over Iraq, Iran and other issues.

Bush has grown increasingly disaffected with Putin and occasionally tried to prod him to recommit to democracy and better relations with his neighbors, only to be rebuffed. Bush has been reluctant to force a more direct confrontation out of worry that it would push Putin further from the West and because he needs Russia's help to pressure Iran to abandon its nuclear program.

In recent days, top Bush administration officials have met in Washington with Garry Kasparov, the former chess grandmaster who has emerged as a leading figure in Russia's marginalized political opposition. Kasparov has said that he advised the officials that lecturing Russia on democracy can be counterproductive but that they should not pretend Putin is one of them, either. "That's why I say, 'Don't interfere, just don't support Putin,' " Kasparov said.

Putin has said that U.S. criticism of his rollback of democracy stems from a Cold War mentality, and he has long opposed the U.S. operation in Iraq. But his remarks here seemingly were not prompted by any particular provocation.

In a tone that was more a considered lecture than a Khrushchevian dais-thumper, Putin said Russia would pursue an independent foreign policy. "We are not going to change this tradition today."

Putin called on the West to resist pushing Russia to be more democratic and more respectful of human rights. "Russia is constantly being taught democracy, and the people who try to teach it don't want to learn it themselves," he said.

Putin ended his critique of the post-Cold War world by attacking the West's view of international relations. Stability and economic justice, he said, should be "not only for the chosen ones, but for everybody."

During Putin's 32-minute address, several members of the U.S. delegation frowned or looked away. Gates, a professional Sovietologist, stared down at notes he was writing. Asked for comment afterward, Gates smiled and shook his head.

After speaking, Putin took questions from the audience, elaborating on several points but backing down from none of them. Explaining his view that the world is now more dangerous than it was during the Cold War, he said that back then, "it was a fragile peace, a scary peace, but it was fairly reliable, as it turns out. Today it is less reliable."

In his one peace offering, Putin called Bush "my friend." Bush is "criticized for everything he does, but he is a decent man," Putin said.

Putin also alluded to Russia's indirect cutoff of crucial energy supplies to Europe twice in the past two years, insisting that Russia's actions are simply intended to put its energy exports on a transparent, market-based system built around long-term contracts.

Some European diplomats, speaking on condition of anonymity, saw his attack on the United States as a preemptive measure to deflect criticism of Russia that has been building in European capitals. In addition to an ongoing crackdown on pro-democracy groups and political opponents, Russia has antagonized some in Europe with its use of energy as a tool of foreign policy.

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, who also attended the meeting, said he was disappointed by Putin's remarks. He said NATO and the United States had been forthright in their communications with Moscow on the eastward expansion of NATO and had made clear that such moves should not be interpreted as a security threat.

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.) said that much of Putin's address was "Cold War rhetoric" and that his comments about Iran were "outrageous" and "provocative."

Sen. Lindsey O. Graham (R-S.C.) added, "If you're waiting for Russia to be constructive on Iran, forget it." Putin "did more in a single speech to unite Europe and America than anything we could have done in a decade," Graham said, referring to tensions over the war in Iraq.

Putin Says U.S. Is Undermining Global Stability (NYT)

By Thom Shanker, Mark Landler

DOJ_NMG_0130704

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

MUNICH, Feb. 10 — President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia accused the United States on Saturday of provoking a new nuclear arms race by developing ballistic missile defenses, undermining international institutions and making the Middle East more unstable through its clumsy handling of the Iraq war.

In an address to an international security conference, Mr. Putin dropped all diplomatic gloss to recite a long list of complaints about American domination of global affairs, including many of the themes that have strained relations between the Kremlin and the United States during his seven-year administration.

Among them were the expansion of NATO into the Baltics and the perception in Russia that the West has supported groups that have toppled other governments in Moscow's former sphere of influence.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance," Mr. Putin said. "We have the right to ask, 'Against whom is this expansion directed?' "

He said the United States had turned the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe, which sends monitors to elections in the former Soviet sphere, "into a vulgar instrument of ensuring the foreign policy interests of one country."

The comments were the sternest yet from Mr. Putin, who has long bristled over criticism from the United States and its European allies as he and his cadre of former Soviet intelligence officials have consolidated their hold on Russia's government, energy reserves and arms-manufacturing and trading complexes.

Rubble from the Berlin Wall was "hauled away as souvenirs" to countries that praise openness and personal freedom, he said, but "now there are attempts to impose new dividing lines and rules, maybe virtual, but still dividing our mutual continent."

The world, he said, is now unipolar: "One single center of power. One single center of force. One single center of decision making. This is the world of one master, one sovereign."

With the German chancellor, Angela Merkel, the American defense secretary, Robert M. Gates, and a Congressional delegation sitting stone-faced, Mr. Putin warned that the power amassed by any nation that assumes this ultimate global role "destroys it from within.

"It has nothing in common with democracy, of course," he added. "Today we are witnessing an almost uncontained hyper use of force in international relations — military force."

"Primarily the United States has overstepped its national borders, and in every area," said Mr. Putin, who increasingly has tried to re-establish Russia's once broad Soviet-era influence, using Russia's natural resources as leverage and defending nations at odds with the United States, including Iran.

American military actions, which he termed "unilateral" and "illegitimate," also "have not been able to resolve any matters at all," and, he said, have created only more instability and danger.

"They bring us to the abyss of one conflict after another," he said. "Political solutions are becoming impossible."

The comments irritated some European leaders and prompted sharp criticism from the Americans in attendance. Senator John McCain, the Arizona Republican widely expected to make a bid for the White House, made a rebuttal that began, "In today's multipolar world, there is no place for needless confrontation." He said that the United States won the cold war in partnership with powerful nations of Western Europe, and that "there are power centers on every continent today."

Mr. McCain then hit back at Mr. Putin more directly. "Will Russia's autocratic turn become more pronounced, its foreign policy more opposed to the principles of the Western democracies and its energy policy used as a tool of intimidation?" he asked. "Moscow must understand that it cannot enjoy a genuine partnership with the West so long as its actions, at home and abroad, conflict fundamentally with the core values of the Euro-Atlantic democracies."

In Washington, Gordon D. Johndroe, a White House spokesman, said in a statement: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments. His accusations are wrong. We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

Russia has also faced criticism from the United States and other Western countries that believe it has used energy reserves and transport pipelines to reward friendly countries and to punish those seeking to distance themselves from Kremlin control. Some analysts saw the tone of the speech as evidence of how much oil and mineral revenues have strengthened Mr. Putin.

The occasion of the speech was the 43rd Munich Conference on Security Policy — an event begun deep in the cold war, when Germany was divided and hundreds of thousands of American troops were stationed in Western Europe as a bulwark against Warsaw Pact forces.

Mr. Putin began with an apology for the tough talk to come. But during a lively question and answer period full of challenges and rebukes, the Russian president indicated that he relished provoking the international audience of legislators, government leaders, political analysts and human rights advocates.

"I love it," Mr. Putin said as he reviewed a long list of questions. He has long enjoyed high and durable public approval ratings at home, in part for standing up to the West and for pursuing an assertive foreign policy with former Soviet states.

He did offer at least two significant and conciliatory statements to the United States.

President Bush "is a decent man, and one can do business with him," he said. From their meetings and discussions, Mr. Putin said, he has heard the American president say, "I assume Russia and the United States will never be enemies, and I agree."

And while Mr. Putin denied that Russia had assisted the Iranian military with significant arms transfers, he also criticized the government in Tehran for not cooperating more with the United Nations nuclear watchdog agency or responding to questions about its nuclear program.

Other American lawmakers offered measured criticism afterward. "He's done more to bring Europe and the U.S. together than any single event in the last several years," said Senator Lindsey Graham, Republican of South Carolina.

Senator Joseph I. Lieberman, an independent from Connecticut, described the speech as "confrontational," saying, "some of the rhetoric takes us back to the cold war."

Iran's top nuclear official, Ali Larijani, listened impassively from the back of the room. His attendance had become a sideshow in itself. After accepting an invitation to speak Sunday, he canceled, citing health reasons, after a tense meeting with the International Atomic Energy Agency in Vienna that concluded with a decision to freeze technical cooperation projects.

Mr. Putin joked that he worried the United States was "hiding extra warheads under the pillow" despite its treaties with Moscow to reduce strategic nuclear stockpiles. And he indicated obliquely that the new Russian ballistic missile, known as the Topol-M, was being developed at least in part in response to American efforts to field missile defenses.

He expressed alarm that an effective antimissile shield over the United States would upset a system of mutual fear that kept the nuclear peace throughout the cold war. "That means the balance will be upset, completely upset," he said.

Addressing tensions between Europe and Russia over energy exports, Mr. Putin said 26 percent of Russian oil was extracted by foreign companies. While Russia is open to outside investment, he said, it has found its businessmen blocked from deals abroad.

The Kremlin has been criticized for attempting to impose registration and taxation laws that could restrict the work of foreign nongovernmental organizations with offices in Russia to aid democratization.

But Mr. Putin said his concerns about the work grew from the fact that they "are used as channels for funding, and those funds are provided by governments of other countries." That flow of foreign money to assist opposition Russian political organizations, he said, is "hidden from our society.

"What is democratic about this?" he asked. "This is not about democracy. This is about one country influencing another."

Mrs. Merkel, in her opening speech, struck a far more diplomatic tone than Mr. Putin, though she alluded to the tensions between Europe and Russia over energy shipments and the independence of Kosovo.

Addressing herself to Mr. Putin, who was sitting in the front row, Mrs. Merkel said, "In my talks with you, I have sensed that Russia is going to be a reliable and predictable partner." But she added, "We need to speak frankly with each other."

Mrs. Merkel had previously criticized in sharp terms Russia's recent shutdown of oil shipments to Belarus, which followed a dispute over natural gas prices. She is pressing Russia to sign a charter with the European Union on energy, which Moscow has resisted.

Mrs. Merkel alluded to another potential confrontation between Europe and Russia. The United Nations is weighing a proposal that would put Kosovo on the path to independence from Serbia, which Russia opposes because it fears that such a move could upset its own turbulent relations with ethnic groups in the Caucasus. Russia has crushed one separatist-minded people within its own borders, in Chechnya, but supports two breakaway regions in Georgia: Abkhazia and South Ossetia.

"We're going to come to the stage where we have to decide: does Serbia, does Kosovo want to move in the European direction?" Mrs. Merkel asked. "If that's the route they choose, both will have to make compromises."

Putin Says U.S. Militarism Fosters Global Instability (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

Munich, Germany — Russian President Vladimir V. Putin berated the United States in a major speech Saturday before senior American and European officials, declaring that Washington's militarism had fostered global instability and forced vulnerable nations to seek nuclear weapons.

In harsh language sometimes reminiscent of the Cold War; at other times pleading or mocking, Putin accused the United States of attempting to create a world in which it was free to ignore international law and impose its economic, political and military will.

"We are witnessing an almost uncontained hyper-use of military force in international relations," Putin said. "One country, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

Putin's litany of accusations was not unfamiliar. The Russian leader has been able to leverage high demand and prices for Russia's oil and gas into an increasingly assertive role on the world stage. But the tenor of his remarks sent a quiver through the hall. Participants said that, coming after a conciliatory opening speech by German Chancellor Angela Merkel, they were widely resented by the hosts. One German questioner jokingly told Putin he hoped the president had not set off "another world war."

In Washington, Gordon Johndroe, spokesman for the National Security Council, said: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments. His accusations are wrong."

He said the Bush administration expected to continue to cooperate with Moscow in areas such as counterterrorism and reducing the spread of weapons of mass destruction.

The speech was a first for a Russian president at the increasingly high-profile Munich Security Conference. It was delivered with U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates seated stoically in the front row flanked by a stone-faced congressional delegation led by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., considered a leading candidate to be the 2008 Republican presidential nomination.

The symbolism was all the more stark given that it came on the new Defense secretary's first formal trip to Europe and that it occurred at a conference once dominated by his predecessor, Donald H. Rumsfeld. Putin spoke in a prime first-day time slot once used as a platform for Rumsfeld; Gates is to address the gathering Sunday.

U.S. analysts said Putin's remarks appeared timed to take advantage of the Bush administration's weakness as it struggles with Iraq policy and dwindling support at home. Putin in the past has lashed out at U.S. criticism of Russia's human rights record, turning the tables last month to focus on the U.S. detention center at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.

Putin did touch on some areas of common interest with the U.S. He criticized Iran for not responding positively to proposals by the U.N. to suspend Tehran's nuclear program. His comments were among Russia's most pro-Western remarks on the topic in several months.

But he also defended Moscow's sale of anti-aircraft weapons to Tehran, and most of the address focused on perceived American unilateralism and hegemony.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not managed to resolve any problems, but made them worse," Putin said. "The wars, local and regional conflicts, have only grown in number."

Arguing the U.S. was ignoring international law in its use of military power, a clear reference to the Iraqi invasion, Putin said the legal constraints that once protected smaller, weaker nations were no longer viable.

"This is very dangerous," he said. "Nobody feels secure any more."

"Of course, such a policy stimulates an arms race," Putin said. "The force's dominance inevitably encourages a number of countries to acquire weapons of mass destruction."

Putin did not make a specific reference to Iran or North Korea as being among those smaller nations that feel threatened, but his reference seemed clear.

The Russian president also said he believed American and Western economic interests were seeking unfettered access to Russian markets, even as they blocked Russian groups from achieving parity abroad.

Putin was most specific when discussing U.S. moves in Eastern Europe, saying efforts by the Bush administration to set up a missile defense system with radar and interceptor rockets in Poland and the Czech Republic threatened Russian's ballistic missiles. The U.S. has repeatedly said the system is not aimed at Russia, but at potential longer-range Iranian missiles.

He questioned why the U.S. believed it was necessary to base troops in two other former Soviet allies, Bulgaria and Romania. "NATO is bringing its adversarial forces to our state's borders," he said. "It is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

The attack on NATO appeared to put off European dignitaries as much as U.S. officials, a rare show of unity from the trans-Atlantic partners since the start of the Iraq war.

Jaap de Hoop Scheffer, secretary-general of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, told the conference later in the day that he was "disappointed" by Putin's statements, noting NATO has for a decade held regular security consultations with Moscow through a formalized, legally binding agreement.

"Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law are coming closer to somebody's border?" Scheffer asked.

Stephen Sestanovich, ambassador-at-large to states of the former Soviet Union during the Clinton administration, said Putin most likely spoke out so sharply because he had grown tired of constant U.S. criticism.

"Most Americans are not aware of how heated and agitated the Russians' discussions are about their relationship with the West," he said. "It may come as a surprise to Americans, but for the Russians, the rhetoric on these questions tends to be pretty grim, among the experts and regular folks, about the deterioration of the relationship."

"The theme is, 'We're tired of American hegemony, we're tired of being treated like a former superpower doormat, and we're back, and we're mad," Sestanovich said.

During a question period following the address, Putin appeared to try to temper his prepared remarks, which several of those seated near him said included several hand-written inserts.

He said President Bush had told him that the U.S. assumes the two countries will "never be enemies again, and I agree with him."

"I really consider the president of the United States my friend," Putin said. "He's a decent man and one can do business with him." Putin also strode purposefully to Gates immediately after his address, shaking his hand with a smile and exchanging quick pleasantries.

But the remarks clearly perturbed the U.S. delegation. During his formal remarks to the conference later Saturday, McCain echoed the sentiments of several Americans in attendance, saying Russia appeared to be turning more autocratic and its foreign policy was standing increasingly in opposition to Western democracies.

"Today's world is not unipolar," McCain said, disputing Putin's main theme. "In today's multipolar world, there is no need for pointless confrontation."

Putin's criticism was not limited to the U.S. He noted that Germany had shortly after the end of the Cold War sought to reassure its historic rivals in Moscow that it would never send its military forces outside its borders. Berlin now has troops in the Balkans and Afghanistan.

"Where are those guarantees now?" Putin asked, arguing Europe was now attempting to set up new "virtual" walls between to replace the Berlin Wall.

He also dismissed European complaints about Russian threats last year to cut off energy supplies to its neighbors, saying Moscow was only seeking market prices and stable, long-term contracts with countries like Ukraine and Georgia, who in the past have received subsidized supplies.

Putin Accuses U.S. Of Sparking Arms Race (AP)

By Slobodan Lekic, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin on Saturday blamed U.S. policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force" — a stinging attack that underscored growing tensions between Washington and Moscow.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem, they have become a hotbed of further conflicts," Putin said at a security forum attracting senior officials from around the world.

"One state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

The Bush administration said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Putin's remarks. "His accusations are wrong," said Gordon Johndroe, Bush's national security spokesman.

In what the Russian leader's spokesman acknowledged was his harshest criticism of the United States, Putin attacked Bush's administration for stoking a new arms race by planning to deploy a missile defense system in eastern Europe and for backing a U.N. plan that would grant virtual independence to Serbia's breakaway province of Kosovo.

Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., who was also attending the conference, described Putin's remarks as "the most aggressive speech from a Russian leader since the end of the Cold War."

The United States and an increasingly assertive Russia repeatedly have butted heads during the past year, with Vice President Dick Cheney accusing Moscow of using its energy resources as "tools of intimidation or blackmail." Washington also has been angered by Russia's reluctance to impose meaningful sanctions against Iran, which is accused of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian atomic energy program.

But Putin said it was "the almost uncontained hyper use of force in international relations" that was forcing countries opposed to Washington to seek to build up nuclear arsenals.

"It is a world of one master, one sovereign ... it has nothing to do with democracy," he said. "This is nourishing the wish of countries to get nuclear weapons."

"This is very dangerous, nobody feels secure anymore because nobody can hide behind international law," Putin told the gathering.

Putin did not mention the wars in Iraq or Afghanistan, but he voiced concern about NATO's expansion plans as possible challenges to Russia.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance or with ensuring security in Europe," Putin said. "On the contrary, it is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

On the missile defense system, Putin said: "I don't want to accuse anyone of being aggressive" but suggested it would seriously change the balance of power and could provoke an unspecified "asymmetric" response.

On Kosovo, Moscow has said a solution imposed against Serbia's consent could serve as a model for other separatist provinces elsewhere in the world. Washington, which supports Kosovo's independence, maintains that the Kosovo situation is a "one-off" because the province has been under U.N. rule since 1999 when Serb forces were ejected following a brief aerial war with NATO.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert Gates had little to say about the accusations, remarking only that Putin "was very candid."

NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said he was disappointed by Putin's criticism about NATO expansion. "Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law is coming closer to somebody's border?" he asked.

Putin's spokesman Dmitry Peskov said the president's speech was not "confrontational" and attributed his blunt words to the sense that the number of conflicts fomented by Washington "was constantly growing" and that international law was being undermined by such actions.

"It is in the interest of the United States, the European Union and other countries that international law is upheld, not further destroyed," Peskov said.

Minutes earlier, German Chancellor Angela Merkel — whose country holds the European Union's rotating presidency — had praised Russia, saying it would be a reliable energy supplier to Europe. She called for closer relations between the EU and Moscow to enhance stability on the continent.

"How relations between the EU and Russia evolve will have a crucial impact on how security in the region will develop," Merkel told the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy. The forum is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Russia's reputation as a supplier of natural gas to the West was damaged in the recent past when it halted supplies to Europe through main pipelines crossing Belarus and Ukraine due to pricing disputes with those two countries.

Merkel also said that the international community is determined to prevent Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons. Tehran needed to accept demands made by the U.N. and the International Atomic Energy Agency, she said.

On the sidelines of the conference, Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani defended his country's nuclear program as peaceful, saying: "We are no threat to our region or other countries," while indicating a willingness to return to negotiations.

Putin Hits U.S. Use Of Force (WT/AP)

By Slobodan Lekic

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

MUNICH -- Russian President Vladimir Putin yesterday blamed U.S. policy for inciting other countries to seek nuclear weapons to defend themselves from an "almost uncontained use of military force" -- a stinging attack that underscored growing tensions between Washington and Moscow.

"Unilateral, illegitimate actions have not solved a single problem. They have become a hotbed of further conflicts," Mr. Putin said at a security forum attracting senior officials from around the world.

"One state, the United States, has overstepped its national borders in every way."

The Bush administration said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Mr. Putin's remarks. "His accusations are wrong," said Gordon Johndroe, President Bush's national security spokesman.

In what the Russian leader's spokesman acknowledged was his harshest criticism of the United States, Mr. Putin attacked Mr. Bush's administration for stoking a new arms race by planning to deploy a missile-defense system in Eastern Europe and for backing a U.N. plan that would grant virtual independence to Serbia's breakaway province of Kosovo.

Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, who was attending the conference, described Mr. Putin's remarks as "the most aggressive speech from a Russian leader since the end of the Cold War."

The United States and an increasingly assertive Russia repeatedly have butted heads during the past year, with Vice President Dick Cheney accusing Moscow of using its energy resources as "tools of intimidation or blackmail."

Washington also has been angered by Russia's reluctance to impose meaningful sanctions against Iran, which is accused of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under the cover of a civilian atomic-energy program.

But Mr. Putin said it was "the almost uncontained hyper-use of force in international relations" that was forcing countries opposed to Washington to seek to build up nuclear arsenals.

"It is a world of one master, one sovereign ... it has nothing to do with democracy," he said. "This is nourishing the wish of countries to get nuclear weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0130709

Mr. Putin did not mention the wars in Iraq or Afghanistan, but he voiced concern about NATO's expansion plans as possible challenges to Russia.

"The process of NATO expansion has nothing to do with modernization of the alliance or with ensuring security in Europe," Mr. Putin said. "On the contrary, it is a serious factor provoking reduction of mutual trust."

On the missile-defense system, Mr. Putin said: "I don't want to accuse anyone of being aggressive," but suggested it would seriously change the balance of power and could provoke an unspecified "asymmetric" response.

On Kosovo, Moscow has said a solution imposed against Serbia's consent could serve as a model for other separatist provinces elsewhere in the world.

Washington, which supports Kosovo's independence, maintains that the Kosovo situation is a "one-off" because the province has been under U.N. rule since 1999, when Serbian forces were ejected after a brief aerial war with NATO.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates had little to say about the accusations, remarking only that Mr. Putin "was very candid."

NATO Secretary-General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer said he was disappointed by Mr. Putin's criticism about NATO expansion. "Who can be worried that democracy and the rule of law is coming closer to somebody's border?" he asked.

Mr. Putin's spokesman, Dmitry Peskov, said the president's speech was not "confrontational" and attributed his blunt words to the sense that the number of conflicts fomented by Washington "was constantly growing" and that international law was being undermined by such actions.

"It is in the interest of the United States, the European Union and other countries that international law is upheld, not further destroyed," Mr. Peskov said.

Minutes earlier, German Chancellor Angela Merkel -- whose country holds the European Union's rotating presidency -- had praised Russia, saying it would be a reliable energy supplier to Europe. She called for closer relations between the EU and Moscow to enhance stability on the continent.

"How relations between the EU and Russia evolve will have a crucial impact on how security in the region will develop," Mrs. Merkel told the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy.

The forum is often used as an opportunity for officials to conduct diplomacy in an informal setting.

Russia's reputation as a dependable supplier of natural gas and oil to the West was damaged in the recent past when it halted supplies to Europe through main pipelines crossing Belarus and Ukraine as a result of pricing disputes with those two countries.

On the sidelines of the conference, Iranian nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani defended his country's nuclear program as peaceful, saying: "We are no threat to our region or other countries," while indicating a willingness to return to negotiations.

AFP, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin attacked the United States as a reckless "unipolar" power that has made the world more dangerous by pursuing policies that have led to war, ruin and insecurity.

Putin stunned an audience that included US Defence Secretary Robert Gates and senior US and European officials with the speech at a high-level security conference in Munich.

The White House said it was "surprised and disappointed" by Putin's accusations and Gates was expected to respond on Sunday, in his first major speech since taking office.

In comments reminiscent of his campaign opposing the 2003 US-led invasion of Iraq, Putin said the United States had disastrously "overstepped" its borders.

"The United States has overstepped its borders in all spheres... and has imposed itself on other states," Putin told delegates at the annual Munich Conference on Security Policy.

Putin said a "unipolar" world "means in practice one thing: one centre of power, one centre of force, one centre of decision-making, a world of one master, one sovereign."

Such a situation "is extremely dangerous. No one feels secure because no one can hide behind international law," Putin said.

He added that US dominance was "ruinous."

"Local and regional wars didn't get fewer. The number of people who died didn't get less, but increased.... We see no kind of restraint."

Putin also rejected criticism that under his watch, Russia has back-tracked on democracy, saying that the United States was "permanently teaching Russia about democracy. But those who teach us, for some reason don't really want to study it themselves."

The speech added to tensions between the Kremlin and the United States, which have grown after a period of relative rapprochement in the 1990s.

Boosted by his country's oil wealth, the Russian leader has tried to restore Moscow's international clout, making common cause with fellow critics of the United States, notably Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez, and maintaining a traditional friendship with Iran.

After what many Russians regard as the humiliation of the Soviet Union's collapse, the Kremlin plans to build up its defences and has vowed an effective response to US hopes of establishing a missile defence system close to Russia's borders in the Czech Republic and Poland.

That threat has fuelled fears of a new arms race reminiscent of the Cold War.

Putin drew immediate criticism from the White House.

National security spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "We are surprised and disappointed with President Putin's comments.

"His accusations are wrong," he said.

"We expect to continue cooperation with Russia in areas important to the international community such as counter-terrorism and reducing the spread and threat of weapons of mass destruction."

Putin's speech also prompted dismay at the conference itself, which is traditionally pro-Western and devoted to the future of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation (NATO).

"I can't hide my disappointment. I will not hide my disappointment," said the NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer.

Prominent US Republican Senator and presidential hopeful John McCain said that "today's world is not unipolar.... Russian leaders' apparent belief to the contrary raises a number of very difficult questions."

There was also criticism from Estonian President Toomas Hendrik Ilves, whose Baltic Sea country was unwillingly ruled from Moscow for most of the second half of the 20th century.

The EU should think carefully about how it deals with "a country that considers democracy on its borders as a threat, or despotism on its borders as a source of stability," said Ilves.

Iran's top nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, was also likely to be in the spotlight when he addresses the conference Sunday.

The United States has been trying to increase pressure on Iran to give up its nuclear programme, which Tehran says is aimed only at generating electricity but Washington says is a cover for a weapons programme.

Putin's Speech: Back To Cold War? (BBC)

By Rob Watson

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The Munich security conference was born in the 1960s - the height of the Cold War. Forty years on, there been talk of a new chill.

Given the tone and content of Russian President Vladimir Putin's address to the gathered defence ministers, parliamentarians and pundits, it is not, perhaps, hard to see why.

Warming quickly to his task after only the briefest of greetings, President Putin accused the US of establishing, or trying to establish, a "uni-polar" world.

"What is a uni-polar world? No matter how we beautify this term, it means one single centre of power, one single centre of force and one single master," he said.

'Formula for disaster'

President Putin continued in a similar vein for some time.

"The United States has overstepped its borders in all spheres - economic, political and humanitarian, and has imposed itself on other states," he said.

It was a formula that, he said, had led to disaster: "Local and regional wars did not get fewer, the number of people who died did not get less but increased. We see no kind of restraint - a hyper-inflated use of force."

The US has gone "from one conflict to another without achieving a fully-fledged solution to any of them", Mr Putin said.

With the new US Defence Secretary Robert Gates and several US congressmen sitting in the audience, he called for the reconsideration of the whole existing architecture of global security.

'Disappointing' speech

But he did not win over his audience.

Several delegates did not like his rather brusque brushing off of questions about Russia's own commitment to democracy and his defence of Moscow's decision to sell an air-defence system to Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130711

Nato Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer described President Putin's speech as "disappointing and not helpful". And there was similar reaction from the president of Estonia and others.

But it was left to US Republican senator and presidential hopeful John McCain to lead the retort.

Today's world, he said sternly, was not uni-polar, adding that it was an autocratic Russia that needed to change its behaviour.

"Moscow must understand that it cannot enjoy a genuine partnership with the West so long as its actions at home and abroad conflict so fundamentally with the core values of Euro-Atlantic democracies," he said.

"In today's multi-polar world, there is no place for needless confrontation, and I would hope that Russian leaders understand this truth," Senator McCain said.

Spotlight on Moscow

Afterwards in the corridors there were dark mutterings by some about a new Cold War.

Others were less gloomy, dismissing President Putin's performance as one of Russia's periodic bouts of letting off steam at its diminished world status.

But it has made an impression.

For the last few years, as one observer suggested, it was the former US Defence Secretary, Donald Rumsfeld, who was the man everybody loved to hate at this conference.

President Putin's performance has single-handedly switched the spotlight from the US to Russia.

Putin In First Saudi State Visit (BBC)

By Stephen Eke

BBC.com, February 11, 2007

Russian President Vladimir Putin, sets off on a tour of the Middle East on Sunday, arriving in Saudi Arabia, then going on to Qatar and Jordan.

It is the first time a Russian head of state is to visit these countries, considered allies of the West.

Moscow sees them as key to building new economic, political and even military ties with the Arab world.

Mr Putin is setting off on what may be his last major visit to the Middle East as president.

Russian diplomats deny any notion of grandstanding, however, pointing to rapidly growing trade with the region, which in the case of Saudi Arabia, tripled last year.

Military ties?

King Abdullah II of Jordan has travelled to Russia six times over recent years; the Emir of Qatar has also visited.

While talks between Mr Putin, the accompanying Russian businessmen and diplomats, and their Arab hosts, are expected to focus on trade and business, Moscow has cautiously suggested introducing what it calls "military and technical ties" into the equation.

Some Russian commentators have suggested Mr Putin may be about to flex Russia's muscle by visiting countries traditionally considered to be pro-western.

But senior diplomats have played that idea down, stressing that the major factor is the potential market for conventional and hi-tech weaponry they represent.

Russian arms - like these Sukhoi jets - could be part of talks

Russia had close links with the Middle East during the Communist era, but the end of the Soviet Union saw it marginalised and struggling to maintain influence.

In recent times, Moscow has built close links with Israel - an enemy in Soviet times - and with Iran, where Russian engineers have built the country's first, controversial, nuclear power station.

Russia's once-close political and ideological links with Syria, the Palestinians and Egypt have taken second place to a much more pragmatic factor - where can Russia make money by selling its machinery and weaponry.

Talks With N. Korea Extended To 4th Day (WP)

By Edward Cody

BEIJING, Feb. 10 -- Despite three days of hard bargaining, North Korean nuclear disarmament talks remained stuck Saturday over the energy aid North Korea would receive in return for closing its main nuclear reactor, diplomats said.

Discord over the compensation cast a pall over what had been high hopes that the six-nation talks could produce swift agreement on the first steps toward eliminating North Korea's nuclear weapons and dismantling the nuclear facilities that produce its fissionable material.

As a result, diplomats from the six nations -- North and South Korea, Japan, Russia, China and the United States -- made plans to return to the negotiating table at the Chinese government's secluded Diaoyutai guest compound here for additional sessions of negotiations Sunday and perhaps into next week.

"It's definitely an issue that has prevented us from sealing the deal right now," said Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the chief U.S. negotiator, without revealing the terms of the dispute. "I think it may take another day or two to get through this."

The stakes are high, Hill suggested, because another failure would again raise questions about the utility of the Chinese-sponsored six-party process, which has been underway off and on since August 2003 without results on the ground. In October, while the talks languished, North Korea set off a nuclear test blast and declared itself a nuclear power.

Hill, briefing reporters, emphasized that the other main elements of an agreement on initial disarmament steps were ready to sign. But he warned that other disagreements could also arise as long as the talks continue, suggesting the accord that looked so close when this round of talks began Thursday may turn out to be more distant than thought.

The last round of talks ended Dec. 22 in stalemate after the senior North Korean negotiator, Kim Gye Gwan, said he could not formally discuss North Korea's nuclear program until resolution of a financial dispute over U.S. allegations that a Macau bank was being used to launder illicit North Korean funds. Hill said that dispute, although not resolved, has been smoothed over by separate negotiations among U.S. and North Korean banking officials and a meeting last month in Berlin.

As a result, he said, Kim has been negotiating seriously. But the talks nevertheless reached an impasse over what South Korean diplomats described as the amount and timing of aid North Korea would receive in exchange for shutting down the Yongbyon reactor and readmitting international nuclear inspectors.

The facility, North Korea's main nuclear installation, produces plutonium that can be used for nuclear fuel. U.S. officials estimated that North Korea has produced enough plutonium to fuel eight to 10 nuclear weapons.

Two U.S. nuclear experts who visited North Korea's capital, Pyongyang, early this month were told that North Korea wants heavy fuel oil to produce electricity in return for closing Yongbyon, in addition to a commitment from the five other negotiating nations to build civilian-use nuclear power reactors in the future.

New Setback In North Korean Nuclear Talks (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 10 — Negotiations over North Korea's nuclear weapons program stalled on Saturday as disagreements arose about the size and timing of the aid package that would be provided to North Korea in exchange for shutting down the country's nuclear weapons facilities.

"The differences on the issue still remain large," said Qin Gang, spokesman for China's Foreign Ministry.

The impasse occurred amid rising expectations for an agreement in Beijing, where the diplomatic talks were under way, and in Washington, where Bush administration officials had predicted a major announcement this weekend. Instead, negotiators from North Korea, China, the United States, South Korea and Japan will meet again on Sunday for a fourth day of talks.

Christopher R. Hill, the chief American envoy, would not discuss any specifics about the dispute but said negotiations had largely boiled down to one issue. "Frankly, I had hoped we could get it done on Saturday," Mr. Hill said. "But I think it's going to take another day or two."

The diplomatic effort to resolve the North Korean nuclear issue has gone nowhere since the six participating nations signed a broad accord in September 2005 in which North Korea agreed to end its weapons program in exchange for economic and energy benefits, as well as security guarantees. Negotiations almost fell apart last October after North Korea tested a nuclear device.

This week's focus has been on establishing a schedule for shutting down North Korea's nuclear program, as well as the timing and amount of assistance the North gets in return. Bush administration officials say that the current draft calls for North Korea to shut down and seal its main nuclear facilities within two months in exchange for shipments of fuel oil from South Korea and the opening of talks with Washington over diplomatic recognition.

But the process now seems stuck on the fine print of exactly how much help North Korea is demanding. Aleksandr Losyukov, the top Russian negotiator, said the parties had not decided on final figures for assistance, and he declined to detail the amounts requested by North Korea.

"The biggest obstacle to reaching a joint statement remains on the issue of economic aid," said Mr. Losyukov, according to Xinhua, China's official news agency.

However, at least one diplomat suggested that the process faced more than one problem. “The situation continues to be severe,” Kenichiro Sasae, the Japanese envoy, told reporters. “We are boiling down our problems, but there is no conclusion in sight for several issues.”

Kyodo, the Japanese news agency, quoted an unidentified diplomatic source as saying that North Korea had demanded the equivalent of about two million tons of fuel oil annually, a figure that stunned other participants.

Mr. Hill, speaking to reporters late Saturday night, said North Korea wanted “a very precise measurement with how we are going to get through this.” He predicted that the problem could be solved. “We are kind of reaching a point where we have got to solve this,” he said.

AFP, February 11, 2007

The US envoy to talks on disarming North Korea has expressed impatience over Pyongyang's fixation on a detail in a draft deal that he said could be resolved later.

"I think it's time to wrap this up and get going," US negotiator Christopher Hill told reporters in Beijing Sunday morning before beginning a fourth day of negotiations.

"I hope the other participants will share that view that it's time to get it over with."

The six-nation talks on dismantling North Korea's nuclear arms programmes -- which also group South Korea, Japan, Russia and hosts China -- failed to strike a deal Saturday, with Hill saying only one sticking point remained.

The specific point has not been revealed, but discussions have centred on China's draft accord outlining steps the five parties would take in order for North Korea to disarm, including an aid package for Pyongyang.

Hill said the detail in dispute is one that should be worked out later by specialists.

"Frankly, an issue of this kind is more appropriate for experts," he said.

However, Hill said he planned to meet North Korean negotiator Kim Kye-Gwan again on Sunday and expressed hope that the talks could wrap up by the end of the day.

But that upbeat view was contradicted by South Korea's envoy, Chun Yung-Woo.

"It looks unreasonable to expect a breakthrough today," Chun told reporters as he left his hotel for the talks.

Under the draft agreement, North Korea would close its main nuclear-related facilities, including a five-megawatt reactor at Yongbyon, within two months in return for alternative energy sources, press reports have said.

The potential breakthrough comes after North Korea conducted its first atomic test in October last year.

Analysis: N. Korea Debating Nuke Future (AP)

By Burt Herman, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 11, 2007

North Korea is a totalitarian state where simply mishandling a portrait of leader Kim Jong Il is considered a crime. That doesn't mean there is no internal debate as the regime weighs whether to dismantle its nuclear weapons program.

At the North Korean nuclear negotiations in Beijing, the U.S. envoy alluded to disputes in the communist nation over whether the regime can give up its most potent weapons without sacrificing its security.

Some in the North "understand that these weapons have done more to isolate and endanger and impoverish the DPRK than they will ever do to protect" it, Christopher Hill said Friday, referring to North Korea by the initials of its official name. "Alas, I don't think this is a universal view in the DPRK."

Hill said there was one group with a "very antiquated, and I would say isolated view that somehow nuclear weapons of this kind can create prestige."

He did not give names. But analysts widely believe there are divisions between North Korean military and diplomats, a tug-of-war that sends mixed signals to an outside world with little information about the country's internal policy struggles.

The United States, China, Japan, Russia and South Korea are trying to win a commitment from the North to make its first tangible steps toward abandoning its nuclear programs since the negotiations began in 2003. That goal has become more pressing since the North tested its first nuclear bomb in October, during one of the many deadlocks in the talks.

For Kim, going nuclear has been one way to solidify his authoritarian rule among the military. He has generally favored the armed forces under his proclaimed "Songun," or "military-first" policy, in which the military has the primary role in society.

The military has quashed past diplomatic initiatives, including efforts at detente between North and South Korea. Last year, they refused to allow a test run of trains across the peninsula's heavily fortified border because security arrangements had not been made.

At this round of nuclear negotiations, however, North Korea has committed in principle to taking the first steps toward disarmament. A Chinese draft agreement would grant the communist nation unspecified energy aid for shutting down its main nuclear facilities within two months, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

Talks ended Saturday without consensus, and Hill said disagreements had come down to a single issue that may take another day or two to resolve. He declined to say what the issue was.

South Korean envoy Chun Yung-woo hinted that the dispute was related to North Korea's long-standing demand that Washington drop its "hostile" policy toward Pyongyang.

"There is something that North Korea has said every time since long ago as to what should be the basis (for the agreement)," Chun said.

Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae said the North was still "very much apart from that of the other" five countries involved. "We are boiling down our problems but there is no conclusion in sight for several issues," he said.

On Sunday, Sasae said one of the issues frustrating negotiations was the North's demands for large amounts of energy aid.

North Korea is demanding it be given energy aid equivalent to 2 million kilowatts of electricity during the initial disarmament period, Yonhap said. Japan's Kyodo news agency quoted unidentified diplomats as saying that North Korea was also seeking 2 million tons of fuel oil as part of the deal.

Russian envoy Alexander Losyukov said Saturday the size of the aid package was being discussed, the Interfax news agency reported. "The most important task today is to define the amount of planned aid," he was quoted as saying.

Two other key issues that have previously stalled the negotiations have not been problematic this time, Hill said. They include U.S. restrictions on a bank where the North held accounts for its complicity in alleged financial crimes, and demands that North Korea be given a nuclear reactor for generating electricity.

Palestinian Tout Unity Deal To World (AP)

The Palestinians have begun a diplomatic blitz aimed at persuading reticent leaders in the U.S. and Europe to accept their new power-sharing deal and lift painful economic sanctions, officials said Saturday.

Palestinian representatives already have spoken to Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and the U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon. Next week, they turn their efforts to European leaders, beginning with Germany.

"We are trying to market the agreement and get international support for it," Nabil Amr, a top aide to President Mahmoud Abbas, told The Associated Press.

Western governments and Israel have only given muted reactions to Thursday's agreement between Abbas' Fatah faction and the Islamic militant group Hamas _ dashing Palestinian hopes that the deal would lead to a quick end to the sanctions.

International leaders said they want to study the deal further and see whether it changes the situation on the ground.

The Quartet of Mideast mediators _ the U.S., the U.N., Russia and the European Union _ had demanded that the militant Hamas group, which won Palestinian parliamentary elections last year, recognize Israel's right to exist, renounce violence and accept past peace deals.

The deal, negotiated in the Saudi holy city of Mecca, says only that the new government pledges to "respect" the previous deals. It makes no reference to recognizing Israel or renouncing violence and appears to fall short of the Quartet's demands.

Abbas, a moderate Fatah leader who pushed for a deal for months, is hoping that personal diplomacy with every member of the Quartet will help end the embargo imposed on the Palestinian Authority after Hamas' election last year.

The embargo has frozen roughly $1 billion in annual foreign aid and about $500 million in tax revenues Israel collects on behalf of the Palestinians, crippling the Palestinian government.

Amr said he would head this week to Germany, which holds the rotating presidency of the EU, and then travel to Belgium to meet with Javier Solana, the EU's chief foreign policy envoy. "We urge the officials in Europe to exert efforts to lift the siege imposed on the government," he said.

Abbas, meanwhile, plans meetings with the pro-Western leaders of Egypt and Jordan. He also plans to meet Russian President Vladimir Putin in Amman, Jordan on Tuesday.

"There will be contacts with other countries to clarify the program," said Nimr Hamad, another Abbas adviser. He said was optimistic that European leaders would accept the government program.

The new Palestinian government program could put Western leaders in a difficult position.

DOJ_NMG_0130715

While apparently falling short of Quartet demands, it goes a long way toward ending months of Palestinian infighting that has killed more than 130 people, and the international community might be reluctant to take any steps that could renew tensions.

Hamas also appears to be giving Abbas approval to pursue peace talks with Israel. Abbas is scheduled to meet with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Rice on Feb. 19.

Abbas' aide Abed Rabbo said Rice told him she was skeptical that Hamas would abide by the deal, but she would reserve judgment until it was implemented.

America wants the new government to stop Gaza militants from launching rockets at Israel, prevent other attacks and respect previously signed agreements, he said. Accepting past peace deals has been perceived as implicit recognition of Israel's right to exist.

"The Americans are worried that Hamas will not succeed in this test," he said.

Ahmed Youssef, a top aide to Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas, was noncommittal when asked whether the group would recognize Israel. "The declaration of Mecca did not mention anything about recognition of Israel," he said.

Israel planned to give an official response to the Palestinian program at its weekly Cabinet meeting on Sunday.

Vice Premier Shimon Peres said in an interview with the German weekly focus that "we will study the agreement and then judge it." But in the comments published Saturday, he said Hamas must recognize Israel if it wants negotiations.

Hamas, listed as a terror group by Israel, the United States and the EU, is responsible for scores of deadly suicide bombings in Israel.

Previous efforts to form a national unity government have foundered, though none has ever come this far. Still, there were fears that the new deal could unravel in coming weeks as the two sides choose ministers.

A Very Partial Palestinian Peace (NYT)

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

Peace with Israel was not the subject of the summit meeting Palestinian leaders held in Mecca last week. The Saudi government summoned the leaders of Hamas and Fatah to negotiate a halt in their incipient civil war, which was alarming and embarrassing the Arab world.

Still, the vaguely worded agreement, and the creation of a coalition cabinet, might make peace with Israel more imaginable — if there is a lot more compromise from Hamas and a lot more diplomatic help from Washington.

Hamas and Fatah have reached understandings before, only to have them unravel. This deal could prove more durable because of the heavy investment of Saudi diplomatic capital and the dire financial condition of the Palestinian Authority.

Before Europe and the United States will release aid to the authority, Hamas must recognize Israel, renounce violence and abide by previous agreements between Israel and the Palestinians. What Mahmoud Abbas, the Palestinian president and a Fatah leader, managed to extract from Hamas last week was far less — an agreement merely to respect international agreements and resolutions previously agreed to when Fatah was in charge.

That grudging and highly equivocal concession is further than Hamas had gone. It will be parsed in various ways by various interested parties for weeks to come. But what really matters is how Hamas acts. The most important action would be a credible effort by the joint Hamas and Fatah government to detect and thwart terrorist attacks against Israel. Saudi Arabia is reportedly ready to offer the Palestinian government a large aid package. That might help show Hamas the advantages of improved behavior. But Riyadh should make clear that continued aid will require clear proof that the new government is reining in terrorism.

Whether Hamas is prepared to take that crucial step is doubtful. Israel and the United States should encourage it by making clear that an all-out effort against terrorism would radically improve the negotiating climate — and open the aid spigots.

Given the current political paralysis in Israel, Washington will have to take the lead in sending this message. That will take more courage than the Bush administration has yet managed to muster. Mr. Bush has wasted more than six years without coming up with a serious policy for reducing violence between Israel and the Palestinians and promoting diplomacy.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is set to meet with Israel's prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and Mr. Abbas a week from tomorrow. Her past trips to the region have been empty exercises. By recognizing last week's minimal Palestinian pact as a potential starting point, the White House could give her a chance to improve on that dismal record.

Calm Prevails In Jerusalem On Day After Excavation Clashes (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

DOJ_NMG_0130716

JERUSALEM, Feb. 10 — A few stone-throwing incidents occurred Saturday, but Jerusalem streets were largely quiet a day after the police clashed with Palestinians protesting Israeli construction work near the religious compound known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount.

Some tires were burned and rocks thrown at police officers in east Jerusalem, an area largely populated by Arabs, and some rocks were thrown at a bus full of Canadian tourists near the Mount of Olives, said a Jerusalem police spokesman, Inspector Micky Rosenfeld. "No one was injured, and as far as we are concerned, things are relatively calm and quiet," Inspector Rosenfeld said. The police presence, he said, was down from 2,000 officers on Friday.

In Bethlehem, some 30 Palestinians were arrested Saturday after brief clashes with Israeli troops near Rachel's Tomb, the police said.

The renovations have preoccupied Palestinian and pan-Arab news coverage in the week since the work began. The site, a man-made plateau where Jewish temples stood before their destruction in ancient times, is now occupied by Al Aksa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock and is regarded by Muslims as the third-holiest site in Islam, controlled by a trust called the Islamic Waqf.

The coverage has been full of charges and anxieties that the Israeli work, which is to reconstruct a ramp to the mount for visitors, is a secret preparation to take over the area and rebuild a temple, or at the least is intended to damage the mosque and the Dome of the Rock by undermining their foundations.

Statements of concern and opposition have come from Palestinian, Egyptian and Jordanian leaders, as well as clerics throughout the Muslim world, including in Iran, Indonesia and Malaysia. On Saturday, the Arab League called on the world to press Israel to stop the excavations, which it termed "criminal."

Israeli officials have called such charges nonsense and have promised that the renovation will not disturb the mount or damage any structures there. They say the work, scheduled to last eight months, will take place alongside the mount but not on it and has been coordinated with all relevant organizations.

"Whoever needed to be informed was informed," Inspector Rosenfeld said. "Both security and Muslim leaders, the Waqf and Israeli Arabs leaders knew exactly what will take place and when."

The sensitivity of the area is without dispute. In 2000, the second intifada broke out after a controversial visit to the site by Ariel Sharon, then the opposition leader. Whether Mr. Sharon's visit was responsible for sparking the intifada, a charge disputed by many Israelis, his visit was used to incite Palestinian protests and anger, and the intifada is known as the "Aksa intifada."

There was no construction work on Friday and Saturday, but it is expected to resume Sunday morning with excavation work to anchor supports for a new permanent ramp.

On Friday, the United States supported Israel's right to perform the work, but urged the Israelis to be careful of the "sensitivities" of others when carrying out repair work.

The Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, has also criticized the project and described Friday's clashes, in which 17 Palestinians were lightly wounded, 17 were arrested and 19 Israeli police officers were hurt, as a "day of anger."

A former aide to Mr. Abbas, Walid M. Awad, issued a long statement on Friday in which he accused Israel of working gradually to "Judaize" the Arab areas of Jerusalem and to take over the Noble Sanctuary, also known as Haram al-Sharif. Mr. Awad is the foreign press spokesman for the Central Media Commission of Fatah, Mr. Abbas's faction in the Palestinian Authority.

The renovation work, Mr. Awad charged, "is part and parcel of extensive Israeli efforts that began in June 1967 designed to undermine Islamic holy sites and construct the 'Jewish Temple.'

"The Israeli claim that it is only renovating or maintaining the said road is completely false," he continued, "for if that was its objective, it could have brought in the Islamic Waqf Authority, and asked them to fix the problem."

Mr. Awad also said that while Mr. Abbas "is trying to contain the situation in our area, calming it down and bringing together a collective Palestinian effort in support of an expected resumption of genuine peace talks between the Palestinian people and Israel, it seems Israel is more interested in undermining these efforts."

Small groups of Jewish extremists have said they would like to destroy the mosque and build a temple.

The harsh Muslim criticisms and the Arabic coverage have been taken seriously by Israeli officials, some of whom suggest that the issue is intended to divert attention from Palestinian infighting, while others echo Khaled Abu Toameh, a journalist for The Jerusalem Post who compares the atmosphere to the days just before the 2000 intifada.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel has said the work will continue, even after his rival and defense minister, Amir Peretz, simultaneously gave him and Israeli newspapers a letter warning him to stop the work to avoid security problems.

An Israeli Islamic leader, Sheik Raed Salah, said he has planned "a full program of protests for the coming weeks in order to stop the Israeli crimes against Al Aksa Mosque," adding, "Continuing the work will increase tension and anger among Palestinians and in the Arab-Islamic world."

A leader of the Islamic Movement in northern Israel, Sheik Salah spent two years in jail on charges of raising money for Hamas but was released in 2005. He has been barred from the construction area.

In Gaza, Palestinians expressed hope that Thursday's agreement between Mr. Abbas and Hamas leaders in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, would bring an end to factional fighting and result in a government that could again pay them their full salaries. Members of the so-called quartet — the United States, European Union, Russia and the United Nations — were cautious, saying that much about the deal remained unfinished or unclear, but Russia independently said restrictions should be lifted once the new government was formed.

The quartet announced that it would meet on Feb. 21 in Berlin.

Clashes By Jerusalem Holy Site Continue (AP)

Sporadic Palestinian protests, including a rock-throwing attack on a busload of Canadian tourists, broke out in Jerusalem and the West Bank on Saturday over Israel's construction of a ramp leading to a flashpoint holy site.

The demonstrations came the day after Israeli police raided the mosque compound, firing tear gas and stun grenades at rioting Muslims. Protests have spread throughout the world as Muslim leaders accused Israel of trying to damage the Islamic shrines.

Israel denies the repair work will come anywhere near the holy site, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount.

In Jerusalem, a few dozen Palestinian teenagers threw stones at Israeli security forces at the walled Old City, burning an Israeli flag at one point. At the Mount of Olives holy site, Palestinians pelted a Canadian tour bus, but no one was injured.

"We were just driving and all of a sudden a bunch of kids started picking up rocks and whatever they could get their hands on and started throwing it at the bus," said Dave Wood, one of the tourists. "This is our first day in the Holy City and it was quite disturbing to say the least."

Israeli police arrested a total of 17 protesters in the Jerusalem protests that were "relatively quiet," police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said. The Israeli crews did not work on the ramp Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath.

In the West Bank town of Bethlehem, dozens of Palestinian youths threw rocks at Israeli soldiers guarding a checkpoint into Jerusalem. The soldiers detained 30 protesters, the army said.

In a similar protest in the West Bank city of Hebron, police responded with tear gas and rubber-coated bullets. No injuries were reported in either demonstration.

In anticipation of further protests in Jerusalem on Sunday when the work will resume, police will maintain a beefed-up force and restrictions at the mosque compound, barring all Muslim men under the age of 45 from praying there, Ben-Ruby said.

On Friday, about 200 riot police streamed onto the compound shooting stun grenades and tear gas when some of the 3,000 Muslim worshippers there threw rocks at them. Clouds of tear gas rose into the sky and sharp booms pierced the air.

The compound — a catalyst for earlier rounds of Israel-Palestinian fighting — is home to the third holiest site in Islam and is believed to be the site where the Prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven.

Jews venerate the compound as the site of their biblical temples, and one of its outer walls — known as the Western Wall — is the holiest site in Judaism.

The Israelis say the purpose of the construction project is to build a new walkway leading to the mount to replace a ramp that was damaged in a 2004 snowstorm. But the Palestinians say the excavations are actually attempts to damage their shrines.

Israeli officials reject that accusation and say they are not digging under the compound since the work is about 200 feet away from the mount.

The Arab League chief said Saturday the dig reflects "Israeli attempts" to tighten control over Jerusalem and urged the international community to intercede.

"There are plans to change the features of the city," Amr Moussa said in a statement distributed to the Arab representatives at an emergency League meeting in Cairo. The statement said the construction "is threatening the security and stability in the region."

Jordan and Egypt — Israel's sole Arab peace partners and key U.S. allies in the region — have demanded the Jewish state stop the work, as did Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation.

Malaysia, which chairs the 57-member Organization of Islamic Conference, urged the international community to intervene immediately to stop the "illegal activities."

Protest Targets Tourists, Police (WT/AP)

By Ravi Nessman

The Washington Times, February 11, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Palestinian teenagers threw rocks at Israeli police and attacked a Canadian tourist bus yesterday in a new wave of protests against Israeli construction work near a flash point holy site in Jerusalem.

The violence came a day after police stormed the disputed compound in the Old City, using tear gas and stun grenades to disperse Muslims, who rioted after Friday prayers.

Protests against the construction have spread throughout the Muslim world, where demonstrators accused Israel of plotting to harm Islamic shrines.

Israel denies the repair work and accompanying excavations will come anywhere near the compound, known as the Temple Mount to Jews and the Noble Sanctuary to Muslims.

Sporadic violence continued yesterday as Palestinian teenagers set large garbage containers on fire in the streets of East Jerusalem just outside the Old City and threw rocks at police nearby.

Some of the rocks smashed the windows of cars parked on the side of the road. They also set fire to an Israeli flag. Other small protests broke out inside the Old City, police said.

The police, some on horseback and others in riot gear, responded by firing tear gas to disperse the protesters and arrested 15.

Angry Palestinians also pelted a bus carrying vacationing Canadians on a tour of the Mount of Olives holy site in East Jerusalem.

"We were just driving and all of a sudden a bunch of kids started picking up rocks and whatever they could get their hands on and started throwing it at the bus," said Dave Wood, one of the tourists. "This is our first day in the Holy City and it was quite disturbing to say the least."

A police station in East Jerusalem also was stoned, police spokesman Shmuel Ben-Ruby said. No one was injured in the incidents yesterday, he said.

Police kept a beefed-up force in the city and maintained restrictions at the holy site, barring all Muslim men under the age of 45 from praying there yesterday.

In the West Bank town of Bethlehem, dozens of Palestinians threw stones at Israeli soldiers, and the soldiers arrested 30 Palestinians, the army said.

In the southern West Bank city of Hebron, Palestinian youths threw stones at Israeli soldiers, who fired tear gas and rubber-coated steel bullets, witnesses said. Six protesters were treated for gas inhalation, medical officials said.

On Friday, about 200 riot police streamed into the Temple Mount compound and scuffled with some of the 3,000 Muslim worshippers there. Clouds of tear gas rose into the sky and sharp booms pierced the air.

The compound -- a catalyst for earlier rounds of Israel-Palestinian fighting -- is home to the golden-capped Dome of the Rock shrine and Al Aqsa mosque, and Muslims believe it to be the site where the prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven. It is the third-holiest site in Islam.

Jews venerate the compound as the site of their biblical temples, and one of its outer walls -- known as the Western Wall -- is the holiest site in Judaism.

Jewish Inroads In Muslim Quarter (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 11, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 10 -- From the roof of his home just inside the Old City walls, Palestinian landlord Nasser Karain has a view of the valleys and plateaus where scriptures say Solomon built the first Temple, Jesus was betrayed and Muhammad rose to heaven.

A new landmark may soon rise next to his family compound.

The Israeli government is funding the first construction of a Jewish settlement in the Old City's Muslim Quarter since taking control of it nearly four decades ago. The Flowers Gate development plan calls for more than 20 apartments and a domed synagogue that would alter the skyline of the Old City.

Karain's property is at the center of an accelerating campaign by Jewish settler organizations to change the ethnic and physical character of this city's oldest Arab neighborhoods. The Israeli government is financing projects that dovetail with the settlers' goals, which they say are to secure the Old City and an adjacent valley for Israel in any final peace agreement with the Palestinians.

Resistance is growing. Last week, Palestinians protested throughout the West Bank over an Israeli renovation project in the Old City, leading to some of the worst clashes with Israeli police in years. Surrounded by crenelated walls, the Old City is divided into four quarters -- Armenian, Christian, Jewish and Muslim -- that contain some of the holiest sites in Christendom, Islam and Judaism.

The Flowers Gate development would expand a nearby enclave where two Jewish families now live in red-roofed bungalows just feet from Karain's home. The settler organization Ateret Cohanim has begun showing prospective residents the strip of land designated for the synagogue and apartments.

Karain is watching the project encircle his compound. He said Jerusalem city officials have denied his many applications to add a second story to his home as his family has grown to include 33 grandchildren. His new neighbors, whose children are escorted to school by armed guards, have offered several times to buy his property for millions of dollars. He refused the most recent bid just months ago.

"I wouldn't want anyone in this place except family now," said Karain, born 63 years ago in the house he inherited from his father. "I'd be afraid they'd sell to settlers."

The settlers' parcel-by-parcel campaign is unfolding within a single square mile bordered by ancient ramparts and sheer valley walls. Israel seized the Old City, the adjacent valley known as the Holy Basin and the rest of East Jerusalem from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East war, later annexing them. The move gave the 250,000 Palestinians of East Jerusalem residency status and the right to vote in local elections, but the annexation is not recognized internationally.

The Jewish population of the Old City makes up about 9 percent of its 35,400 residents, nearly all concentrated in the Jewish Quarter. Under a U.S.-brokered agreement reached in January 2001, Israel would have maintained control of the Jewish Quarter and part of the Armenian Quarter. The Muslim and Christian Quarters would have come under Palestinian authority in the deal, which collapsed soon after.

Only a few dozen Jewish families live among the approximately 20,000 Palestinian residents of the Holy Basin, a picturesque crescent that encompasses the Kidron Valley, parts of the Mount of Olives, and the hillside neighborhood that Jews call the City of David and Palestinians call Wadi Hilweh. Israel suggested international oversight of the Holy Basin at the 2001 talks, an informal proposal the Palestinians rejected.

The effort to expand the Jewish presence in the Old City and Holy Basin, a cause of violent protest over the past century, had been largely dormant since a 1992 state commission found that government agencies were illegally channeling public funds to private settler organizations and allowing them insider access to seized Palestinian property.

That partnership has been revived in pursuit of identical goals. The same settler groups are working now in tandem with the government as they purchase Palestinian property at a time of deep recession in the occupied territories, build new housing and promote the Jewish historical claim to the Old City and Holy Basin. The Israeli government plans to spend $106 million in the area on housing development, tourist centers and historic renovation near contested religious sites through 2013 -- money that began flowing last year.

"The conflict is being reduced to its volcanic core," said Daniel Seidemann, a Jerusalem lawyer and critic of Israel's land-use policy in the city.The Old City

A short walk along sloping alleys from the Flowers Gate compound, the Via Dolorosa joins al-Wad Street, forming the crossroads of three faiths.

On any Friday afternoon, families of ultra-Orthodox Jews stroll among Muslim men, each heading toward the plateau that Jews know as the Temple Mount and Muslims as the Haram al-Sharif, or Noble Sanctuary. Christian pilgrims walk among them tracing Jesus's final steps, monitored by some of the 400 closed-circuit Israeli police cameras that continuously watch over the Old City.

Along the way, new signs depicting the sanctuary's 1,300-year-old al-Aqsa mosque hang above entrances to shawarma shops and boutiques. Funded by an Islamic organization in Israel as a response to new Jewish settlement activity, the signs emphasize the Islamic character of the quarter.

Ateret Cohanim, an organization named for the crown worn by members of the ancient Jewish priesthood, seeks to rebuild the Temple on the al-Aqsa site and is the primary settler group working within the Old City walls. To move Jews into the Muslim and Christian quarters, the group buys property in ways that have been challenged in court over the years. The 1992 Klugman Commission named it as a prime beneficiary of illegal government help.

"Our goal is to reestablish the Jewish presence in all of the Old City," said Ezra Waner, 26, a student at the Ateret Cohanim Yeshiva, which has existed periodically in the Muslim Quarter for 120 years. "Slowly, slowly, we want to bring the Jews back."

Jews control 75 to 80 buildings, homes and single stories of apartment complexes in the Muslim and Christian quarters, according to Israeli and Palestinian officials. Most of the properties, a small fraction of the total in those areas, are along routes to the Western Wall, where Jews pray at the base of the Temple Mount.

"Sometimes it takes 10 years of work just to buy one house," said Waner, who moved to Israel from South Africa 14 years ago. "And even then the Arabs will take everything out of it, even the electrical wiring, before turning it over."

The yeshiva entrance runs through a low, damp tunnel, just down al-Wad Street from the several-story building that Ariel Sharon, then Israel's infrastructure minister, bought in the 1980s. He purchased the place to create a symbolic Jewish presence in the Muslim Quarter, where Waner said 3,000 Jews lived during the British mandate that preceded Israel's founding in 1948.

Drifting out from behind locked gates, student prayers echo from crowded rooms where antique chandeliers provide young men the light to study the Torah and Talmud. During the 1936 Arab riots, the yeshiva's 100 or so students collected the Torah scrolls and fled. Waner said an Arab watchman held the keys, handing them to yeshiva officials after the 1967 war.

"Before the war there was no Muslim Quarter and no Jewish Quarter," Waner said in a book-lined room overflowing with young men. "We tell our stories. Soon all of them here will learn."

Adnan Husseini, the Jerusalem director of the Waqf, the Islamic land trust that has authority over the al-Aqsa mosque complex, traces his Palestinian family's Jerusalem roots back 800 years. His office overlooks the olive grove and cypress stands of the Haram al-Sharif, his centuries-old walls rising into vaulted ceilings above his cluttered desk.

"They have failed to control the city," he said. "And they will never succeed."

Husseini, a 59-year-old engineer wearing gold-rim half-glasses and a cardigan, said Jewish settlers with help from the Israeli government are "destroying the scale of the city" by pushing large symbolic projects in the Muslim Quarter and in contested religious areas.

He cited the Flowers Gate synagogue, which requires several more layers of approval, and the project to build a wider ramp from the Western Wall plaza to the Mugrabi Gate, the entrance to the mosque complex used by Israeli soldiers and tourists. Walls dating to the 7th-century Umayyad rule are threatened by the work, and Muslim concern prompted last week's protests.

"They want to create a new situation, a new conflict," Husseini said. "Jerusalem is in danger."

From the Old City ramparts above the Flowers Gate project, Jon Seligman, Jerusalem director of the Israel Antiquities Authority, looked toward a horizon spiked with spires and minarets. The only Jewish buildings that once appeared there were a pair of synagogues, destroyed by Jordan during its nearly two-decade reign.

"Whether a Jewish presence on the skyline is appropriate is something that can be legitimately raised," said Seligman, referring to the Flowers Gate synagogue. "It is something that is present for all other major religions here except Judaism."

More than half of Seligman's budget comes from construction projects that require preliminary excavations, which at the Flowers Gate site have revealed the thick stone walls of a 600-year-old Arab neighborhood. Plans call for the synagogue to be built above it.The Holy Basin

Just outside the Old City walls, the beige limestone hillside dips sharply to the Kidron Valley floor. Homes with arched windows and iron balconies are packed tightly along narrow streets, where Jewish settler groups have been buying Palestinian property and moving in behind high fences and guard towers.

But the hillside expanses of Jewish and Muslim cemeteries, strips of parkland and the remnants of ancient stone walls have given Jewish settler groups in the Holy Basin more to work with than in the cramped confines of the Old City -- open land and an abundance of archaeological sites useful in promoting the historic Jewish claim to the area.

Stone steps 2,000 years old rise from the Siloam Pool, climbing into a tunnel toward the Western Wall hundreds of feet above. Among the few people who have seen the recently discovered steps is David Beeri, a spry 53-year-old whose organization is financing the excavation.

"Every step is important," said Beeri, founder of Elad, a private organization that moves Jewish settlers into the Holy Basin, oversees its main archaeological sites and finances new digs. "Every step is a story."

The story that brought Beeri to this place began before his birth. His father was saved from a firing-squad pit at Auschwitz by a German officer he had befriended -- giving his future son "a mission" to work on behalf of Jews.

Beeri first saw the City of David in the 1980s as a soldier disguised as an Arab in an army undercover unit. After the first Palestinian uprising ended with the 1993 Oslo accords, he moved his wife and six children into a hillside house he said he bought from a Palestinian family through a third party.

Beeri pointed to large holes at the edges of the steps that revealed a musty tunnel beneath. Israeli archaeologists have discovered food-storage jars and coins dating to the 1st-century Jewish rebellion against the Romans. According to Roman histories, soldiers pulled escaping Jewish rebels from a tunnel, slaying them with swords. Beeri believes this is the place it happened.

"The Romans are no longer here, but we have come back," he said.

Beeri's organization, Elad, works with the National Parks Protection Authority, the Jerusalem municipality and the Jewish National Fund, an agency that controls large tracts of land in the Holy Basin purchased in the 1920s by Baron Edmond James de

Rothschild. The Klugman Commission said government agencies gave Elad privileged access to at least two dozen houses in the area, including some seized from Palestinians under the absentee-property law Israel imposed after the 1948 war.

Elad says it and its partners control more than 55 percent of the Holy Basin. The organization owns the City of David visitors center, the entrance to some of Jerusalem's most important archaeological sites. Elad officials say 250,000 visitors came to the center last year -- a tenfold increase from 2001.

Beeri's house is on a path paved with cut stones and lined with the same street signs seen in the city's western neighborhoods. Israeli critics say the intention is to make the neighborhood indistinguishable from West Jerusalem.

"This area poses enormous challenges for the Palestinian national movement," said Meir Margalit, a Jew and former Jerusalem councilman now with the nonprofit Israeli Committee Against House Demolitions. "The biggest problem here is temptation. The settlers come with suitcases full of cash and say, 'Take it.' "

Elad sometimes offers three times the market rate for homes near important archaeological sites, Beeri said. "We must do this in a legal way on the free market. And in doing so, we think we can change the future of this part of Jerusalem."

Over the years, several dozen Jewish families have moved into homes that Elad has purchased from Palestinians, some of whom faced demolition orders from the Jerusalem city government for building or expanding without proper permits.

"At times we are pushed to despair," said Fakhri Abu Diab, 44, a Palestinian who heads a homeowners group in the area along the Kidron Valley floor. His house, set in a courtyard of lemon and olive trees, sage and wild thyme, is among 88 in the area slated for demolition to make way for an Israeli national park.

The demolition orders were frozen two years ago, amid protest. But they have not been lifted, and Abu Diab and his neighbors continue to pay fines for building without permits. Margalit, the former Jerusalem councilman, said only about 120 permits were granted in East Jerusalem last year.

That is one-tenth the number needed to accommodate growth, Israeli critics say. They contend the dearth drives Palestinians to look elsewhere for room to raise families. Just up the hill, Beeri is putting in a new floor and adding rooms to his house.

"A human being is at the end only a human being, and there is only so much he can take," said Abu Diab, the Palestinian, who grew up swimming in the Siloam Pool, where the Bible says Jesus cured a blind man, now behind locked gates controlled by Elad and the park service. "But the majority of us remain steadfast."

Most Palestinians have resisted offers to sell their homes, facing deadly reprisals if they accept. But settler leaders said two recent developments have made it easier for Jews to acquire Palestinian property.

The international aid boycott of the Palestinian Authority imposed after Hamas's election a year ago has ravaged the economy in the territories, prompting more Palestinians in East Jerusalem to sell their land out of financial necessity. In addition, they said, the 24-foot-high wall Israel is building around Jerusalem has nearly sealed the city off from the West Bank, home to armed Palestinian groups opposed to selling property to settlers, offering a sense of protection for those who do sell.

But the threat has not disappeared. In April, a Palestinian father of eight, Mohammed Abu al-Hawa, sold his apartment building in the A-Tur neighborhood of the Mount of Olives, which lies on Israel's side of the wall. Days later his body was found tortured and burned near Jericho. The purchase marked the first Jewish foothold in the neighborhood, which has a vivid view of the Temple Mount stretching across the ridgeline to the west.

Portugal To Vote On Putting End To Abortion Ban (NYT)

By Elaine Sciolino

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

LISBON, Feb. 9 — Last week, children from two Roman Catholic day-care centers in the port city of Setúbal were sent home with a most unusual note: a fictional letter from a fetus to the woman who conceived and aborted it.

“Mommy, how were you able to kill me?” the letter read. “How were you able to allow me to be cut up in pieces and thrown into a bucket?”

The Rev. Miguel Alves, the day-care center director who sent the letters, defended his action as perfectly normal, adding, “There’s no reason for indignation.”

The letter reflects one view in a passionate, often raw campaign to sway voters before a referendum this Sunday on whether Portugal should decriminalize abortion.

But it infuriated abortion-rights advocates and some of the children’s parents, and it even made some opponents of the referendum uneasy.

“It was completely incorrect, low class,” said Manuel de Lemos, a lawyer who runs a confederation of Catholic charitable organizations and opposes liberalization of the law. He added: “Yes, abortion is an issue for the Catholic Church. But it is also a moral issue. Preserving life is essential in a civilized world. And we should do all that we can to create the conditions for women to avoid the trauma, the violence of abortion."

With one of the most restrictive abortion laws in the European Union, Portugal is also the only member state that has put on trial women who undergo illegal abortions, the health care providers who perform them and even so-called accomplices like husbands or family members.

The referendum, if approved, would be the first step toward both legalizing abortion in the first 10 weeks of pregnancy and allowing women to openly seek medical support from the state-run health system. In that case, Parliament is expected to pass it quickly into law.

But in this overwhelmingly Catholic country, the referendum has pitted the Socialist government against the Roman Catholic Church and exposed divisions within the church itself.

It has recalled the stories of botched backstreet abortions that ended in mutilation and even death, and the humiliation of women who have been charged and tried. And it has set off a debate on whether more than three decades after the end of its dictatorship, Portugal has become a "modern" European country.

"This is an important moment for Portugal because it's a chance to shed the image that we are in the Middle Ages," said Maria de Belém Roseira, a Socialist deputy and a former health minister. "We had the Inquisition here, and we still have people who want to publicly punish women. That a woman who ends an unwanted pregnancy can be sent to prison is unacceptable and hypocritical."

Women who have been prosecuted for having abortions have been punished not with prison but with suspended sentences and a fine. But health-care professionals have been punished more severely. In one highly publicized trial that ended in 2002, a hospital nurse spent four years in prison for conducting illegal abortions.

The criminal aspect of abortion here is widely seen as unfair to women, even by much of the church and supporters of the no vote.

"This practice is so stupid, so inhumane," said Marcelo Rebelo de Sousa, a political commentator and the former leader of the center-right Social Democratic Party who opposes approval of the referendum. "This is very Portuguese — you have the law and you have the social reality."

The validity of the referendum hinges on whether more than 50 percent of the country's 8.8 million voters cast their ballots. A similar referendum in 1998 took place on a sunny Sunday in June, when many Portuguese were at the beach. Only 32 percent of the electorate turned up at the polls, voting by a razor-thin margin to retain the existing law. The result was declared invalid.

Last fall, opinion polls showed that more than 70 percent of voters supported a change in the law, although recent surveys indicate a drop in support to slightly less than 60 percent. Several polls have shown that about 40 percent are either undecided or will not vote.

The referendum has touched off the memories of women who had illegal abortions many years ago.

"There is still a stigma," said one 46-year-old educator who said she was only now able to talk to her friends about the abortion she had 18 years ago.

She and her boyfriend split the cost of the abortion, which was done by a midwife in the city of Porto. When she went for a follow-up checkup the next day, the midwife told her to look at what was in her hand. "She held up the broken fetus and said, 'See how beautiful it is. And now, into the garbage,' " she recalled.

The campaign has played out on the streets, on the Web, in churches, in health clinics and in the corridors of power.

On Thursday, two dozen Socialist members of Parliament carried green and white flags with the word sim, or yes, through one of Lisbon's main squares, buttonholing potential voters on their lunch hours. At a headquarters for youth for the no vote a few blocks away, young people sold T-shirts and handed out brochures. Plastic fetuses made in China were kept hidden in a box under the table, but were available upon request for $1.30.

Prime Minister José Sócrates, a Socialist whose center-left government enjoys a comfortable majority in Parliament, has campaigned hard in favor of the referendum, calling the country's estimated tens of thousands of illegal abortions every year "Portugal's most shameful wound."

Arguing for the official church position, Cardinal José da Cruz Policarpo, the patriarch of Lisbon, has told Catholics to uphold the "sanctity of life" and oppose any change to Portuguese law, saying the balance of Europe's race and culture is at risk as a result of low birth rates.

The practice of abortion in Portugal is among the most restrictive in the 25-country European Union. Only a few countries, including Malta (where all abortion is illegal), Ireland and Poland, have tougher laws.

Despite a legal morning-after pill and contraception use by 80 percent of women of fertility age, Portugal has the second-highest pregnancy rate among teenagers in Europe, second only to Britain.

The current law in Portugal, passed in 1984, allows abortion until the 12th week of pregnancy in case of "mental and physical risk," until 16 weeks in case of rape, until 24 weeks in case of a malformed fetus and at any time if the woman's life is in danger. It calls for prison sentences of up to three years for a woman who has an illegal abortion and up to eight years for the person who illegally performs it.

But the availability of abortion is complicated by the medical profession's narrow interpretation of the existing law. Portugal's conservative psychiatric hierarchy has ruled that an unwanted pregnancy can be a mental health issue only in the most extreme cases; most medical doctors are unwilling to challenge the conventional wisdom.

By contrast, in Spain, which has a similar law, the legislation is liberally interpreted, and abortions are routinely performed. That has created a lucrative market for legal abortions in Spain for those Portuguese women who can afford to travel there.

The Portuguese newspapers carry advertisements every day of clinics over the border in Spain offering "voluntary treatment" of pregnancy.

Even within the clergy, there are divisions. On Thursday, a 79-year-old priest, the Rev. Manuel Costa Pinto, from the small town of Lamego, stunned the church hierarchy in declaring that he planned to vote yes.

"I don't take it lightly," he said of his decision, according to the news agency Lusa. "I know my responsibility as a Catholic and as a priest."

Calling the current law the "real infanticide," he described the crisis of women who are too poor and too afraid to terminate their pregnancies illegally. "They put their babies into a bag and throw them into the garbage, into the gutters" or "abandon them in the middle of the fields," he said.

The referendum will ask the question: "Do you agree with the decriminalization of a woman's choice to voluntarily interrupt pregnancy in the first 10 weeks, in a legally authorized health establishment?"

Supporters of the referendum have radically changed their strategy from 1998. Then, the campaign was distinctly feminist. "My belly is mine and I'll do what I want with it" was the slogan.

This time, the yes side has emphasized the importance of the health and safety of women and the need to eliminate the thriving and sometimes unsafe black market.

"There has always been a double standard in Portugal toward abortion, and that's what we want to eliminate," said Duarte Vilar, executive director of Portugal's Family Planning Association. "Even if we are Catholic, we are a soft Catholic country."

Bosnia Defies U.N. Over Dismissals In Police (NYT)

By Nicholas Wood

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

LJUBLJANA, Slovenia, Feb. 9 — Acting against the wishes of the United Nations Security Council, the Bosnian government said Friday that it would review the status of almost 800 federal and local police officers that the United Nations barred from working in 2002.

In a challenge to the United Nations, Bosnian officials said a commission was examining whether police officers were unfairly barred from employment, either on the grounds that they might have committed crimes during the 1992-1995 civil war, or on the grounds that they were not properly qualified.

The officers were dismissed in 2002 as the United Nations mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina was ending. The United Nations had a mandate to overhaul the country's police forces after the war, but only five months to check the backgrounds of the officers. The government argues that the review performed by the United Nations was flawed and rushed, and that many officers could not appeal the dismissals.

The officers have gained widespread support among Bosnia's three main ethnic groups. But the issue also has taken on a broader significance because a number of international authorities have backed the government and said mistakes were made by the United Nations during the vetting process. The government's previous demands of the United Nations to re-examine the vetting process have been supported by the office of the High Representative, Christian Schwarz-Schilling of Germany, who is Bosnia's most-senior international official, as well as Europe's main human-rights authority, the Council of Europe.

The criticisms go to the heart of the United Nations mission here and the broad freedoms it had in exerting its powers.

The origins of the dispute date to the final months of the United Nations mission in Bosnia and Herzegovina, when it needed to vet 18,000 police officers serving in 16 forces across the country. The process involved checking qualifications from schools, checking backgrounds with investigators at the United Nations war crimes tribunal in the Netherlands, and ensuring that officers had completed human-rights courses.

Subsequently, 793 officers were denied certification and dismissed from their jobs. Many of the police officers said they had not been told sufficiently and clearly why they had failed the vetting process, or they had not been truly able to appeal. The United Nations mission in Bosnia concluded its work at the end of 2002, and handed it over to a European Union-led police monitoring mission. Many officers began to dispute the United Nations decisions in Bosnian courts. In some cases, the courts concluded that there had been unlawful dismissal.

In June 2004, the secretariat of the United Nations helped draft a statement warning the Bosnian authorities not to challenge its decisions, and expressing concern that the government was not standing up to the police officers. For a time, the government stopped reviewing the cases but public pressure grew.

On Friday, a senior official in Bosnia's human rights ministry confirmed that the commission had been formed and that it would make its recommendations when the new government is in place next week.

A spokesman for the office of the Secretary General in New York declined to comment Friday on the United Nations' policy.

A report expected to be released this weekend by the European Stability Initiative, a research and policy group, takes aim at the United Nations secretariat, saying it failed to inform Security Council members about the extent of the problems with the vetting process.

After Castro Dies, Will There Be Chaos Or Calm? (LAT)

By Scott Gold

MIAMI — Ramon Saul Sanchez has put out the call: "Get ready. We're going to Cuba."

Sanchez, 52, the founder of a Miami group called the Democracy Movement, or Movimiento Democracia, has led flotillas toward Cuba's territorial water to protest the regime of Fidel Castro and what he believes is deeply flawed U.S. policy toward the island nation.

When Castro dies, he said, he plans to sail for the island with generators, medicine and other supplies — and bring word that "freedom is on its way."

Military leaders, law enforcement officials and aid organizations preparing for the Cuban leader's death are hoping for a calm and measured response on both sides of the Florida Straits.

They are well aware, however, that Castro's death could lead to a turbulent series of events — even an international incident, they fear, if Sanchez and other Cuban American leaders in South Florida sail for the island in large numbers.

Knowing the passion that Castro evokes — passion that could overwhelm even the best planning — officials are unsure whether they should be preparing for chaos or calm, or something in between.

"We've been waiting a long time for this. Realistically, anything can happen," said Andy S. Gomez, an assistant provost at the University of Miami and a senior fellow at the Institute for Cuban and Cuban-American Studies. Gomez has briefed federal officials on the spectrum of events that could unfold after Castro's death.

It has been six months since Castro, 80, underwent emergency intestinal surgery and provisionally ceded power to Raul Castro, 75, his brother and defense minister. Recent footage released by the Cuban government appeared to show that Fidel Castro had regained strength and weight. But reports that he is in "grave" condition, coupled with U.S. intelligence officials' grim appraisals of his health, have prompted authorities to put preparations in overdrive.

Officials in South Florida believe a composed response to Castro's death is most likely.

In that scenario, Raul Castro would seamlessly maintain control through a blend of modest economic reform and political tactics. On the island, he would be seen as the face of a brighter future, giving Cubans little reason to flee. In Florida, Cuban Americans would demonstrate and celebrate — the largest event would probably be held at the 80,000-person-capacity Orange Bowl — but would generally heed calls for restraint.

But upheaval is possible. In what officials perceive as the worst case, the Cuban government would collapse, prompting a dangerous mass migration out of and into Cuba. Cubans fleeing the island and Cuban Americans trying to get in from Florida could meet in the middle of the Straits, creating a crisis that could overwhelm rescuers and further erode the stability of Latin America.

"You want to plan. You don't want to have to put the plans in motion," said Sam Tidwell, chief executive of the American Red Cross of Greater Miami & the Keys and a leader in the effort to prepare for Castro's death.

Law enforcement officials are holding tabletop exercises of emergency plans and laying the groundwork to restrict the sale of gasoline in Florida or to close marinas so Cuban Americans can't make a run for the island. On Spanish-language radio stations, authorities are pleading with Cuban Americans to stay home.

Military officials believe that if American activists try to get to Cuba, they will disrupt the official response to Castro's death and perhaps put more strain on relations between Cuba and the United States.

If even a single Cuban American group tried to make its way to the island, "it would be a very serious risk," said Marielena A. Villamil, a member of the American Red Cross board of directors and an owner of an economic consulting firm in Coral Gables, Fla.

"We don't know what the situation will be in Cuba," said Villamil, who is also involved in preparations for Castro's death. "Would they be welcomed with open arms? Or with arms — weapons?"

A network of aid groups, meanwhile, is preparing to help reunite families, coordinate donations and care for refugees in the event of an exodus from Cuba to the United States.

Delicate tasks could lie ahead in Florida.

For instance, some officials have debated whether Castro's death could force them to alter the "wet-foot, dry-foot" immigration policy, which typically repatriates Cubans interdicted at sea but generally allows those who reach U.S. soil to stay.

If the policy were altered, the federal government could find itself detaining refugees who made it to the United States, Tidwell said. At that point, the Red Cross, founded as a neutral caregiver, would be prohibited by its bylaws from providing any assistance, he said.

"We can be helpful in places where people are being processed but not where people are being detained," Tidwell said. "If there are political decisions being made — if people are no longer free to go — we pull out."

The bulk of preparations in the U.S. for Castro's death aims to ensure that is not an issue — by preventing any mass migration.

Authorities are planning extensive water patrols to stop boaters trying to reach the United States. Most refugees would be returned to Cuba, either to a port or to Guantanamo Bay, a U.S. naval base, where military officials would house them in large tents or other temporary structures until they could return home.

Communication, coordination between government agencies, and intelligence inside Cuba, among other factors, are much improved since officials were caught off-guard by the Mariel boatlift of 1980, which brought an estimated 125,000 Cubans to Florida.

"We've learned quite a bit," said Miami-Dade County Assistant Fire Chief Carlos J. Castillo. "I don't see anything approaching Mariel."

Authorities believe Raul Castro would probably view a large exodus after his brother's death as a discrediting sign of dissent within his regime, and would probably deploy the military to prohibit it. They also believe that the response to Castro's death could be muted because the transition between the brothers has brought little sign of unrest.

Through intelligence sources, U.S. officials are monitoring signs of boat building in Cuba and have found no evidence of an increase, said Coast Guard Lt. Cmdr. Chris O'Neil.

"The passing of Fidel Castro, in and of itself, is not going to create a mass migration," he said.

Others disagree. Some involved in the preparations worry that there won't be enough boats to police the Florida Straits. Others question whether Raul Castro has the clout or the charisma to hold Cuba together.

Gomez, of the University of Miami, predicts that 500,000 people will head for Florida within a year of Castro's death.

"We do not have the infrastructure to handle that kind of migration," he said. "You will see a large humanitarian crisis."

Over lunch in Miami's Little Havana, Ramon Saul Sanchez outlined his group's plans. A businessman has donated the use of 400 feet of dock space on the Miami River, he said, from which Sanchez plans to launch boats toward Cuba, including a ferry that can carry 50 passengers to the island, as well as 20 tons of cargo.

He has two cargo planes on call and is amassing supplies at a large storage space, he said.

Sanchez believes Cuba's government may collapse after Castro dies. With the communist government in control of so many functions, such as food distribution, that could mean a collapse of civic structure, Sanchez said.

Therefore, he said, the only way to avoid a migration from Cuba is to go to the island immediately after Castro's death, against the wishes of both nations' militaries and government leaders, with supplies and a message of hope.

"What we intend to do helps the U.S. interest, because it diminishes the chance of a mass exodus to the United States," he said.

"We have moral leverage, and we intend to use it."

Inflation, Food Scarcity Roil Venezuela (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, February 11, 2007

CARACAS, VENEZUELA — Police swooped down last week on a grimy central market district, forced open a warehouse and seized 7 tons of a white substance. It wasn't cocaine. The contraband was sugar, and the seizure of at least 184 tons nationwide showed how President Hugo Chavez's efforts to remake the economy are fraying at the edges.

DOJ_NMG_0130726

The bust near the Quinta Crespo market came as double-digit inflation and scarcity have hit Venezuela's markets. The seizures were efforts to strike at what one Chavez supporter, Carabobo Gov. Luis Felipe Acosta, said was hoarding by "terrorist capitalists who want to destroy the country."

But economists and industry officials describe the raids as the latest in a sequence of hamhanded, politically motivated attempts to rein in market forces beyond Chavez's control. Inflation and the development of a huge underground market in goods including sugar were simply symptoms of mismanagement, they say.

Venezuela is rolling in oil wealth with about $46 billion in energy sales last year, and there is little risk of a financial crisis in the near term. Chavez in recent years has tried to transfer much of the wealth to the poor via welfare programs including cheap or free housing, the donation of cash and government assets to worker cooperatives and free education.

Among the most ambitious and popular programs has been the establishment of the Mercal retail chain. Since early 2003, the network of about 14,000 retail outlets mainly in poor barrios, has sold basic foodstuffs and household goods at discounts of 35% off standard supermarket prices.

Chavez has imposed price controls on a variety of goods, such as 29 basic food items produced in Venezuela including beans, cooking oil, meat and chicken. He also has imported such goods as Uruguayan pasta and Brazilian pork that are resold to the poor at greatly reduced costs, thanks to government subsidies.

But mismanagement, rampant corruption and scarcities have cut into Mercal's operations. At the same time, low prices set by the government have caused manufacturers and other suppliers either to cut production or divert output to an enormous black market.

A recent government report found that Mercal sales in November fell in volume to half that of a year earlier and that customers were increasingly unhappy with how the stores were run and what they sold. In January, Chavez shuffled Mercal's management, expressing dismay that huge quantities of goods were unaccounted for.

"This can't be. We should be going forward, not backward," Chavez said in a Jan. 21 broadcast to the nation.

The suspicion is that much of the inventory is siphoned off before the products reach the shelves, sold either to the domestic underground market or exported as contraband to Brazil, Colombia or Caribbean countries.

At the same time, the flood of cash washing over Venezuela from oil sales has caused demand for all goods — watches and whiskey, detergent and SUVs — to climb, adding inflationary pressure. In the last week, Venezuela's central bank released figures showing that inflation rose in January to an annual rate of more than 25%, twice the national target.

A survey by researchers at the National Federation of Teachers found that basic food prices increased in the 12-month period that ended Jan. 31.

Food prices are rising faster than the increases in minimum wages that the government pushed through last year. The reigniting of inflation threatens the poor constituency Chavez is trying to help, economists say.

Scarcity of items such as sugar, beans and meat and empty supermarket shelves dominated the headlines here last week. Meat disappeared for several days after slaughterhouses shut down, saying they couldn't afford to process meat at the prices set by the government.

A sugar industry source said production had fallen because prices the industry received were lower than farmers' cost of production and because the government-sponsored takeover of sugar cane plantations had cut productivity.

In Yaracuy, a prime sugar-producing state west of Caracas, the capital, 80% of plantations have been taken over by farmer cooperatives, the source said.

In the poor Caracas suburb of Catia on Saturday, sugar and chicken were being rationed at a Mercal shop for the first time in a week. "I came in the morning and waited two hours for milk. Now I'm back in line waiting for chicken, one to a family," said Marietta Abreu, as she stood with 100 other customers.

"It's the fault of the street vendors," she said, referring to the informal merchants who sell the black-market goods. "They're always ahead of the game."

The government is trying to retain its grip by taking measures that at times seem highly improvisational. Justifying the seizure of the sugar Thursday, officials declared it was illegal for sugar to remain in storage for more than three days.

The government said it would ease the meat shortage by importing beef from Bolivia before someone pointed out that imports from Bolivia were banned because of threat of foot-and-mouth disease.

Last week, the government announced it was forming a state-run company to buy and sell meat and fish. Previously, Caracas city officials began a crackdown on the tens of thousands of street vendors in a bid to clean up the city and inhibit the informal market.

In the Quinta Crespo market and in the informal stalls that surround it, sugar and tuna were being sold under the table for three times the government-mandated prices, eggs and meat for twice the prescribed prices.

"The government wants all the power, but they can't control how we think. This is a free country," said a street vendor who was selling black beans at twice the regulated price of 45 cents a half-kilo.

After So Many Deaths, Too Many Births (NYT)

MAYANGE, Rwanda

CONVINCING women in the deeply impoverished Rwandan countryside that they should have fewer children is a daunting task. "They say we're not Christian," said Jeannette Mukabalisa, a local health advocate, of the predominantly Catholic population. "They say, 'You're town people, we're traditional.' Children bring these families prestige. For them, children come from God. So it's difficult, very difficult."

After the 1994 genocide, in which more than 800,000 Rwandans were slaughtered, it seemed difficult to believe that overpopulation would ever be a problem. Yet Rwanda has long had more people than its meager resources and small area can support.

In a recent interview, President Paul Kagame said he was preparing a sweeping population control program, to be unveiled in the coming months, that would aim to cut Rwanda's birth rate by at least half.

"We recognize we are late on this," Mr. Kagame said.

After the genocide, officials were reluctant to promote population control because they feared it would offend the survivors, who believed they had a right to replenish what they had lost.

"Because of the genocide, many people didn't want to hear about birth control," said Odette Nyiramilimo, a legislator who proposed a bill last year that would have given incentives and detailed disincentives for families to limit themselves to three children. Previous efforts had been opposed by officials who told Ms. Nyiramilimo that education, not population, was the problem.

But nearly half of Rwanda's legislators are female, and Ms. Nyiramilimo is among several who have spent years pushing for a serious population control effort.

The country's population has quadrupled over the last half-century. Today Rwanda has 8.8 million people; most are subsistence farmers. If current fertility rates are not curbed — Rwandan women bear an average of 6.1 children — the population will double by 2030. That would almost certainly doom Mr. Kagame's ambitious plan to raise Rwanda from poverty over that same period.

"The last government's philosophy was that the country was too small for all Rwandans," said Dr. Richard Sezibera, a close adviser to Mr. Kagame, referring to the rulers who oversaw the genocide. "We insisted that the country was big enough to accommodate everybody. But many people took that to apply to the unborn as well, and we're having to face that mind-set."

Dr. Sezibera and President Kagame, like many members of the minority Tutsi group that suffered the brunt of the genocide, were forced out of Rwanda decades ago and grew up as refugees.

Officials who are designing the new population control program said it would include a requirement that everyone who visits a hospital or health center for any reason be counseled on family planning. Women of child-bearing age will be offered free contraceptive devices including Norplant II, a small silicone pin that is inserted beneath the skin and is effective for up to five years. All schools will offer comprehensive sex education courses.

"The basis for this new campaign is already in place," said Laura Hoemeke, director of the Twubakane Decentralization and Health Project, a community initiative that includes family planning. Though the Bush administration has often discouraged birth control, the United States government is financing this program.

Political opposition to population control measures has melted away as it has become clear that President Kagame now strongly favors them.

In a sign of the changing climate, a government-sponsored newspaper, New Times, recently published a supplement with a front-page headline, "Rapid Population Growth: A Constraint on Resources." Below was a photo of an idyllic landscape with the caption, "This beautiful scenery will diminish if population is not controlled." An accompanying editorial said that Rwanda's population "is already big enough" and that "drastic measures" were needed to keep it from growing.

Officials designing the population control campaign say they hope to produce a plan that could become a model for other African countries, and perhaps persuade a foreign philanthropy to pay its entire cost. They have already begun consulting specialists from the United States and other countries.

Though Rwanda is predominantly Catholic, the church's leaders here are not expected to oppose a campaign for population control. A number of priests, nuns and lay workers participated in the 1994 genocide, which weakened the church's moral authority, and has led it to avoid politics.

President Kagame said he thought the church might present a problem, but noted that it had already showed a flexibility that might not have been expected on issues like AIDS education and condom distribution. "They do not come out and preach, as we do, but they do not actively oppose what we are doing," he said.

According to Josh Ruxin, an American public health administrator based in Rwanda, the rate of Rwandans living in extreme poverty declined from 60.4 percent to 56.6 percent from 2001 to 2006. Mr. Ruxin is helping to design the new population control project. "If Rwanda wants to be an Asian tiger," he said, "this is where it all starts."

Death By Dollars (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, February 11, 2007

So is your Fidelity account underwriting genocide in Sudan? Is your pension fund helping finance the janjaweed militias that throw babies into bonfires in Darfur and Chad?

The answer to both questions is complicated but may be yes, and that's one reason a divestment campaign is gaining strength around America and abroad. Six states (including California) have already begun divesting from companies active in Sudan, and legislation is pending in 23 more states, including New York.

More than 30 universities, beginning with Harvard in 2005, have sold certain Sudan-related investments. Five cities have divested, and New York is considering doing so. A bill before Congress would bar certain companies active in Sudan from receiving federal contracts.

Let's start by acknowledging that divestment and economic sanctions generally fail. The closest thing to a success was the way they helped topple white rule in South Africa in the 1980s, but even there one result was greater hardship for ordinary blacks.

Elsewhere, divestment and economic sanctions have mostly been counterproductive. Our Cuban embargo has hurt Cubans but cemented Fidel Castro in power; our sanctions against Myanmar have inflicted tremendous pain on Burmese without dislodging the brutal government.

So I'm against economic sanctions in almost every case. But Sudan is an exception, a rare instance where narrowly focused divestment makes practical as well as moral sense.

Partly that's because Sudan's economy depends on foreign oil companies, giving the outside world leverage. And 70 percent of Sudan's oil revenue goes to weaponry, like bayonets used to gouge out people's eyes.

The oil companies in Sudan aren't American; the biggest players are Chinese companies. Pressure on them is also one way to get the attention of the Chinese government, which is Sudan's main protector in the U.N. Security Council.

So in this case pressure on a small number of foreign companies could help get Sudan's attention, and that of its protectors in China, without hurting ordinary people. And Sudan has shown that it can be nudged and embarrassed into behaving better: the best example is the way that pressure (including economic sanctions) led Sudan's leaders to end their brutal war in southern Sudan in 2005.

Fortunately, the Darfur divestment campaign has been remarkably restrained in choosing targets. Organizers are not seeking divestment from all of the more than 400 foreign companies that operate in Sudan, but only from a few dozen that are complicit in genocide without helping ordinary Sudanese. (See the guidelines at www.SudanDivestment.org, developed largely by a recent U.C.L.A. graduate, Adam Sterling.)

"People are surprised to find out that Royal Dutch Shell is not a targeted company by us, even though they are an oil firm and operate in Sudan," notes Mark Hanis, who runs the Genocide Intervention Network (which has a divestment hot line, 1-800-GENOCIDE). That's because Shell sells gas in Sudan at a retail level, rather than enriching the army through production, Mr. Hanis said, and less than 5 percent of those sales are believed to be to the government.

More than other money managers, Fidelity has resisted the pressure and clung firmly to Sudan-related investments. So Darfur campaigners are urging investors to avoid Fidelity mutual funds: more information is at www.FidelityOutofSudan.com.

The biggest U.S. investor in Class H shares of PetroChina, a Chinese oil concern whose parent company is active in Sudan, is Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway. I have huge respect for Mr. Buffett, and he may be thinking: My obligation is to make money for shareholders, not to use their investments in a dubious attempt to save the world. But surely if Berkshire Hathaway and Fidelity mutual funds saw lucrative opportunities in selling bayonets to the janjaweed, they would balk at that. We do have limits; the question is where we draw them.

In this case, the cost of divestment to fund managers or investors is negligible, and there is a real prospect that the strategy will add enough attention, embarrassment and pressure that Sudan will stop slaughtering Darfuris — just as it has stopped massacring people in southern Sudan.

It's not a sure thing. But remember that in Darfur and Chad, aid workers — some of them Americans — are being killed, raped and beaten as they try to alleviate the slaughter. So shouldn't we make the minimal sacrifice of divestment, rather than blithely continue to invest in ways that provide grenades and guns to kill aid workers and Darfuris alike? <NYT_TAGLINE>

TERRORISM NEWS:

Five British Muslims Arraigned In Terror Plot Probe. The New York Times (2/10, A7, Cowell, 1.16M) describes the transfer to London of five Britons accused of plotting to kill a Muslim British soldier, and the arrest yesterday of a sixth alleged accomplice. "Of the five who faced terrorism charges in court on Friday, only one, Parviz Khan, 36, was specifically charged with engaging 'in conduct to give effect to his intention to kidnap and kill a member of the British armed forces.'" The "five suspects who appeared in court on Friday were ordered to be held until a hearing on Feb. 23. The police in Birmingham said the case had been referred to a London court under protocols covering terrorism cases." The arrests late last month of "nine suspects in Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, stirred worries and anger among many Muslims, who said they believed that the police action and extensive coverage by television and newspapers had further stigmatized Islam. One of the three men released after the arrests said Britain had become a police state for Muslims." The Washington Post (2/10, A13, Sullivan, 690K) reports the plot is "widely seen as a new kind of extremist threat in Britain."

Prosecutors Contend Padilla Competent To Stand Trial. The Washington Post (2/10, A18, 690K) reports, "An evaluation of suspected al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons has found him competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, government attorneys said in court documents filed Friday. Padilla 36, can understand the court proceedings and communicate with his attorneys, according to prosecutors' description of the report's conclusions." Padilla "contends that he was tortured in custody. His attorneys say he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Key House Members Claim DHS Budget Is Inadequate. The Washington Times (2/10, Seper, 88K) reports House Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson this week "challenged" Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "to explain how his agency's budget was adequate to guard against a terrorist attack or another Katrinalike disaster, saying 'we cannot continue to protect the homeland on the cheap.'" Thompson "said President Bush's proposed $35 billion Homeland Security budget does not address necessary funding for key programs and leaves the nation vulnerable to terrorists and natural disasters." Ranking member Peter King "also questioned whether the department's budgeting process needed revamping, saying agency officials were basing spending increases on a 2003 budget 'guesstimate' when the agency was formed."

Bush Budget Accelerates "Realignment" Of Federal Protective Service. The Washington Times (2/10, Waterman, 88K) reports President Bush's 2008 budget "proposes cuts to the Federal Protective Service, police that guard U.S. government buildings, a move labor unions say will be 'the last nail in the coffin' of the agency that is being replaced by private contractors. Administration officials say changes to the agency in the Department of Homeland Security improve efficiency without sacrificing security, and that private security firms already guard the vast majority of federal buildings."

Some Dallas Residents Worry Bush Library Will Become Terror Target. The Dallas Morning News (2/10, Holland, 500K) reports, "Terrorists will destroy the Bush library and take out most of the Park Cities at the same time. The question isn't if but when, says Sam Boyd, a Park Cities lawyer. Mr. Boyd isn't alone. A number of Park Cities residents say they fear that building the presidential library in University Park would be like painting a big, red target on their community." But "security and terrorism experts have mixed sentiments. Although some say presidential libraries are unlikely targets, others say Bush's library may change that because the president is such a polarizing figure worldwide."

Veteran Federal Judge Plays Central Role In Post-Katrina Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B1, Pleven, Prada, 2.04M) reports, "Lyonel Thomas Senter Jr.'s roots run deep in northern Mississippi. … Now, at 73 years old, Judge Senter has become a defining figure in the coastal south of the state, presiding over a deluge of legal cases that grew out of Hurricane Katrina." The Journal notes that "most claims have been resolved, but thousands of homeowners in the Gulf region are still suing their insurers, and billions are still at stake. At issue in many of these cases is a messy question. Were homes destroyed by the ferocious winds of the storm or the surging Gulf waters that came with them? Insurers typically cover wind damage but exclude water damage, because it's covered under the federal government's flood insurance program. Yet who knows what's behind the damage when a house has been wiped off the map?"

FEMA Response To Florida Tornadoes Seen As Success. In a generally positive report, NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) said, "There is evidence tonight that things that this nation's disaster relief agency FEMA are getting better, at least when it comes to the response of the tornados in central Florida last week. Obviously a smaller disaster than Katrina, but this was a test of the post-Katrina FEMA and its ability to pass a crucial response test."

WAR NEWS:

Senators Consider Report On Pre-War Intelligence As Feith Defends Efforts. All three broadcast networks led Friday night with the release of Pentagon Office of Inspector General's report on the "Pre-Iraqi War Activities of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy." Reports are critical of the Defense Department and then-Under Secretary Douglas Feith, focusing on the IG's criticisms and generally downplaying the conclusions that Feith broke no law. Several stories include Feith's defense of his work, and Feith himself appeared on CNN to make his case. Several print reports also consider how congressional Democrats will react to the IG report.

ABC World News (2/9, lead story, 3:15, Gibson, 8.78M) said the IG report "said one man charged with collecting US intelligence on Iraq did not accurately come to the conclusion that Iraq and al Qaeda were allies." ABC (Karl): "The report suggests that before the war, senior Pentagon officials were so eager to prove that Saddam Hussein had ties to al Qaeda, that they ignored evidence to the contrary and manipulated the intelligence. It's a damning conclusion, but the report stops short of saying the officials broke the law." Feith has "absolutely no contrition on the central charges of this report. He believes what he did was absolutely correct, and by the way the Pentagon also said that Feith did nothing inappropriate."

The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) opened with what it called a "new report on the faulty intelligence that led to the Iraq war nearly four years ago. It concludes the Pentagon was way off base when it reported Saddam Hussein was conspiring with al Qaeda. But what's remarkable is where the report came from -- the Pentagon itself." CBS (Martin): "Convinced the CIA was doing shoddy work in the months before the war, a small Pentagon office presented senior White House aides with its own, much stronger conclusion about the links between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda. Today, the Pentagon's own inspector general told Congress that was inappropriate. Of course, it's years too late to do much about it." CBS says Feith "still contends more people should have challenged the official intelligence."

NBC Nightly News (2/9, lead story, 3:20, Reid, 9.87M) said that "when the Iraq war began, more than half of the American people believed Saddam Hussein had been personally involved in the 9/11 attacks. ... Now a long awaited report finds that [Feith's] office took inappropriate action by conducting its own alternative intelligence assessment." Feith "insisted he did not manipulate intelligence but merely criticized the work of the CIA."

In an interview with CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), Feith said, "What the Inspector General is criticizing is the fact that people in the Pentagon criticized the quality of the CIA intelligence. And the Inspector General, I think, wrongly says that the criticism of intelligence was intelligence work. And that it was inappropriate for non-intelligence people to do that." Blitzer: "But in this case they were right and you were wrong." Feith: "No, they were not right." Blitzer: "There was no connection that the 9/11 Commission could come up with to show that there was a connection -- a deliberate prewar operable connection between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein." Feith: "Which nobody ever claimed. I mean, that's -- it shows how much misinformation there is, even somebody as well as informed as you is misinformed on the point."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Barnes, 850K), in a very critical report, says the "findings lend credence to charges by White House critics that Feith, who has since left the department, was out of line when he sought to discredit analyses by CIA intelligence officials that discounted alleged ties between Al Qaeda and then-Iraqi leader Saddam

Hussein." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Miller, Barnes, 850K) additionally says the work of the "special Pentagon unit" run by Feith is "one of the lingering symbols of the intelligence failures leading up to the war in Iraq. ... Most of the evidence that Feith's Office of Special Plans cited in making its case for significant collaboration between Baghdad and Al Qaeda has crumbled under postwar scrutiny."

The Financial Times (2/10, Sevastopulo) says the report "comes at a critical time for the White House as President George W. Bush struggles to keep Republican support for the war in Iraq." Defense Secretary Robert Gates is quoted as saying, "Based on my whole career, all intelligence -activities need to be carried out through established institutions where there is oversight." However, Gates said "he had not read the report."

Senators Consider Impact, Importance Of Report. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/10, Pincus, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Senate Democrats and Republicans disagreed yesterday over the meaning and importance" of the report. Democras used the report "to bolster their contention that the administration misused intelligence to promote the urgency of invading Iraq. Republicans implied that the intelligence community had soft-pedaled crucial reports of a close al-Qaeda relationship with Saddam Hussein and that Feith's office had put them in the proper perspective." AFP (2/9, Sanz) reports Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller said Feith "may have violated the 1947 National Security Act by failing to keep Congress informed."

The New York Times (2/10, A6, Cloud, 1.16M), in a story headlined "Inquiry on Intelligence Gaps May Reach to White House," reports Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin said he "would ask current and former White House aides to testify" about the report. Levin said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis Libby, who "both received a briefing from the defense secretary's policy office in 2002 on possible links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's government," could be among those called to testify. The Washington Times/AP (2/10) says the IG found that "Pentagon officials undercut the intelligence community in the run-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq by insisting in briefings to the White House" than a Hussein-al Qaeda connection existed. And on its Web site, The Hill (2/9, Marre) reports Levin "said he would seek a declassification of the entire report, which would make it available to the public." (An unclassified executive summary of the report is currently available online.)

Sen. Ben Nelson said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9, Matthews), "I think nobody is surprised anymore about what comes out. I think it's the makings for a spy novel. I'm sure Grisham is looking at it for material to write a book. But it's so unfortunate. I think the report said 'inappropriate.' Well, it's beyond inappropriate. It's unfortunate. I think most everybody would expect that what you get from the White House would be something that you could trust, you could rely on, and that it work, that it would materialize. In this case, it's been just the opposite."

WPost Corrects Misattributions In Friday Pentagon IG Report Story. The Washington Post (2/10, A2, 690K) corrects its Friday front-page article on the Pentagon IG report. The Post story "incorrectly attributed quotations to that report. References to Feith's office producing 'reporting of dubious quality or reliability' and that the office 'was predisposed to finding a significant relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda' were from a report" issued by Levin "in October 2004. Similarly, the quotes stating that Feith's office drew on 'both reliable and unreliable reporting' to produce a link between al-Qaeda and Iraq 'that was much stronger than that assessed by the IC [intelligence community] and more in accord with the policy views of senior officials in the Administration' were also from Levin's report. The article also stated that the intelligence provided by Feith's office supported the political views of senior administration officials, a conclusion that the inspector general's report did not draw." CNN's Wolf Blitzer noted the Post's correction during his interview with Feith.

NYTimes Says Levin, Rockefeller Have Duty "To Give Americans The Answers." The New York Times (2/10, 1.16M) editorializes, "It took far too long, but a report by the Pentagon inspector general has finally confirmed that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's do-it-yourself intelligence office cooked up a link between Iraq and Al Qaeda to help justify an unjustifiable war. … The Pentagon report is one step in a long-delayed effort to figure out how the intelligence on Iraq was so badly twisted -- and by whom. That work should have been finished before the 2004 elections, and it would have been if Pat Roberts, the obedient Republican who ran the Senate Intelligence Committee, had not helped the White House drag it out and load it in ways that would obscure the truth." The Times says it is now up to Levin and Rockefeller "to give Americans the answers."

Gates Says Evidence Links Iran To Arming Of Iraqi Insurgents. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/10, Scarborough, 88K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates said there is "solid circumstantial evidence that Iran is supplying insurgents with explosives that are killing U.S. troops in Iraq." A US "report was put on hold after some White House officials determined the evidence was not strong enough to back up some of its assertions. But they have not backed off the general charge that Iran is indirectly fighting the United States via Iraqi insurgents." Also on its front page, the New York Times (2/10, Gordon, 1.16M) says "any assertion of an Iranian contribution to attacks on Americans in Iraq is both politically and diplomatically volatile." But the US conclusions are "based on a number of factors, including an analysis of captured devices, examination of debris after attacks, and intelligence on training of Shiite militants in Iran and in Iraq by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and by Hezbollah militants believed to be working at the behest of Tehran." The AP (2/9, Baldor) reports that Gates' allegations about "serial numbers and other markings" were "some of the administration's first public assertions on evidence the military has collected."

Iranian Arrest Of Al Qaeda Suspects Colors Debate Over Iran. The Washington Post (2/10, Linzer, 690K) reports on its front page, "Last week, the CIA sent an urgent report to President Bush's National Security Council: Iranian authorities had arrested two al-Qaeda operatives traveling through Iran on their way from Pakistan to Iraq. ... The arrests were presented to Bush's senior policy advisers as evidence that Iran appears committed to stopping al-Qaeda foot traffic across its borders, the intelligence official said. That assessment comes at a time when the Bush administration, in an effort to push for further U.N. sanctions on the Islamic republic, is preparing to publicly accuse Tehran of cooperating with and harboring al-Qaeda suspects." Within the administration, "One faction is pressing for more economic embargoes against Iran, including asset freezes and travel bans for the country's top leaders. But several senior intelligence and counterterrorism officials worry that a public push regarding the al-Qaeda suspects held in Iran could jeopardize U.S. intelligence-gathering and prompt the Iranians to free some of the most wanted individuals."

US Allegedly In "Advanced" Stages Of War Planning Against Iran. The British newspaper the Guardian (2/10, MacAskill) reports, "US preparations for an air strike against Iran are at an advanced stage, in spite of repeated public denials by the Bush administration, according to informed sources in Washington. The present military build-up in the Gulf would allow the US to mount an attack by the spring. But the sources said that if there was an attack, it was more likely next year, just before Mr Bush leaves office."

IAEA Suspends Iran Aid Programs. Under the headline, "World Atomic Agency Suspends 22 Programs Of Aid To Iran," the New York Times (2/10, Broad, 1.16M) notes the International Atomic Energy Agency "said yesterday that it had suspended 22 of its 55 technical aid programs with Iran, giving Washington a modest victory in its efforts to isolate Tehran internationally in the hope of curbing its nuclear ambitions." IAEA officials reported to the IAEA Board that they "had also suspended a number of lesser activities, including three fellowships, participation in a training course and procurement of 15 pieces of equipment." Iranian Ambassador Ali Asghar Soltanieh "denounced the suspensions as 'a very dangerous game' that would have no impact on its disputed nuclear program. Rather, he said in an interview, they will undermine the atomic energy agency's authority and many countries' desire to join it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Analysts said the IAEA action would probably not have a significant effect on Iran's nuclear program but would be likely to be perceived as a blow nonetheless. Iran is one of the largest recipients of U.N. nuclear technical cooperation. ... Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is supposed to make an announcement on the nuclear program during Sunday's planned street demonstrations in celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution. Many analysts believe he will announce some progress in setting up the first of 3,000 enrichment centrifuges Iran has said it is building at a major new underground facility in Natanz."

The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Jahn) reports the IAEA "suspended nearly half the technical aid it provides to Iran, a symbolically significant punishment for nuclear defiance that only North Korea and Saddam Hussein's Iraq had faced in the past. The decision was in line with U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed on Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment. It must still be approved by the 35 countries on the board," but "with the agency empowered by the Security Council to freeze any aid to Iran that could be misused for nuclear weapons, approval was likely." BBC.com (2/10) also reports the story.

US Forces Accidentally Kill Several Kurds.

The New York Times (2/10, A6, Oppel, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "An American military helicopter killed as many as nine Kurdish militia fighters early Friday in the northern city of Mosul when the aircraft mistakenly attacked a guard post. ... The United States command in Baghdad said American troops erroneously believed that they had identified insurgents near the hide-out of a bomb-making cell linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The command said the strike killed five Kurds, described as policemen; Kurdish officials said as many as nine were killed." The victims were "members of a militia force that is a crucial ally of the United States."

The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Londono, 690K) says the US claimed the group showed "hostile intention." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Roug, 850K) reports, "Kurdish officials reacted angrily, saying the airstrike on one of the main roads in Mosul was inexplicable." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Gamel) reports, "Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman denounced the air strike, but a spokesman for the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, Azad Jundiyan, said the party realized the air strike was a mistake."

Surge Shows Few Concrete Results So Far.

On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, Roug, 850K) says, "A month after the Bush administration announced a 'surge' in troops for Baghdad, Iraqis are still waiting for anything to change. Fewer than 20% of the additional Iraqi and American troops have arrived so far. And the roughly 5,000 that have arrived have yet to make a visible impact in this sprawling city of 6 million people, where thousands of paramilitary gunmen patrol the streets. ... Iraqis are increasingly impatient." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "has said he is investigating whether he can speed the pace of the troop buildup. But a senior Pentagon official said this week that it was unlikely that U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad any faster than planned."

Some Troops Suggest Letting Civil War Play Out. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 3, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have an unusual and unexpected firsthand look tonight at just how dangerous it is on the ground in Iraq. ... Richard Engel was embedded today with the US First Infantry division in a Sunni neighborhood called Adel in western Baghdad." NBC (Engel): "It was billed as a routine patrol, part of this new security crackdown. … Our patrol was headed to a mosque, just a routine mission to monitor the Friday sermon. ... [A bomb] was badly timed and exploded just ten feet away." Staff Sgt. Chris Copley: "It is pretty much a lost cause. Nothing it seems we do is doing any good. Every country goes through a civil war. So, I mean, maybe it would be better for them to have a civil war and hash it out and try to help them after that."

Petraeus Assuming Command. ABC World News (2/9, story 2, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Gen. George Casey has been confirmed as next Army Chief of Staff. He has spent nearly three years in Iraq, calling the shots during some of the war's fiercest battles." ABC (Raddatz): "On his farewell trip through Iraq this week, Gen. Casey got an unexpected look at the fighting he had hoped would diminish during his tenure. His convoy passed by a firefight with the sounds of tank fire impossible to miss. But Casey saw much progress on his visit. ... Tomorrow, Casey turns over his command to Gen. David Petraeus, who will oversee the new plan for Iraq, a plan which many say is Iraq's last chance."

BBC.com (2/10) reports Petraeus "is assuming control, ahead of a fresh push to quell violence in the capital, Baghdad." The Financial Times (2/10, Sevastopulo) says Iraqis "referred to Gen Petraeus as 'King David', a sobriquet some officers use to refer to his perceived arrogance. But some have privately argued that his arrogance and ambition will be an asset since he will take risks that his more cautious predecessor, General George Casey, would have avoided." AFP (2/9, Ickes) characterizes Petraeus as "tasked with turning around a faltering mission which faces mounting US casualties and a dramatic collapse in domestic political support." He "is now the figurehead for a controversial gamble."

LATimes Says Congressional Resolution On Surge Needed. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) editorializes, "Congress should go on record as a way of pressing Bush and the Iraqi government to make the most of what may be the last politically realistic chance of pacifying that country and keeping it together. ... The president, Gates and Gen. David H. Petraeus should be given time to make a success of their new approach, but that time should be measured in months, not years. If it takes a resolution from Congress to make that point to the president, so be it."

NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 2, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "More on that dramatic videotape of what insurgents say shows them bringing down a US military transport helicopter in Iraq. That is not what the Pentagon says it is." NBC (Yang): "Take a look at this video. It was posted today on the internet by a group with ties to Al Qaeda. It begins by showing a helicopter maneuvering in the sky. It looks like a Marine Sea Knight helicopter, the same type of helicopter that went down Wednesday. ... The Pentagon says it doesn't prove anything. … The Pentagon is pointing out this could be doctored."

Key Sunni Office Holder Given "Placeholder Status." On its front page today, the Washington Post (2/10, Londono, 690K) describes at length the political "weakness" of Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaee, a Sunni. "Zobaee, in principle one of Iraq's most powerful men, offers [an] anecdote to illustrate his powerlessness, which he says is a product of the Shiite-led government's efforts to cast aside high-ranking Sunnis like him. Shiite political leaders say Zobaee, one of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's two deputies, deserves his placeholder status." The Post says the "marginalization of Zobaee -- who denies being an instigator of violence -- is a prominent example of the strained relationship between Sunni and Shiite leaders, an acrimony that many see as the main obstacle to deterring violence and laying the foundation for reconciliation in Iraq."

Rice Feels Heat In Rumsfeld's Absence. CNN.com (2/9, Labott) reports, "On January 11, the secretary of state got an earful from both sides of the aisle. ... These are rough and uncharted waters for Rice, who sailed through the first six years of the Bush administration relatively unsullied as her colleagues -- particularly former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- took the heat for the quagmire in Iraq." Rice "remains the most popular member of the Bush administration; her approval ratings in polls are higher than Bush's. But the honeymoon is clearly over. Rice has inherited the role Rumsfeld played as a primary spokesman of the Iraq war -- and the primary lightning rod for criticism about it."

Appeals Court Backs US Citizen Detainee. The Washington Post (2/10, A14, White, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday that a U.S. citizen in U.S. military custody in Iraq has the right to challenge his detention in a federal court. The judges said all American citizens, regardless of where they are captured and imprisoned, are entitled to federal court review of their cases through habeas corpus petitions if they are in U.S. custody." Shawqi Ahmed Omar has been held "more than two years" in Iraq, but the court "rejected the Bush administration's claim that the executive branch has nearly unlimited authority during wartime and its assertion that the United States can hold citizens indefinitely if they are in custody overseas." The New York Times/AP (2/10, A16) says the "military says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials when he was arrested. The military decided in 2005 to transfer him to the Central Criminal Court of Iraq for trial, but United States courts have blocked that."

KBR, Military Honor Civilian Contractors. The Houston Chronicle (2/10, Clanton, Ivanovich, 530K) reports, "The Defense Department and KBR on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart. But some honorees at the event said citizen contractors still are not getting the same recognition as the military for sacrifices they make serving their country in Iraq." Contractors or their survivors received the Defense of Freedom Medal. The Chronicle adds that 98 KBR "employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began. Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action."

Center For The Intrepid Praised. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Gurwitz, 2.04M) reports, "There are symbolic sacrifices in metaphorical wars. Then there are genuine sacrifices in real wars. The latter was on display last week at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, as representatives of a grateful nation dedicated the Center for the Intrepid and two new Fisher Houses to those wounded in the global war on terror. ... Representatives of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund and the Fisher House Foundation spoke at the ceremony, as did Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace. ... The speakers, however, were merely paying tribute. The true dignitaries were the wounded warriors who sat in the front rows."

Ancient Faith Endangered By Iraq War. The Washington Post (2/10, B7, Newmarker, 690K) reports, "Among the casualties of the Iraq war is a little-known religious faith called Mandaeanism that has survived roughly two millennia and whose adherents believe that John the Baptist was their great teacher. While there were more than 60,000 Mandaeans in Iraq in the early 1990s, only about 5,000 to 7,000 remain. Many have fled amid targeted killings, rapes, forced conversions and property confiscation by Islamic extremists."

Pentagon To Extend Troop Deployment In Afghanistan. The AP (2/9, Burns) reports, "The Pentagon plans to extend its buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said Friday. The move comes as U.S. and allied commanders anticipate a renewed offensive this spring by the Taliban, and as they seek additional reinforcements from NATO countries."

Taliban Kill Four Afghan Policemen In Ambush. The AP (2/10) reports, "Taliban militants ambushed a truck full of Afghan police in southern Afghanistan, killing four officers and injuring three, an official said Saturday. The attack occurred Friday evening in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province." AFP (2/10) also reports the fighting, saying, "Four policemen and 11 Taliban have been killed in fresh violence in southern Afghanistan, as a suicide car bomb narrowly missed a NATO military convoy."

Iranian-American Helps Build Afghan Schools. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We highlight one person who is truly making a difference in society. Tonight she lives here in America, but devotes her time, energy and attention to a faraway place and in her own way she is helping to change the face of America half a world away." NBC (Maceda): "Two years ago, there were just a couple of tents here in the Jalalabad desert. Now the school is a red brick building with 2,000 students. Thanks to Fari Moini, a tiny Iranian-American with a big heart the kids call Momma." Fari Moini: "Continue your education. It is very, very important."

Gates To Meet With Musharraf Next Week. AFP (2/10) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "will visit Pakistan early next week for talks with President Pervez Musharraf on the threat from Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan, official sources said. ... He is expected to fly to Afghanistan afterwards."

Army Wife Counsels Others. CBS Evening News (2/9, story 6, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In our series American Heroes, we honor the men and women who sacrifice so much on the battlefield. But in reality, their spouses also make tremendous sacrifices back home. Tonight, the Army wife who's reaching out to many others just like her." CBS (Strassmann): "It's all on them now, the kids, the house, a full year's worth of worry. As Fort Stewart soldiers redeploy to Iraq, the wives left behind look for support wherever they can find it." Tara Crooks, Army Wife Talk Radio: "You're listening to Army Wife Talk Radio, the Internet's talk radio program for and by Army wives. My name is Tara Crooks and I'm your host." Strassmann: "Tara Crooks just talks, one Army wife to another."

AEI Scholar Bashes Emergency Supplemental Funding "Trick." In the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K), AEI fellow Veronique De Rugy writes that President Bush's "trick" of "socking about $235 billion into two 'emergency supplemental' funding requests for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan…didn't fool the public for very long. But the longer the White House and Congress continue to treat 'war-related' funding as a separate item from the budget for the Department of Defense, the harder it will be to control a ballooning federal budget."

DOJ:

Ousted Arizona US Attorney Cites Policy Dispute With Main Justice. The Arizona Republic (2/10, House, Wagner) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton said Friday that he left office in January for "principled reasons, not performance issues," as a deputy attorney general suggested this week." The Republic continues, "Charlton, who was one of six top federal prosecutors across the country forced to resign, said there had been 'policy disputes' with his Justice Department higher-ups. Charlton spoke to The Arizona Republic on Friday in his first public comments since being asked to step down. … Although Charlton declined to elaborate, two sources said a main disagreement between Charlton and officials in Washington centered on when to seek the death penalty in federal murder cases." The Republic adds, "As a U.S attorney, Charlton has pursed the death penalty in some cases. But his insistence on determining whether to push for capital punishment on a case-by-case basis clashed on at least two instances with a Justice Department effort to centralize decisions nationally and to seek the death penalty in a uniform way. … Charlton acknowledged that he was among the prosecutors who received a telephone call on Dec. 7 from Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, asking him to resign. … 'I certainly was given no indication there were performance concerns,' Charlton said." The Republic notes, "Like all U.S. attorneys, Charlton served at the pleasure of the president. He was appointed in November 2001. … Even so, Charlton said that he told Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, of the call and that Kyl agreed to speak to officials at the department on his behalf. … 'Senator Kyl informed me that after his conversation with the Department of Justice that the department agreed they would reconsider their asking me to resign,' Charlton said. … But, Charlton said, 'it then became apparent to me that our views had become so divergent and disparate that I would resign.' … A Justice Department official in Washington who asked not to be identified said that Charlton's distinction between policy and performance 'may be an issue of semantics.' … 'Policy is set at a national level,' the official said. 'Individual U.S. attorneys around the country can't just make up their own policy agendas. Such a situation would result in chaos with 93 different U.S. attorneys implementing different policy decisions around the country. That is no way to run an organization.'"

The AP (2/10) reports, "Former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods said Friday the Justice Department in Washington pressed Charlton to apply the death penalty in certain cases, but Charlton resisted because he didn't believe it was the right thing to do. Charlton resigned in December and left office at the end of last month. … 'It's obvious that they may have felt there were more circumstances where (the death penalty) was warranted than he did,' said Woods, who has spoken with Charlton recently. 'I think he should get credit for standing on principle rather than just doing what he was told so he didn't make waves. A lot of people don't have the guts to stand up and say "no"' … Woods did not know whether the conflicts led directly to Charlton's departure after serving as the U.S. attorney for Arizona since 2001. Charlton took a job with a Phoenix law firm."

More Commentary On US Attorney Dismissals. The Tacoma (WA) News Tribune (2/10) editorializes, "John McKay, by all accounts, was a stellar U.S. attorney. … Since becoming Western Washington's top federal prosecutor in 2001, he led an aggressive team that filed charges against twice as many defendants and posted a higher conviction rate despite the bigger case-load." The News-Tribune continues, "McKay won admiration of federal judges and state law enforcement officials, and earned the Navy's highest civilian honor for creating an interagency information-sharing system that has become a national model. … Even his bosses seemed to think McKay was doing a topnotch job. Just last March, Justice Department evaluators gave McKay's office a glowing review, calling him an 'effective, well-regarded and capable leader.' … So it came as quite the surprise when McKay announced in December that he was stepping down. There was no plum appointment or job waiting in the wings, only a chance to pursue other opportunities — usually code for "I was shown the door.' … As so, it turns out, McKay was. He spoke out this week in defense of himself and his former employees after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate judiciary panel that McKay and five other Republican U.S. attorneys were forced to resign for 'performance-related' issues." The Tribune adds, "McKay says no one ever raised performance issues with him, not even on Dec. 7 when a senior Justice Department official called out of the blue to tell him he had to resign by the end of January. … The truth behind the mass exodus has a lot more to do with the politicization of the U.S. Attorney's Office than it does with poor lawyering. A Justice Department source told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer that President Bush and the Republican Party want to 'build their bench' by replacing top prosecutors with younger conservatives to enhance their résumés for future positions."

The St Petersburg (FL) Times (2/10) editorializes, "U.S. attorneys act as chief federal prosecutors within the states and are charged with being fair and independent. But there is no job that can't be filled by political loyalists. … In a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general, claimed that most of the incumbents had been replaced for performance issues. Yet he admitted to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that H.E. Cummins III, a former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, had done nothing to justify being removed. Cummins was replaced with a former political director for the Republican National Committee." The Times adds, "In ousting San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the Bush administration has signaled to others in its corps that investigating public corruption comes at a price. Lam headed the office that unearthed the misdeeds of congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who is now in prison after admitting taking more than $2-million in bribes. The probe had been continuing under her leadership and included other members of Congress." The Times concludes, "Senate confirmation is integral to reducing the partisanship of presidential appointments and is especially important for posts where impartiality and independence are needed qualifications. The new law that makes it possible to cut the Senate out should be repealed, as a measure introduced by Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., would do. Meanwhile, Schumer and other senators should continue to press for better explanations for the removal of people who seemed to be doing their job."

In a column for the Vancouver (WA) Columbian (2/10), Gregg Herrington writes, "Some 90 U.S. attorneys around the country serve at the pleasure of the president, prosecuting, or not, federal crimes. … But the Bush White House likes its minions to be attuned to the greater vision: moving the blue states into the red column. And how can one do that if one is working closely with the other side, sharing credit with Democrats while beefing up the federal crime-fighting apparatus in Southwest Washington?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, SEC Eye Jobs' Role In Pixar Stock Options. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Page C - 1, Guynn) reports, "These days, the most animated discussions about Steve Jobs have nothing to do with his high-tech wizardry and everything to do with his alleged involvement in a growing stock-options manipulation scandal that has engulfed Apple Inc., the Cupertino technology giant he runs, and Pixar Animation Studios, the Emeryville movie company he sold to Walt Disney Co. last year." The Chronicle continues, "Federal prosecutors in San Francisco are scrutinizing options awarded to top Pixar executives on dates that guaranteed them the highest potential profits. Among the grants being reviewed: Two-time Oscar-winning animated film director John Lasseter and former Pixar President Edwin Catmull received options that allowed them to buy Pixar stock at the lowest price in 2000. In 1997, Lasseter received options just before a production agreement with Disney that pumped up shares nearly 50 percent." The Chronicle adds, "The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that Jobs, then Pixar's chairman and CEO, signed the 2001 employment contract with Lasseter that included a large options grant on a date more than three months before the contract was signed. The Journal cited a person familiar with the matter. … It remains unclear what role if any Jobs played in selecting the favorable date, according to the Journal. But the timing grabbed the attention of federal authorities, prompting an investigation by Disney that has not been completed. … In a conference call with investors in November, Disney CEO Bob Iger said the board began the investigation after being contacted by the SEC and the Justice Department."

SEC Launches Formal Probe Of KLA-Tencor Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (2/10, Schwanhausser, Blitstein) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has elevated its probe into stock option backdating at KLA-Tencor into a formal investigation, the company said Friday." The News continues, "The San Jose maker of chip-inspection equipment, which said it learned the news Feb. 2, has faced an informal investigation by the SEC and a separate probe by the Justice Department since last May, when newspaper reports raised questions about the fortunate timing of options awarded to Chairman Kenneth Levy." The News adds, "Last week, KLA acknowledged in its 2006 annual report that the company intentionally priced stock options 'retroactively,' falsified documents and violated its stock plan rules about issuing discounted options. The company said that some former executives selected the 'fortuitously low' prices, while others were aware of the abuses. … The internal inquiry led to the ouster of Levy, a Silicon Valley pioneer, General Counsel Stuart Nichols, and director Jon Tompkins, the former CEO of Tencor before it merged with KLA. … The company also fired Kenneth Schroeder, a former chief executive who most recently served as a senior adviser, and canceled all tainted options he held. Although KLA-Tencor hasn't said so explicitly, its reports appear to blame Schroeder for much of the options abuses. Schroeder plans to fight his firing and the cancellation of his options, KLA-Tencor said."

GM Accounting Issues Remain Unresolved. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A3, Stoll) reports, "General Motors Corp. said late Friday it still isn't ready to say when it will resolve accounting issues that forced it to delay filing its fourth-quarter and full-year financial results for 2006." The Journal continues, "Separately, shares of GM and Ford Motor Co. rose Friday after Deutsche Bank upgraded the auto giants' shares to 'buy,' citing optimism that the companies can win health-care-cost savings from the United Auto Workers union this fall. Shares of GM were up 6.5% to $36.01 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Ford were at $8.73, up 2.1%, on the NYSE." The Journal adds, "GM was originally scheduled to report preliminary fourth-quarter results Jan. 30 but announced two weeks ago that it would postpone the release.

The company said it would provide further information on the progress of its financial reporting during the week of Feb. 5 and that it would submit its 10-k report with the Securities and Exchange Commission by the Mar. 1 deadline."

Sallie Mae Chairman Sold Shares Ahead Of Funding Cuts. The Washington Post (2/10, D1, Paley) reports, "Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord sold $18.3 million worth of company stock last week, just days before the Bush administration unveiled a multibillion-dollar cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to plummet." The Post continues, "Lord sold 400,000 shares of company stock Thursday, Feb. 1, and Friday, Feb. 2. The following Monday, after President Bush announced a budget that would cut subsidies to the student-lending industry by about $19 billion over five years, Sallie Mae's stock plunged about 9 percent, to $42.37 from $46.46, its lowest closing price in more than two years." The Post adds, "In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that night, SLM Corp., as Sallie Mae is formally known, disclosed Lord's sale of the shares, which it said was done to fund unspecified personal projects. … Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, said this week that Lord had planned to sell the shares for weeks and told the company about his plans to sell the stock, which represented about 29 percent of the Sallie Mae shares he owns outright, nine days before the sale." The Post notes, "Democrats in Congress have been calling for changes in student loan programs that would hurt Sallie Mae. The Reston-based student lending company has opposed the changes. But, Joyce said, Lord had no idea Bush would propose such huge rollbacks of lender subsidies. 'Nobody had these cuts on their radar screen,' he said. 'The student lending community did not see this coming.' … 'I can understand that people are raising questions, but the timing was just completely coincidental,' Joyce said. 'He had been thinking of doing this for many weeks. He was watching the market and just elected to do it on Thursday and Friday.' … If Lord had sold his shares at Monday's closing price of $42.37, he would have received about $1.4 million less. Lord sold the shares in a series of transactions over the two days at prices that ranged from $45.75 to $46.03. … Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department, said some Capitol Hill staff members were briefed on the proposed budget last Thursday but that the suggested cuts were not shared with Sallie Mae officials before Monday's announcement."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Provides Glimpse Into White House Crisis Response. The AP (2/10, Yost) reports, "David Addington, chief legal adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney, says he was taken aback when the White House started making public pronouncements about the CIA leak investigation." The AP continues, "In the fall of 2003, President Bush's press secretary was categorically denying that either Karl Rove or I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby was involved in exposing the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA employee married to a critic of the war in Iraq. … 'Why are you making these statements?' Addington asked White House communications director Dan Bartlett. … 'Your boss is the one who wanted' them, Bartlett replied, referring to Cheney. … With that, 'I shut up,' Addington recalled recently for jurors in Libby's CIA leak trial, which begins its fourth week on Monday with Libby's lawyers calling their first witnesses." The AP adds, "So far, the testimony of Addington and other administration aides, along with documents and Libby's audiotaped grand jury testimony, have provided a rare glimpse of how the Bush White House scrambled to respond to a political crisis as it intersected a criminal investigation. … At the intersection was Cheney, along with Rove and Libby, who were working in the summer of 2003 to rebut claims by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that Bush had misled the nation about prewar intelligence on Iraq. … The White House denials on behalf of Rove and Libby came just before Rove secretly began acknowledging to the FBI that he had confirmed Plame's identity for conservative columnist Bob Novak, who first published her name and relationship to Wilson. … About the same time, Libby came under suspicion because NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert had talked to the FBI, contradicting Libby's version of a conversation between the two men that would become the heart of the perjury and obstruction charges against Libby."

Phishing Schemers Target Job Seekers In ID Theft Scams. The Washington Post (2/10, D1, Shin) reports, "The online news site USA Voice isn't going to win any kudos from media critics. Not for its top story Monday, 'Super Bowl Ads Don't Live Up to the Hype.' And not for its Fox News-style slogan, 'USA Voice: Honest and Unfiltered.' … As a phishing scheme, however, privacy experts say it's a winner." The Post continues, "The Web site for the 'world's fastest growing news organization' looked good enough to fool Katherine Brinton, an aspiring journalist in Philadelphia. After posting her resume on Monster.com nine months ago, the 23-year old received an e-mail from USA Voice in November that said it was looking for reporters with 'excellent writing skills' and an 'innate ability to find the truth.' … Brinton filled out an online application with her name, address and telephone number. But instead of job offers, she began receiving a stream of unsolicited e-mails hawking Viagra, payday loans and penny stocks. … Brinton fell victim to a sophisticated phishing scam, which, in recent months, targeted thousands of job seekers on such popular Web sites as Monster.com and CareerBuilder.com. Phishers send out seemingly legitimate e-mail in an attempt to get people to reply with personal information then used in a variety of scams. … Since June, the Better Business Bureau serving Metro Washington has logged more than 8,000 inquiries about USA Voice and a related entity, Instant Human Resources. USA Voice lists a downtown Washington address; Instant Human Resources lists an address in Rockville. Both locations turned out to be a service that forwards mail for other businesses. Instant Human Resources' parent company, Internet Solutions, says it is based in Orlando." The Post notes, "In 2006, about 109 million U.S. adults received phishing e-mails, up from 57 million in 2004, according to research firm Gartner, of Stamford, Conn. About one in six phishing e-mails are opened -- a better rate than for e-mails from legitimate businesses, said Jeff Wilbur, vice president of marketing for e-mail security firm Iconix. … The majority of phishing e-mails claim to be from financial institutions, but phishers have also switched to mimicking dating, social networking and other kinds of online services. In those cases, victims might let their guard down because they are not giving out financial information, Wilbur said. But such attacks can leave them just as vulnerable to identity theft. … Job search sites offer identity thieves a rich source of personal information and a pool of potential victims willing to divulge even more in hopes of landing employment. Since 2004, some of the largest online job search firms, such as Monster and CareerBuilder, have taken more precautions against criminals looking to collect personal information from their users."

Nobel Winner Wiesel Attacked At California Conference. The New York Times (2/10, McKinley) reports, "Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, was attacked at a San Francisco hotel last week by an unknown assailant, the police said yesterday." The Times continues, "Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, said Mr. Wiesel, 78, was attending a conference when a man approached him in an elevator and asked to interview him. After a brief discussion, the man dragged Mr. Wiesel off the elevator and tried to restrain him, but Mr. Wiesel screamed, and the attacker fled."

The AP (2/10) reports, "Gittens said police are investigating the incident as a crime. He said investigators were aware of a posting at an anti-Semitic Web site in which a man claimed responsibility for the attack, but declined to comment further. … Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camps at Auschwitz and Buchenwald during World War II, has worked for human rights in many parts of the world and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986."

Judge Rules California Sex Offender Restriction Is Not Retroactive. The AP (2/10) reports, "A federal judge ruled that a voter-approved restriction on where sex offenders can live could not be applied retroactively, potentially freeing thousands of parolees from a ban on living within 2,000 feet of a school or other place where children gather." The AP continues, "The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said there was nothing in the law, Proposition 83, that specified its provisions were to be applied retroactively." The AP adds, "The proposition, known as Jessica's Law, was approved Nov. 7 by 70.5 percent of voters and took effect the next day. It also increases prison terms for sex offenders and requires lifetime satellite tracking of rapists and other felony sex criminals after their release from prison."

Judge Orders Former Coke Secretary Jailed Until Sentencing. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/10, Stanford) reported, "A federal judge ordered ex-Coke secretary Joya Williams to jail Friday, saying she had an 'utter disregard for the law.' … She will be sentenced May 23." Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Pak said "during a hearing Friday that Williams, 41, admitted being 'high as a kite' on Vicks cough medicine as the jury read the guilty verdict last week. Pak said she had drunk an entire bottle of the medication." The AJC noted, "Jurors convicted Williams under the federal Corporate Espionage Act of trying to sell confidential Coke documents and sample test products for $1.5 million to an undercover FBI agent posing as a Pepsi go-between." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/10, Turner) added, "U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester told…Williams that her behavior since her arrest in July has showed that she 'would do anything to avoid going to jail.' … Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, called the government's claim that her client is a risk to the community and a risk of flight 'more than offensive.'"

Former New York Comptroller Fined For Defrauding State. The New York Times (2/10, Confessore) reports, "The former state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, praised his replacement on Friday, after a hearing at which a judge sentenced him to pay a $5,000 fine for his use of state employees to chauffeur his wife." The Times continues, "The State Legislature voted on Wednesday to appoint Thomas P. DiNapoli, an assemblyman from Nassau County, as the new comptroller, two months after Mr. Hevesi resigned as part of a plea deal with the Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares. … Before resigning last year, Mr. Hevesi agreed to plead guilty to a felony charge of defrauding the government and to submit a DNA sample for the state's criminal database." The Times adds, "In delivering the sentence, Judge Stephen W. Herrick described Mr. Hevesi's actions as 'unexplainable and totally unacceptable,' but cited Mr. Hevesi's decades of public service, cooperation with the investigation and agreement to leave politics as reasons for the mild sentence. … 'Your fall from grace here has been total and from a very great height,' Judge Herrick said. Mr. Hevesi served for more than two decades in the Assembly and later as New York City comptroller before he won election to the state comptroller's job in 2002."

Jury Spares New York Drug Lord Death Penalty After Murder Convictions. The New York Times (2/10, Rashbaum) reports, "A notorious street-corner crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was spared the death penalty yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn when a jury failed to reach a unanimous verdict to execute him for ordering the killing of two rivals." The Times continues, "The jury's action will result in a sentence of life without the possibility of release for the convicted drug dealer, Kenneth McGriff, 46, who was known as Supreme and whose drug crew, the Supreme Team, held sway on the streets of southeast Queens in the 1980s." The Times adds, "All the jurors, who were questioned by the judge before being selected to serve on the case, had said they were willing to sentence the defendant to death if the evidence warranted it. On the verdict sheet, the jury noted that 'execution would not be an option' if the case had been tried in state court. … One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David A. Ruhnke, who defended the case with Jean Barrett, said his client was relieved by the jury's action. … He contended that the case should never have been prosecuted in federal court and suggested that the government's decision to seek the death penalty was inappropriate." The Times notes, "Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, whose office prosecuted the case, would not directly address Mr. Ruhnke's comments, saying only, 'The decision to impose the death penalty is solely within the province of the jury, and we respect their decision.'"

The AP (2/9, McShane) reports, "Jurors, who deliberated just over 2 1/2 hours on the sentence, convicted him last week of paying $50,000 for the 2001 killings of an obscure rapper named Eric 'E-Money Bags' Smith and Troy Singleton. … Prosecutors said Smith was killed for his fatal 1999 shooting of a McGriff associate, while Singleton was targeted because McGriff felt he might retaliate on Smith's behalf." The AP adds, "McGriff was the founder of the Supreme Crew, a brutal drug gang that operated in Queens during the 1980s. At its peak, the Supreme Team's network of dealers was making $200,000 a day, authorities said. … After McGriff did prison time on a drug conviction, he was released in 1997 and aligned himself with neighborhood friend and music mogul Irv 'Gotti' Lorenzo. Defense attorneys claimed this was part of McGriff's plan to create movies and music. … Prosecutors said McGriff returned to the drug business in New York and Baltimore. Lorenzo and his brother, Chris, were indicted with McGriff but acquitted at a separate trial of using their label Murder Inc. to launder $1 million in drug money."

Appeal Court Overturns DC Police Officer's Illegal Gratuities Conviction. The Washington Post (2/10, B2, Miller) reported, "By a 7 to 5 vote, a federal appeals court [Friday] overturned the conviction of a former D.C. police detective arrested in an FBI sting. Nelson Valdes was convicted in October 2002 of three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450. Valdes provided the informant with names and addresses in March 2001 to match four license plates and checked on warrants on another person, prosecutors said." The Post notes, "A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals reversed the conviction a year ago, ruling in a 2 to 1 decision that the gratuities charge -- which bars seeking or accepting gratuities 'for or because of any official act' -- did not apply to Valdes's conduct in the case."

FBI Probe Leads To Prostitution Allegations Against California Police. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Surdin, Krikorian) reported, "At least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that have been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown. The internal affairs investigation by the Inglewood Police Department began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia. … Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included 'very detailed ledgers' that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation." The Times noted, "Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution." Inglewood City Councilman Ralph Franklin "said it was aimed at determining whether the alleged sexual misconduct involved a large number of officers over an extended period of time. He said the FBI was assisting police in the investigation." The AP (2/10) also reported on the intestigation.

Texas Man Charged With Hurricane Relief Fraud. The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (2/10, LaRowe) reports, "A Texarkana man has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Texas in a fraud case related to hurricane relief in the Eastern District of Texas." The Gazette continues, "Gary Williams Trice, 36, has been charged with mail fraud after he allegedly illegally acquired $36,000 in FEMA hurricane assistance money. Trice is alleged to have submitted as many as 14 fraudulent applications for assistance based on hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma by using different names, addresses and Social Security numbers." The Gazette adds, "The investigation was conducted jointly by the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General, the United States Postal Service and the Department of Homeland Security. … 'Hurricane-related fraud remains a priority of the Department of Justice,' said United States Attorney Matthew Orwig in a press release issued this week. 'Applications for assistance are continuing to be reviewed and any appearances of fraud will be thoroughly investigated.'" The Gazette notes, "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force was created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud."

O'Malley, Kaine Faced With Death Penalty Decisions. The Washington Post (2/10, Wagner, Craig, 690K) says on its front page that Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine "both face decisions" on the "divisive" capital punishment issue "that will be watched closely in their states and beyond. O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, has pledged to work with lawmakers to repeal Maryland's death penalty -- and could effectively halt executions through the end of his tenure even without their support, given a recent court ruling. Kaine, who was sworn in last year, presides over a state where executions are far more frequent. He soon could have to decide whether to sign bills to expand capital punishment in Virginia."

Catholic Maryland Legislators Split On Death Penalty Abolition. The Washington Times (2/10, Lobianco, 88K) reports, "Key Catholic lawmakers in the General Assembly are splitting with major Catholic groups over an attempt to abolish the death penalty in Maryland. 'I know it's a little inconsistent, but I do feel [the death penalty] is a deterrent,' said Sen. Norman R. Stone Jr., Baltimore County Democrat and a Catholic. 'Maybe you don't reconcile it until you meet your maker,' said Delegate Susan K. McComas, Harford County Republican and a Catholic who is a member of the House Judiciary Committee."

DOJ Faces Backlog Of Healthcare Fraud Cases. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram/Cox News Service (2/10, Malone) reports, "Federal prosecutors admitted having a backlog of more than 150 cases in which pharmaceutical companies are accused of defrauding federal and state healthcare programs, a Justice Department lawyer acknowledged to a congressional panel Friday." Cox continues, "Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, said his department has recovered $5.3 billion since 1999 from major drug manufacturers in a variety of kickback schemes and overcharges that defrauded Medicaid and Medicare. … But when asked by House Committee on Oversight Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., why the government doesn't move faster on these cases to recoup even more taxpayer money, Tenpas said his office is short on lawyers and investigators. … 'These are very complex cases,' he said, adding that his office has not added new positions, despite estimates that the prescription drug fraud cases produce $15 in payments and penalties for every $1 spent on prosecution." Cox adds, "Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of a Medicaid task force for the Texas attorney general's office, said at the congressional hearing that his team of lawyers had more than paid its way by recovering $64.1 million from just four manufacturers that had overcharged the state and federal government for prescription drugs. … O'Connell, in an interview later, estimated that his office has collected more than $100 million from drug companies since his anti-fraud office was set up in 1999. Expenses for his task force, recently expanded to 10 lawyers, have added up to $5 million to $7 million, he said. … Waxman repeatedly raised concerns about the new prescription drug benefit, known as 'Part D' for Medicare recipients. … The new program 'is going to cost $1 trillion over 10 years -- $50 billion over this next year,' Waxman said. 'That program's got to be as ripe for fraud as any other.' … Tenpas said officials at the Justice Department are 'clearly concerned there could be fraud in that program' but added that after only one year of operation and not enough data 'we don't have many conclusions yet.'"

GAO Warns Of Medicare Drug Overcharging. The AP (2/10) reports, "Federal law makers should consider doing more to ensure the government is not overcharged for prescription drugs, according to a government watch dog." The AP continues, "A director for the Government Accountability Office told members of Congress Friday that the Medicare drug benefit program is vulnerable to false billing schemes because it relies on private companies to report drug prices. Under the program, about 42 million eligible senior citizens can choose between thousands of prescription drug plans offered by health insurers that individually negotiate drug prices with manufacturers." The AP adds, "GAO's health care director John Dicken said the Medicare drug program's 'complex set of relationships and transactions with private entities' makes it difficult to verify the accuracy of drug prices charged to the government. Dicken told members of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform that Medicare needs to have systems in place to spot inflated price reporting."

Waxman Pledges Probe Of Drugmaker "Profiteering." Bloomberg (2/10, Marcus) reports, "Representative Henry Waxman pledged Congress will investigate a range of allegations that drugmakers are 'profiteering' by overcharging federal health programs. … 'If even half of them are true, billions of federal dollars that should be buying needed care are instead adding to drug company profits,' Waxman, Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said at a hearing today on alleged fraud and abuse in drug pricing." Bloomberg adds, "Democrats promised more aggressive oversight of government practices when they took control of Congress in January, and the hearing was an initial effort to apply such scrutiny to health- care costs. … The Justice Department has recovered more than $5.3 billion related to pharmaceutical fraud in federal and state programs since 1999, Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, told the committee. … 'It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs,' Tenpas said in a statement submitted to the committee."

Sailor, Family Sue Navy Alleging Hospital Malpractice. The Navy Times (2/10, Amos) reports, "A Navy family has filed a claim against the Navy for $150 million, alleging that malpractice by Naval Hospital Jacksonville doctors and staff caused their newborn son to suffer severe brain damage that has left him unable to walk, talk or see." The Times continues, "Sean Cronin, a civilian lawyer representing Electronics Technician 3rd Class Joseph Alcorn and his wife, Kendra, said injuries to their son Gavin, the second child born during a twin pregnancy, were caused when he did not receive enough oxygen during delivery in May 2005. … Cronin said hospital records show that Gavin's limbs were blue and that he was not breathing when he was delivered about an hour after his sister. … Gavin's sister had unrelated complications during delivery but has since recovered." The Times adds, "Shortly after delivery, Gavin was transferred to a civilian hospital in Jacksonville, where doctors used an MRI to determine that he suffered brain damage during delivery, Cronin said. … Capt. Raquel Bono, commanding officer of Naval Hospital Jacksonville, said Navy doctors identified Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy as high risk before delivery and took steps, including having extra doctors present during delivery, to prevent complications. She said close attention was paid to the fetal heart rate and to the mother's uterine contractions. … Bono would not say which, if any, prenatal risk factors other than a multiple delivery were present during Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy, but she defended the actions of doctors and staff at the hospital, which she said delivers about 120 babies each month and conforms to national standards set by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. … The Navy has six months to respond to the Alcorn's claim. It can pay the full amount, offer a reduced settlement or pay nothing. … After the six-month period, if the family is not satisfied with the Navy's response, they can file a lawsuit in U.S. District Court. … At that point, Justice Department lawyers would take over the lawsuit's defense."

Expert Cites Controller Fatigue As Factor In Chicago Air Crash. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, O'Connor) reports, "An aviation consultant testified Friday that an air-traffic controller's fatigue was a contributing factor in the midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others seven years ago." The Tribune continues, "At a federal trial stemming from lawsuits over the crash, Farrell Smith, a former Federal Aviation Administration official, said records showed that controller Gregory Fowler worked more than seven hours that day without taking a break. … In the hour before the collision, Fowler had been involved in 416 transmissions with pilots, one every 8.65 seconds, Smith said. .. . 'He's vulnerable to fatigue, mental and physical,' Smith said of Fowler, whom lawyers for the three victims' families blamed for the collision. 'It's critical safety-wise to give them a break, so they're sharp and aware.'" The Tribune adds, "Collins had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P flown by student pilot Sharon Hock as the two aircraft approached Waukegan Regional Airport near the lakefront. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, while Hock died when her plane plummeted onto a Zion street. … On Friday Paul Pieri, a former flight instructor who witnessed the crash, testified that he had been surprised when Collins' plane passed in front of his shortly before the collision. If Collins had accurately reported his position, Pieri said, 'He should have already been past me on final approach' to the airfield. … Justice Department lawyers, representing the FAA at the trial, contend that Collins caused the collision."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Operating Multi-State Immigrant Brothel Ring. The Austin (TX) American-Statesman (2/9, Kreytak) reports, "A man who federal authorities say managed brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City in an elaborate multistate immigrant smuggling and prostitution ring pleaded guilty in federal court Friday." The A-S continues, "The ring included brothels in 13 cities, including ones across Texas, as far west as Las Vegas and as far east as New York City and Atlanta, according to documents filed with Juan Balderas-Orosco's plea. The operators snuck hundreds of women into the country from Mexico as well as Central and South American countries, and forced them to have sex with as many as 40 men — mostly undocumented immigrants — a day, the documents said. … Their bosses, who moved the women among the brothels in the interstate network, kept all or part of the women's earnings, the documents said. … 'The prostitutes reported they were not free to leave the brothels on their own, and the brothel operators were usually armed with firearms,' one court document said." The A-S notes, "Balderas, 34, faces 10 years in prison at a later sentencing on each of three crimes: transportation for prostitution, conspiracy to smuggle, transport and harbor illegal aliens, and importation of aliens. … Balderas, who was the manager of brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City, is the lead defendant in an indictment filed last year in U.S. District Court in Austin charging 12 people in the case with various smuggling and prostitution crimes."

US Opposes Dismissal Of Charges Against Seale. The AP (2/10, Elliott) reports from Jackson, MS, "Kidnapping remains a capital crime under federal law and there is no statute of limitations that would justify dismissing charges against a reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men, say federal prosecutors." The AP continues, "James Ford Seale, 71, has pleaded not guilty to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail. … Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown. … In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued. … U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate has not ruled on the dismissal motion." The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed this week, said Seale's defense was misreading the law. He said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law. … 'The limitations period depends upon the capital nature of the crime, and not on whether the death penalty is in fact available for a defendant in a particular case. Because the defendant is charged with offenses deemed by Congress to be capital in nature, he may be prosecuted for those offenses without limitation,' Lampton said in the government's response. … Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense."

Feinstein Seeks Information On Jailed Border Agents. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Lochhead) reports, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein intervened Friday in the cases of two Border Patrol agents who are imprisoned for shooting an alleged Mexican drug smuggler and who have become a cause celebre for anti-illegal immigration GOP politicians, conservative media and activists." The Chronicle continues, "The California Democrat, who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote letters to three top administration officials -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin -- asking for specific information about their agencies' involvement in the case. … Feinstein is the first prominent Democrat to become involved in the case of the border agents, and her office said she has secured the agreement of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to conduct a committee investigation. She said Leahy is open to a hearing on the matter." The Chronicle adds, "Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos were convicted last March and sentenced Oct. 9 for the 2005 shooting of an alleged drug smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who had driven a van loaded with 743 pounds of marijuana from Mexico to Texas. The agents shot Aldrete-Davila as he tried to flee back across the border with Mexico, then hid evidence of the shooting and failed to report it, according to the evidence presented at their trial. Compean received a 12-year federal prison sentence, and Ramos 11 years and one month. … Last Saturday, Ramos was injured in a fight with five other inmates at the federal prison in Yazoo City, Miss. Prison authorities said he sustained minor bruises and abrasions. … President Bush has so far refused to pardon the agents, though he has said he would 'look at all the facts' and urged others to do the same in a Fox News interview Jan. 31."

Tancredo Meets With Imprisoned Ex-Border Patrol Agent. The AP (2/9) reports Rep. Tom Tancredo, "a Republican presidential candidate and opponent of illegal immigration," met with ex-US Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos at the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi. Ramos is in jail "for shooting a drug smuggling suspect in Texas and then lying about it," and he was recently "attacked by other inmates." Tancredo said, "It is our hope we can get him moved to another part of the facility that is safe for him but not in a segregated environment…23 hours a day in a cell, which he has now." Tancredo "has said the Bush administration failed to protect Ramos and has demanded that the agents receive a full presidential pardon."

ANTITRUST:

Two Sentenced In Indiana Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The Indianapolis Star (2/10, Corcoran) reports, "Two men convicted in November of involvement in an Indianapolis-area concrete price-fixing conspiracy will spend nearly twice as long in prison as ringleaders who cooperated and pleaded guilty." The Star continues, "Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney on Friday sentenced Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., to 27 months in prison for violating antitrust law and lying to the FBI. … The prison terms will be followed by two years of supervised release. Both men were ordered to pay $5,000 fines." The Star adds, "The conspiracy's ringleaders, who testified against the Beaver cousins in November, were sentenced to 14 months in prison. … The Beavers acknowledged attending several secret meetings called to set prices, but they still deny participating in the scheme. Both men agreed, however, they had lied to investigators. … Ricky Beaver, 43, also denied price-fixing, saying: 'I only went to two meetings. I didn't agree to anything.' … McKinney was unmoved, saying the jury had spoken, and he agreed the Beavers were active participants." The Star notes, The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials, the largest fine ever paid by a participant in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy. … The Beavers' sentencing came hours after McKinney sentenced John J. Blatzheim, 52, executive vice president of Fishers-based Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., to nine months in prison and a year of probation, and fined him $5,000. … In all, nine current or former officials of four area companies have been sentenced to prison in the scheme to overcharge concrete customers from July 2000 through May 25, 2004, when a series of early-morning FBI raids broke up the conspiracy. … 'We're pleased the defendants received significant sentences that reflect the seriousness of the crimes,' said Scott D. Hammond, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division."

Lear Agrees To Icahn's $2.8 Billion Buyout Offer. The New York Times (2/10, Bunkley) reports, "One of the biggest shareholders of the Lear Corporation, a manufacturer of automotive seats, criticized the company's deal on Friday to sell itself for $2.8 billion to the investor Carl C. Icahn." The Times continues, "The shareholder, Richard S. Pzena, who owns 11 percent of Lear through his firm, Pzena Investment Management, said he believed that the price was too low and that Lear did not need outside help to turn around its business. … Another shareholder, Evercore Asset, which calls itself a relatively small shareholder of Lear, said Friday that it was going to vote against Mr. Icahn's bid. Evercore said the offer price of $36 a share does not reflect the value of Lear." The Times ads, "The deal — the latest in a wave of major investments in the troubled auto parts industry — is worth $5.3 billion, including $2.5 billion in debt that will be assumed by American Real Estate Partners, the investment firm controlled by Mr. Icahn. Mr. Icahn already owns nearly 16 percent of Lear's 76.3 million outstanding shares, which would be valued at $36 each. … That is $3.39 less than the closing price for Lear's stock on Friday; shares fell 1.7 percent after the deal was announced."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A3, Kosdrosky) reports, "Lear Corp.'s support of a takeover offer by billionaire investor Carl Icahn has raised questions about whether the auto-parts supplier's board has worked hard enough to get the best deal for shareholders. … Management's welcoming response to the offer also sparked shareholder calls for the company to seek competing bids." The Journal continues, "The auto-parts supplier said on Friday its management supported Mr. Icahn's $36-a-share offer, adding that its board voted unanimously in favor of it, even though Lear stock has been trading at about the offer price. … The deal involving Mr. Icahn's American Real Estate Partners L.P., and valued at about $5.3 billion, is the latest move to grab a bigger stake in the auto-parts sector. Companies like Lear have struggled with lower production from U.S. auto makers, high raw-materials costs and pricing pressures. But deep-pocketed investors have been drawn to the sector because of the low valuations of many ailing companies and the belief some will recover. … At least three major shareholders believe Lear shares have the potential to appreciate well beyond the Icahn offer price and said they will vote against the bid."

Bank Of America Cooperating With DOJ's Municipal Bond Probe. The New York Times (2/10, Bajaj) reports, "Bank of America said yesterday that it was cooperating with a Justice Department investigation into bidding practices in the municipal bond business in exchange for leniency." The Times continues, "The agreement with the bank may be a significant breakthrough for government investigators who have been looking at how the proceeds of bonds issued by cities, school districts and other municipal authorities are invested between the time the money is raised and when it is spent on projects like new water systems and school gymnasiums." The Times adds, "Investigators are examining whether there was collusion among some financial institutions in bidding to handle the bond revenue during those interim periods. … Last November, the Justice Department issued subpoenas and raided the offices of several firms that served as go-betweens for municipalities and large financial institutions. … The investigation is the biggest in municipal finance since the 1990s, when the Securities and Exchange Commission accused some Wall Street firms of "yield burning" — or profiting by overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings. The current investigation is unusual because it appears to involve possible criminal charges."

The AP (2/10, Augstums) reports, "The Charlotte-based bank said the agreement will keep the department from bringing any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in the matter in return for its continuing cooperation. … The bank said it was receiving the special treatment because it went to the department with information about bidding practices in the bond industry before the government began its investigation last year." The AP adds, "Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to a number of Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports."

The Charlotte Observer (2/10, Rothacker) reports, "Bank of America Corp. said Friday that it won't face criminal prosecution for anti-trust matters in the U.S. Justice Department's ongoing investigation of bidding practices in the municipal bond industry." The Observer continues, "The Charlotte bank said it reached a leniency agreement with the agency, in return for its continuing cooperation. The announcement shed new light on the bank's role in a wide-ranging probe that became public late last year. … Under the Justice Department's leniency program, amnesty is available to a company that first reports information to the agency before the government has started its own investigation, the bank said." The Observer notes, "Separately, Bank of America said it had agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS related to certain bond transactions. Under the agreement, the bank said it did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code. … State and local governments issue municipal bonds to raise money for projects ranging from schools to transportation systems to housing projects. In return, investors receive tax breaks on the interest they receive from the bonds. … In 2006, investment banks raised about $379 billion through municipal bond issues, the second best year on record, according to Thomson Financial. Bank of America was the ninth-biggest underwriter." The Observer adds, "The industry faced scrutiny in the 1990s over the marking up of bond prices and now faces renewed examination. Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports. … At the time, the Justice Department said it was looking at 'anti-competitive practices.' The reports also said the IRS was examining whether consultants and underwriters were evading taxes in certain transactions."

Bloomberg (2/10, Selway, Braun) reports, "Bank of America is the first to announce an agreement with the U.S. government in connection with an antitrust probe of bid-rigging of investment contracts that are sold to states and municipalities. The settlement may help speed the pace of the probe, which has roiled an almost 200-year-old market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding. … 'It's a positive step when you see settlements because it does tend to expedite the process,' said Carol Lew, the president of the National Association of Bond Lawyers and a public finance attorney at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Roth in Newport Beach, California." Bloomberg adds, "The agreement came after Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America gave information to investigators before they initiated the probe, the bank said in its statement. The bank said offers of amnesty are available from the Justice Department to the first who reports behavior that is later investigated. … More than a dozen banks, insurers and brokers have been subpoenaed in the investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department's probe follows the IRS in looking into whether there were conspiracies to rig the bidding for so-called guaranteed investment contracts, where local governments invest money raised at bond sales until it is needed to pay for schools and other projects. … The Justice Department has declined to comment on the probe, saying only that it was investigating anti-competitive practices in the industry. Subpoenas issued in the investigation sought information on several financial products, including derivatives."

Market Watch (2/10, Gelsi) reports, "The pact by the nation's second-largest bank with the U.S. Justice Department could mark a breakthrough as the government investigates practices in the multi-billion dollar municipal bond industry. … Bank of America said it's inked a leniency agreement in connection with the department's investigation into bidding practices in the municipal derivatives sector. … 'This amnesty grant was a result of the company voluntarily providing information to the Department before the Department began its investigation, as well as the company's continuing cooperation,' Bank of America said. … In return for the company's cooperation, the Justice Department will not bring any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in connection with matters that the company reported to the Justice Department, Bank of America said."

FirstGroup To Purchase Laidlaw For $3.6 Billion. Bloomberg (2/10, Alloway) reports, "Britain's FirstGroup Plc agreed to buy Laidlaw International Inc., owner of the largest U.S. school-bus company and the Greyhound bus service, for $3.6 billion to triple revenue in North America." Bloomberg continues, "Laidlaw investors will receive $35.25 in cash for each share, Aberdeen, Scotland-based FirstGroup, the U.K.'s biggest train operator, said today in a statement. That's 11 percent more than the closing price of $31.72 yesterday." Bloomberg adds, "FirstGroup will merge its Ryder U.S. student buses division, acquired in 1999, with Laidlaw's fleet to give it a 13 percent share of the North American school bus market. Laidlaw's Greyhound Lines Inc. unit, the largest inter-city bus company, is ``a less obvious strategic fit'' and will be reviewed, FirstGroup said. … Laidlaw, founded in 1924, filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after almost 20 years of expansion. It bought hundreds of small school bus operators during the 1990s, culminating with the acquisition of Greyhound in 1998. … Gina Talamona, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman, said it hasn't been determined whether her agency's antitrust division or the Federal Trade Commission will review the deal."

New EPA Rules Will Reduce Toxic Emissions From Cars By 80%. The Washington Post (2/10, A2, Eilperin, 690K) reports the Environmental Protection Agency "issued rules yesterday that will dramatically cut toxic fumes from cars and trucks over the next 25 years. The regulations, which will reduce the amount of cancer-causing benzene in gasoline and set tighter emission standards for autos in cold temperatures and for fuel containers, will help reduce toxic emissions from passenger cars by 80 percent from 1999 levels by 2030. 'Americans love their cars,' EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a statement. 'By clearing the air from tons of fuel and exhaust pollution, President Bush and EPA are paving the road toward healthier drivers and a cleaner environment.'"

The New York Times (2/10, A9, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "The final rule, issued under a court-ordered deadline set after environmental groups filed suit about two years ago, provides more uniform reductions around the country than the agency had originally proposed. It was greeted with praise from environmental groups usually critical of the Bush administration in this area and with considerably less enthusiasm by the organization representing the country's 149 refineries."

WPost Encourages US Public To Accept Cloned Livestock. The Washington Post (2/10, A16, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Ever since the Food and Drug Administration officially vouched for the safety of food derived from cloned animals last month, Americans have given themselves a long and unnecessary national stomachache. Citing concerns over everything from safety to ethics, many of them told pollsters that they are apprehensive about milk and meat from clones entering supermarkets. Members of Congress are preparing to push legislation requiring food from clones and their progeny to be labeled as such. … It is important for the public not to overestimate the differences between cloning livestock for the purpose of breeding and what American ranchers and breeders already do to better their flocks and herds. The facts are less threatening than many Americans realize."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Transnational Gang Summit Closes With Agreement On Data Sharing. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, McGreevy) reported, "An international summit on transnational gangs wrapped up in Universal City on Friday with an agreement between U.S. and Latin American law enforcement leaders to begin crafting four initiatives, including one to improve intelligence sharing on criminals who move back and forth over borders. … 'We have arrested people here who were deported five times, so we want to put some of them on the list so we look harder at the border for the worst of the worst,' said Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal section of the FBI's Los Angeles office." The Times noted, "Also aiding the effort was the announcement this week by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the federal government would accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, which will help track gang members."

gave the Philadelphia Police Department a pat on the back yesterday for its work in trying to cripple the city's lucrative drug trade. Special Agent in Charge J.P. Weis lauded the efforts of Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson, Deputy Commissioner Richard Ross and leaders of the Narcotics Bureau, and presented them with a commemorative plaque and a check for approximately $2 million, which represented a portion of the money they had seized jointly during the 2005-06 fiscal year. He said of the relationship between the two agencies, 'It illustrates the camaraderie between these two units that transcends mere cooperation.'" The Daily News noted, "Just this week, police stopped a tractor-trailer…and found 100 kilos of cocaine with an estimated street value of $10 million. Forfeitures as large as Monday's are what Weis describes as a powerful tool against drug activity."

Husband Of Hawaii FBI Agent Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges. Honolulu Star Bulletin (2/10, Barayuga) reported, "The spouse of a former FBI technician has admitted to conspiring with others to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams, or 1.1 pounds, of methamphetamine." On Friday, Eric Moniz "pleaded guilty…in U.S. District Court to the charge, punishable by a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison. Moniz was one of 23 individuals indicted by a federal grand jury in April after an internal FBI investigation. The FBI began surveillance of employee Charmaine Moniz, wife of Eric Moniz, and her activities at work. They discovered she had been accessing a confidential database and reviewing documents relating to her husband's longtime friend Damien Kalei Hina, an alleged drug dealer in Waialua, as well as Jonathan Kimo Luna and Jess Lundgren." The AP (2/10) also briefly reported on Moniz's plea.

Hawaii Police Officer Admits Protecting Illegal Gambling Operation. The Honolulu Advertiser (2/10, Kobayashi) reported, "A second Honolulu police officer has pleaded guilty in a scheme to protect an illegal cockfight and gambling operation in Waialua." On Friday, Bryson Apo "admitted…that he provided the operators information about when police would raid the illegal activities and also acknowledged that he would bet on the cockfights 'from time to time' during the 2004 to 2005 cockfighting season. … Apo, an eight-year veteran of the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiring to obstruct the enforcement of criminal laws." The Advertiser noted, "The charges were the result of a massive FBI wiretap operation into gambling, drug and other illegal activities. Kevin Brunn, the third officer, is awaiting trial."

The Honolulu Star Bulletin (2/10, Barayuga) reported Apo pleaded guilty "to conspiring with more than five others, including members of a large landowning family in Waialua and two other police officers, to obstruct the enforcement of state laws prohibiting illegal gambling, specifically cockfighting, craps and card games. … The indictment stemmed from a two-year federal investigation that began in 2003 into illegal gambling and cockfighting" in Waialua.

Cuba Transfers Key Drug Cartel Head To Colombia. The New York Times (2/10, A4, McKinley, Romero, 1.16M) reports the transfer of Luis Hernando Gómez Bustamante, "the leader of a Colombian drug cartel that American prosecutors say flooded New York City streets with cocaine," from Cuban to Colombian custody in Bogota. Havana's "decision to send [Bustamante] to Colombia surprised American authorities, law enforcement officials said. Cuba's government has no diplomatic relations with the United States, and some people charged with crimes on American soil have found a haven in Havana." Also known as Rasguno, Bustamante is "the reputed boss of the Norte del Valle cartel," has been in jail in Cuba for three years "on immigration charges." Norte del Valle "was one of the most violent, lucrative and extensive cocaine-smuggling rings in the world, accounting for at least 30 percent of the cocaine being imported into the United States, Justice Department officials said."

DOJ Warns NYC Probes Of Out-Of-State Gun Stings May Be Illegal. The AP (2/9, Gross) reports, "Private investigators hired by the city to conduct sting operations on out-of-state gun shops could be breaking the law, and the dealers they caught making illegal sales will not be prosecuted, federal officials said." The AP continues, "City officials have sued more than two dozen dealers after hiring investigators to pose as buyers attempting straw purchases, in which one person fills out the paperwork for the gun but is buying for someone else. The scam is often used by convicted felons and others barred from owning firearms." The AP adds, "The city argues that the shops - in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - are responsible for many of the illegal weapons that end up in New York, and the suits have led seven dealers to agree to more scrutiny. … The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced in May it was reviewing whether the city acted legally. … 'Potential legal liabilities' arise when civilians do the work of law enforcers, Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said Thursday. The department has decided charges are not warranted against dealers in the sting cases, he said. … It was unclear whether the private investigators could face charges." The AP notes, "After the Justice Department decided not to base criminal prosecutions on the stings, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said that 'the preferred solution' is getting legal agreements with the shops to monitor their sales practices but that the city also plans to retain its right to continue the operations."

IMMIGRATION:

Media Given Tour Of Detention Facility For Families Of Illegal Immigrants. The New York Times (2/10, A9, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Responding to complaints about conditions" at the T. Don Hutto Family Detention Center in Taylor, Texas, the "nation's main family detention center for illegal immigrants, officials threw open the gates on Friday for a first news media tour. They portrayed the privately run converted prison, open since May, as a model facility 'primarily focused on the safety of the children.' Once all the barbed wire comes down, Gary Mead, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement official, said, 'it's going to look more like a community college with a very high chain-link fence.' Among other things, critics have complained about the prisonlike conditions, the food and the limited amount of schooling and recreation provided for children."

The Dallas Morning News (2/10, Meyer, 500K) reports, "The center, just northeast of Austin, has been home to three North Texas Palestinian families in recent months, including members of the Ibrahim family, whose controversial detention sparked a new round of criticism last week. … Human rights observers and civil rights advocates have condemned the decision to keep children in Hutto, citing abuses that include inadequate education, weight loss and psychological trauma. The government, they say, has a responsibility to find less-restrictive environments when the incarceration of minors is necessary."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Gaouette, Bustillo, 850K) reports Hutto "is a pillar of the Bush administration's effort to crack down on illegal immigrants and detain them until their appeals can be heard. It holds detainees who cannot easily be sent home, as Mexicans can. Hutto has families from 29 countries, most from South America. The center is touted by the Homeland Security Department as a major achievement, and may be a model for future facilities. Hutto also illustrates the administration's bind as its pursuit of border security collides with the reality that many illegal immigrants are minors. On Friday, a majority of Hutto's 383 inmates were children."

Report Blasts DHS Treatment Of Asylum Seekers. The Washington Post (2/10, A6, Fears, 690K) reports, "The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom has issued a report that sharply criticizes federal immigration authorities for rounding up asylum-seekers at the border, detaining them for months in prisonlike facilities and quickly dispatching them back to the countries they fled. Thursday's report by the bipartisan panel was a follow-up to one two years ago that reported similar findings about detention and expedited removal. It said the Department of Homeland Security and two of its agencies -- the U.S. Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement -- did not act on its recommendations and made little effort to help asylum-seekers." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the homeland security committee, "pledged to introduce legislation that would force officials to follow procedures. In a statement Thursday, he and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy praised the report as detailed and thorough."

Former NFL Star Stabler Selling Home To Pay Tax Debt. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/10, Kirby) reports, "Former football great and University of Alabama broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed to put his longtime house near Orange Beach up for sale to pay off tax debts, court records indicate." The Press-Register continues, "Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the U.S. Department of Justice asked a federal judge in Mobile this week to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell. Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. was out of the office Thursday and Friday and did not rule on the request, but judges typically grant such motions when none of the parties opposes it." The Press-Register adds, "The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000. … Stabler's lawyer, Robert Galloway, said Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money. Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case. … 'We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it,' he said. 'This is the time of the year that houses sell.'" The Press-Register notes, "The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001. The federal government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000."

The AP (2/10) reports, "The civil action accuses Stabler of moving money from the company to his personal account to avoid paying corporate taxes. It states that he transferred nearly $1.4 million from the Stabler Co. to himself in the form of 'loans' in 1998 and 1999. … At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint. … 'If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations,' the suit states."

Judge Blasts DOJ Over Plea Deal In Utah Tax Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/10, Manson) reports, "A federal judge says prosecutors ignored their own policy when they gave a lenient plea bargain to a Bountiful accountant who prepared fraudulent tax returns." The Tribune continues, U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell refused to go along with the deal, which called for no incarceration and no restitution for Lance W. Mercer. Cassell instead ordered Mercer to spend five months in home confinement, then five months in prison and pay $11,378 to the Internal Revenue Service." The Tribune adds, "Cassell scolded the U.S. Justice Department's tax division for agreeing not to ask for any enhanced sentences under federal sentencing guidelines. … Mercer, a tax preparer with a master's degree, had a special skill that he used to cheat the government, Cassell wrote in his order. The accountant used his knowledge of what figures would appear reasonable to make returns 'fly through' IRS processing, Cassell wrote. … However, prosecutors not only declined to request a sentence enhancement based on the special-skill circumstance, they actually objected to any increase, Cassell said." The Tribune notes, "The judge noted that in 2003, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said any sentencing recommendation by the Justice Department 'must honestly reflect the totality and seriousness of the defendant's conduct and must be fully consistent with the guidelines.' .. .About the same time in 2003, Cassell noted, the Justice Department argued to Congress that judges' failure to comply with the guidelines had resulted in reduced sentences and an erosion of the deterrent value of federal sentencing policy. … 'The court firmly agrees with the generally stated position of the department that a sentencing system that involves ignoring the obvious facts is "neither desirable nor capable of sustaining long-term public confidence,"' Cassell said. … He stressed his criticism is not aimed at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah or the trial attorney assigned to defend Mercer's plea bargain." The Tribune adds, "Assistant Attorney General Eileen J. O'Connor said Thursday that the tax division adheres to 'principles of federal prosecution, including DOJ policies concerning sentencing.'"

DOJ Accuses California Accountant Of Misrepresentation. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (2/10, Lindenberger) reports, "Lowell Baisden, the California accountant currently under investigation for tax fraud, is being accused of misrepresenting facts in his opposition to a preliminary injunction from the U.S. Department of Justice." The Telegraph continues, "Court documents filed by Baisden's attorneys in December indicated that IRS attorney Kathryn Meyer had verified the legality of Baisden's actions and that she informed IRS agents Baisden had done nothing illegal. … However, Meyer's official declaration, which was filed Feb. 2 by Justice Department attorney Jacqueline Brown, indicate Meyer never made any statement or suggestion that Baisden's scheme was legal. … 'To the contrary ... I determined that Mr. Baisden's scheme is without merit, results in a substantial understatement of his clients' federal income tax liabilities, and that an injunction against Mr. Baisden's continued use of this scheme is essential,' Meyer stated in her declaration." The Telegraph adds, "Thomas Cheung, the IRS agent assigned to investigate Baisden, also stated in an official declaration filed last week that he never told Baisden his tax methods were correct. Yet, Baisden has allegedly hindered the IRS investigation by telling others that Cheung and Meyer had agreed Baisden's methods were proper. … In a reply to Baisden's opposition to the preliminary injunction, Brown said Baisden has admitted to the IRS in prior interviews that he has never requested a formal determination as to the validity of his tax plan. Furthermore, Brown said the IRS has notified Baisden on several occasions that his methods are inaccurate."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Upset By Waxman's Schedule Of Oversight Hearings. The Washington Times (2/10, Miller, 88K) reports Rep. Henry Waxman's Committee on Oversight and Government Reform "spent the week delving into government waste that ranged from spending in Iraq to federal drug program pricing -- inquests Republicans say mainly provided entertainment but no legislative action. Some of the hearings…were strictly 'a show,' said Rep. Darrell Issa," who "cited the hearing Wednesday with tearful testimony by family members of three civilian security workers killed and mutilated by a Fallujah mob in a widely televised attack in March 2004." Issa "said he hoped the committee would move beyond these hearings and make proposals to curb wasteful government spending, such as rewriting contracting and procurement rules. But the initial hearings -- including one focusing on criticism of how U.S. officials accounted for Iraqi money spent after the fall of dictator Saddam Hussein -- rankled Republicans."

Rangel Reportedly Signs Off On Small Business Tax Cuts. The Hill (2/9, Marre) reports House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel and ranking member Jim McCrery "said Friday they have reached a deal on a package of tax cuts for small businesses that could smooth the path of a federal minimum wage increase to $7.25. 'This bill strengthens opportunities for small businesses and serves as a symbol of what can happen when Democrats and Republicans work together,' Rangel said in a joint statement."

Bill Would Raise Capital Gains Rate On Children Of Wealthy. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B5, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "To help fund legislation giving small businesses more than $1 billion in tax breaks, House tax writers propose blocking wealthy people from shifting income to their children." The bill would deny "the dependent children of wealthy people the lowest capital-gains and dividend rates, 5% this year and falling to zero next year. The low rates, available to people in the 10% and 15% tax brackets, 'presumably' were meant to benefit low-income people, according to a House Ways and Means summary. But because they also are available to children of wealthy people, those parents can reduce their own taxes by shifting assets to their children."

House GOP Leadership To Produce Weekly Radio Message. The Hill (2/9, Jacobs) reports on its Web site that House GOP leaders "officially announced Friday that House Republicans will be taping an address this week that will be distributed to hundreds of local and national radio stations across the country. … GOP leaders will use the radio address to outline House Republican positions and respond to the Democratic agenda. Each week, a member of the Republican leadership will tackle a different issue facing Americans."

Pelosi Plane Controversy Caught Eye Of "Muzzled" Republicans. The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Superville) reports on its front House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "went before the House Science Committee [Thursday] morning to champion her commitment to do something about global warming, a rare appearance for a leader of the House. She did so as reports swirled on Capitol Hill that she had requested a bigger, swankier government airplane than her Republican predecessor had used." For Republicans, "feeling muzzled and still down over losing control of the House, the irony was too good to ignore."

Miller Defends Himself Against Allegations Of Tax Fraud. The Washington Post (2/10, A5, Geis, 690K) reports Rep. Gary Miller "defended his reputation this week, as FBI investigators look into charges that he improperly delayed paying taxes on several lucrative land deals." Miller "told fellow House Republicans behind closed doors Tuesday that he 'has done nothing wrong, his business dealings have all been above-board and that these allegations are baseless and have no merit,' his spokesman Scott Toussaint said. The FBI investigation follows an article in the Los Angeles Times and a complaint from the nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics alleging that Miller, a wealthy real estate developer, unlawfully avoided paying taxes on a land deal. … Miller has not been contacted by the IRS or the FBI, Toussaint said. Miller voluntarily turned over documents related to his business to the House ethics committee and to Minority Leader John A. Boehner."

New Congressional Ethics Rules Seen As Unlikely To Be Effective. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/10, A15, 1.16M) Randy Evans, outside counsel to former House Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert, writes, "The Democratic majority in Congress has made ethics reform a centerpiece of its agenda -- and not a moment too soon. … Unfortunately, the latest reforms (some adopted in the House by rule and others proposed by the Senate in legislation) tighten restrictions without actually addressing the real reasons that Congressional ethics rules have been ineffective in the past. The result is tougher rules that will rarely, if ever, be enforced. Here's why. First, regardless of what anyone might claim, there remains no mechanism for policing those at the heart of Congress's ethics problems: lobbyists willing to violate the rules. … Second, even with the new rules, only members of Congress or someone with a member's permission can file a complaint with the House ethics committee. But limiting who can file a complaint effectively precludes any meaningful enforcement."

Marines Ground V-22. The Washington Post (2/10, Merle, 690K) reports, "The Marine Corps said yesterday it was temporarily grounding its fleet of V-22 Osprey tilt rotors after discovering a glitch in a computer chip that could cause the aircraft to lose control. ... It was an unexpected setback for the program; the military last grounded the fleet in 2000 after two fatal crashes that killed 23 Marines."

USAF Academy Investigates Alleged Cadet Cheating. The Washington Post (2/10, A3, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "The Air Force Academy is investigating allegations of cheating by 28 freshmen and has restricted all 4,300 cadets to campus over the weekend, asking them to meet in small groups to consider 'their self-image and the image of the institution,' Air Force officials said yesterday." Cadets said "that the cheating took place on a weekly test that typically includes questions about the chain of command and military jargon." The AP (2/9) says "some cadets admitted obtaining answers to a test and forwarding them through an Internet social group and private computer messages."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush's Efforts On Social Security Reform. The New York Times (2/10, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "In 2005, President Bush put his political capital where his mouth was, and lost. He went all-out to convince Congress and the American people that privatizing Social Security would be good and necessary. It's neither — and his plan was justifiably and soundly rejected. This year, with his political capital on empty, Mr. Bush is talking about a bipartisan effort to reform Social Security. But his actions suggest that he has no intention of making any serious compromises. In his new budget, Mr. Bush allocates $29.3 billion to establish private accounts in 2012, totaling $637 billion through 2017. That suggests that either Mr. Bush still hasn't figured out that private accounts are a political nonstarter, or he's hoping to use them as a bargaining chip in future negotiations. Either way, that attitude virtually ensures that Social Security reform will stall in this Congress, just as it did when the Republicans were in charge."

Bush's Health Insurance Proposal Said To "Not Go Far Enough." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) Henry Aaron of the Brookings Institution writes, "Healthcare analysts have long deplored the linkage between health insurance and employment. … But President Bush's proposed fix does not go far enough." Aaron adds, "So, what is right and what is wrong with the president's plan? What is right is that it would extend to individually purchased insurance a tax break similar to the one now available only on employer-financed coverage. It would do so in a way that would not add to the federal deficit measured over 10 years, although it would boost deficits initially. Unfortunately, the plan would continue the incentive of bigger tax breaks for high earners even though most of the uninsured are low earners. A better plan would be a tax credit that offered the same tax relief per dollar of insurance to people at all income levels. Better still would be offering larger credits to low-income households, which need help, rather than to high-income households, which don't. The bigger problem with the Bush plan is that it would not ensure that people would be able to find insurance at a reasonable price."

Volcker Claims Federal Judges Are Not Compensated Adequately. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A9, 2.04M) former Fed Chairman Paul Volcker writes, 'The simple fact is that judicial compensation has not kept pace with reasonable requirements. … Congress has simply refused to make good on its expressed goal, and has not even provided cost of living adjustments. It has now been 16 years since this last judicial pay raise took full effect. Since that time, average American workers' wages, when adjusted for inflation, have risen 18.5%. During that same period, federal judges' real, inflation-adjusted pay has declined 10.8%, while the pay of most other federal workers, when adjusted for inflation, has risen by 15.1%. The decline in real pay of district judges has dropped by 25% since the earlier 1969 review."

LATimes Pleased By ABA's Decision On Judicial Ethics. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) reports the American Bar Association "is having some sound second thoughts about weakening a key provision of its Model Code of Judicial Conduct, which traditionally has served as a guide to state court systems in setting their own ethics rules. An ABA drafting panel had been criticized — including by this editorial page — for proposing changes that would have diluted a provision saying that judges should avoid even the 'appearance of impropriety.' But now the panel is expected next week to accept a 'friendly amendment' to its own proposal at an ABA meeting in Miami, one that would undo the damage. … Avoiding the appearance of impropriety should remain a commandment for judges, not be demoted to a mere suggestion. The ABA should make clear next week that it has gotten that message."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Declined Friday. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks ended the week on a down note. The Dow was down almost 57 points, Nasdaq was down just under 29. For the week as a whole, the Dow lost nearly 73 points, Nasdaq was down 16 points." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B1, Browning, 2.04M) says the Dow "pulled back 72.66 points, or 0.57%, to 12580.83 in the week that just ended, including a decline of 56.80 points, or 0.45%, Friday" The S&P 500 "fell 0.71%, or 10.25 points, to 1438.06, still up 1.4% this year," while the Nasdaq "declined 1.16% Friday, or 28.85 points, to 2459.82, ahead 1.8% in 2007."

Fed Could Still Raise Interest Rates. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A4, Derby, 2.04M) reports, "Inflation pressures have clearly not moderated enough to quell Federal Reserve officials' repeated warnings they may yet have to raise rates again. Several policy makers said Friday that while they are optimistic inflationary pressures will wane this year, they nonetheless stand ready to cure too-high price pressures with rate increases, if needed."

Bies Leaving Fed. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A4, Ives-Halperin, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies announced she will leave her post at the end of March. She will not attend the March 20-21 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee.

Imam Rises To Prominence Along With Ellison. The New York Times (2/10, B6, Freedman, 1.16M) reports, "On the evening after Minnesota's Democratic primary last September, Makram El-Amin picked up his ringing cellphone to hear the raspy, exhausted voice of Keith Ellison. The men had known each other for a decade, long enough for Mr. El-Amin to become the imam of a mosque in their North Minneapolis neighborhood and Mr. Ellison to win a seat as the area's state representative. … Two months later, Mr. Ellison won election, becoming the first Muslim member of Congress, and doing so in an overwhelmingly non-Muslim district. As for Mr. El-Amin, he was transformed into a congressman's imam, putting an Islamic imprint on the role of spiritual adviser played by such figures as the Rev. Billy Graham for Richard M. Nixon and the Rev. Jesse Jackson for Bill Clinton."

Candidates Opt For Big Events Over Retail Politicking In New Hampshire. The Boston Globe (2/10, Milligan, 413K) writes that while New Hampshire "has long cherished its role as the place where presidential hopefuls test the political waters by campaigning in diners and living rooms," the 2008 field is "choosing instead to go for the big splash." The "huge crowd that showed up to see" Sen. Barack Obama in December, "an event that helped mark Obama as a political phenomenon," may have "pressured other hopefuls to prove their own appeal by drawing standing-room-only crowds. Following big-extravaganza appearances last month" by John Edwards and Rudy Giuliani, Sen. Hillary Rodham "is scheduled to speak today at a gymnasium-sized 'town meeting' in Concord -- an event that filled up two days after it was announced and drew so much advance media attention that Democrats this week offered up interviews with people making signs for the event. Meanwhile, Obama's town meeting scheduled for Monday in Durham is at capacity, with 2,500 free tickets handed out in eight hours. About 850 standby tickets have been given to those hoping to take the place of no-shows."

Obama Expected To Formally Enter Presidential Race Today. Two broadcast networks ran long reports on Sen. Barack Obama on the eve of his formal entry into the presidential race, though print coverage this morning is comparatively light. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 3, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported Obama "has chosen an historic site to launch what he hopes will be a history-making campaign. Tomorrow, the senator from Illinois will officially announce his candidacy outside the old state Capitol in Springfield, where Abraham Lincoln once served as a legislator." CBS (Borger): "Obama's audacious presidential bid has jump-started Campaign 2008, and it's brought the issue of race front and center. In an exclusive interview with Steve Kroft for 60 Minutes, he confronts it head on." CBS (Kroft): "You think the country's ready for a black president?" Obama: "Yes." Kroft: "You don't think it's going to hold you back?" Obama: "No. You know, I think if I don't win this race, it will be because of other factors. It's going to be because I have not shown to the American people a vision for where the country needs to go that they can embrace."

NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 7, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) said that while Obama "has never positioned himself as the black candidate," the "question of his race, of course, will continue to be much discussed and debated, especially among African-Americans." NBC (Allen) reported that in seeking black support, "Obama points to his work as a community organizer in poor Chicago neighborhoods like this one and legislation be pushed in the state senate to improve education, housing and end racial profiling. … Obama has said he has wrestled with race and identity much of his race and identity much of his life. No wonder those are issues for the nation and black America as well."

Like the two network pieces, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wallsten, 850K) focuses its report on the race issue, headlining a story, "Would Obama Be 'The Black President'?" The Times says "some of the questions arise from Obama's upbringing in Hawaii, remote from the urban struggles of Chicago's black neighborhoods, and from his heritage as the son of a white American mother and black Kenyan father." His "appeal to white voters leaves some black activists questioning the depth of his links to the black community," one scholar said. The AP (2/9, Cohen) says Obama is part of "a new generation of black political leaders -- a generation that never fought off Bull Connor's dogs, or desegregated lunch counters."

The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Pearson, Long, 617K) reports Obama, "using the home of Lincoln's famed 'House Divided' speech as a backdrop," is expected to today "make formal his historic entry into the 2008 presidential campaign, presenting himself as a symbol for a new generation of leadership and politics." To "counter complaints he lacks experience with only two years in the U.S. Senate, Obama planned to open his campaign not far from where he served for eight years in the Illinois General Assembly, where his tenure was notable for his comity and willingness to reach across the aisle." And "in a larger sense, Obama's formal announcement, scheduled for a chilly outdoor makeshift stage at the Old State Capitol on the weekend before Lincoln's birthday, was aimed at assimilating the greater imagery of Lincoln that looms over Springfield, of a man who sought to heal a nation at war with itself, its populace sharply divided." The AP (2/9) says it "will be the start of a long weekend of rallies and events" for Obama "that will take him from Springfield to Iowa and then on to Chicago before he wraps up Monday in New Hampshire." The Financial Times (2/10, Daniel) and BBC.com (2/10, Coomarasamy) also have items on today's campaign announcement.

Obama's "Free Ride" Could Be About To End. Mike Allen writes for The Politico (2/9) that Obama's "free ride is ending. The charismatic Illinois senator has enjoyed a lifetime of hagiography, starting with an 800-word story in The New York Times the day after his election as the first black president of the Harvard Law Review. Now, Obama's about to endure a going-over that would make a proctologist blush. Why has he sometimes said his first name is Arabic, and other times Swahili? Why did he make up names in his first book, as the introduction acknowledges? Why did he say two years ago that he would 'absolutely' serve out his Senate term, which ends in 2011, and that the idea of him running for president this cycle was 'silly' and hype 'that's been a little overblown'? In interviews, strategists in both parties pointed to four big vulnerabilities: Obama's inexperience, the thinness of his policy record, his frank liberalism in a time when the party needs centrist voters and the wealth of targets that are provided by the personal recollections in his first book, from past drug use to conversations that cannot be documented." Allen says "opponents' plans for undoing Obama" are likely to focus on his "inexperience," "anemic policy record," "liberalism," and "disclosures in his books."

Clinton Tied For First In Iowa, Takes Lead In New Hampshire, In Zogby Polls. A Zogby poll of 500 likely Iowa Democratic caucus participants (+/- 4.5%) shows Sen. Hillary Clinton gaining ground, and Tom Vilsack losing support, in the leadoff state. Clinton is backed by 24% of respondents, tied with John Edwards. Sen. Barack Obama is at 18%, Vilsack 9%, and Sen. Joseph Biden 4%. A month ago, Edwards was at 27%, Obama 17%, and Clinton and Vilsack tied at 16% each, with Biden at 3%. In New Hampshire, a Zogby Poll of 500 likely primary participants (+/- 4.5%) shows Clinton moving into the lead, backed by 27% of respondents. Obama is at 23%, Edwards 13%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 3%.

Clinton Says Her Iraq Vote Was "Not A Vote For A Pre-Emptive War." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, DiStaso) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton said in a Friday telephone interview that her "2002 vote for a resolution authorizing the invasion of Iraq was 'not a vote for a pre-emptive war,' but instead a show of support for further United Nations weapons inspections." Clinton, "who has been criticized by hard-line anti-war groups for not apologizing for the vote, emphasized that distinction." Clinton said, "I have taken responsibility for that vote. It was based on the best assessment that I could make at the time, and it was clearly intended to demonstrate support for going to the United Nations to put inspectors into Iraq." Clinton said that "when she explained her vote four years ago, 'I said that it was not a vote for pre-emptive war.'"

Clinton Will Compete In New Hampshire Primary "Whenever It's Held." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, DiStaso) reports Clinton said she "will ignore her own national party's rules and campaign in New Hampshire even if the first-in-the-nation primary is set for a date that does not comply the party's predetermined calendar." Clinton said, "I am going to compete in the New Hampshire primary whenever it's held. I'm excited about it. I want to be part of it. I want to do it the New Hampshire way."

Clinton To Visit South Caroline On February 19. The AP (2/9) reports Clinton "will make her first South Carolina presidential campaign stop on Feb. 19, state Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin said Friday. 'We don't have any of the specific places yet,' Erwin said." News of Clinton's visit comes as Sen. Barack Obama's "plans to come to South Carolina became public. Obama will make stops in Columbia and Orangeburg Feb. 16 and 17, said Anton Gunn, Obama's new state political director."

Edwards No Longer Has Lock On Trial Lawyers' Support. The Washington Post (2/10, A4, Mosk, 690K) writes that while in 2004, John Edwards "had the powerful support and deep pockets of the nation's trial lawyers behind him," this time he "no longer has a lock on the backing of the lawyers" and "will be battling it out with others in the Democratic field, who are seen as sympathetic to plaintiffs and their attorneys." Attorney Thomas Girardi, who was finance co-chairman of the 2004 Edwards campaign, said that then, Edwards "was a much better candidate for the issues we care deeply about." But in this cycle, Edwards and Sens. Joseph Biden, Hillary Clinton, and Barack Obama "all are very positive in terms of the philosophical view. So you have a different situation with respect to our support." But Edwards "continues to work hard to win over trial lawyers. 'He's getting good support from them,' campaign spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said. 'I wouldn't read too much into the leanings of any one person.'"

Vilsack Says He Will Win Iowa Caucuses. Tom Vilsack said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/9), "This is sort of like now we're going through the 'American Idol' stage of this primary process. There are rock stars and then there are rock-solid candidates. I put myself in the rock-solid category. The reality is the early polls mean absolutely nothing. Certainly, they don't mean much in Iowa. If that were the case, Joe Lieberman would have been nominated as a Democratic nominee. I'm very well positioned to win in Iowa. We have a great organization, seven field offices and over 1,000 people have signed cards saying they're going to caucus for me…and we're going to win."

The AP (2/9, Glover) says that in a conference call with reporters, Vilsack said, "This is a marathon. In essence you have to peak at the right time. … As of today, we are the only campaign in Iowa that has field offices operating."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Cut Off War Funding. In a Washington Post (2/10, 690K) op-ed, Vilsack writes, "Given the increased violence this year, America is on pace to lose more than 1,000 soldiers in Iraq. Over 23,000 American soldiers have been wounded since the war began, nearly 6,000 each year. It is time for us to clearly say that our troops must be brought home now. … Congress has the constitutional ability and the moral responsibility to pass legislation cutting off funding for the status quo."

Giuliani Said To Be Redefining Stance On Abortion. The New York Times (2/10, Rivera, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Rudy Giuliani's "belief in abortion rights" is seen by many as a possible impediment to his capturing of the Republican presidential nomination. But "in recent weeks, as he has courted voters in South Carolina and talked to conservative media outlets," Giuliani "has highlighted a different element of his thinking on the abortion debate. He has talked about how he would appoint 'strict constructionist' judges to the Supreme Court. … The effect has been to distance himself from a position favoring abortion rights that he espoused when he ran for mayor of New York City, where most voters favor abortion rights." For Giuliani, "a Brooklyn-born Roman Catholic who once considered entering the priesthood," the abortion issue "has been a source of discomfort throughout his political career."

Giuliani To Address California GOP Convention Today. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Marinucci, Wildermuth, 384K) reports on its front page that Giuliani "has all the qualities of a Republican who could appeal to voters in blue-state California: He is pro-choice, pro-gay rights and a defender of stricter gun-control laws," but those "moderate positions on social issues rankle the GOP conservatives who represent the backbone of his party's activists" in the state. Giuliani will today address the California state GOP convention in Sacramento, "marking his first major address since he announced the establishment of an exploratory committee for president." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Finnegan, 850K) says for Giuliani, "California plays an increasingly large part in his calculus for winning the Republican nomination. It is one of several big states on the verge of advancing their 2008 presidential primaries to Feb. 5, a shift that enhances the election climate for Giuliani. Among other effects, the calendar change heightens the importance of celebrity, giving an edge to Giuliani" and Sen. John McCain.

McCain "Remains A Wealthy Man," FEC Disclosure Report Shows. The Washington Post (2/10, A6, Mosk, 690K) reports Sen. John McCain's latest financial disclosure report shows that while some land he owns "slipped in value last year," he "remains a wealthy man, largely because of investments and holdings controlled by his wife, Cindy." The required Federal Election Commission forms "allow him to report the value of holdings within broad ranges, making his net worth difficult to calculate with confidence. Previous reports have put it at roughly $15 million. Most of that money stems from his wife, the millionaire daughter of an Arizona beer magnate."

McCain Campaign Opens Michigan Headquarters. The Grand Rapids Press (2/10, Murray) reports "some of Michigan's best-known Republicans, including Attorney General Mike Cox and U.S. Rep. Fred Upton, threw their support" behind McCain at the opening of his state headquarters Friday.

Giuliani, McCain To Raise Funds In Virginia Next Week. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/10, Hardin) reports Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain will each "be in Richmond next week seeking financial support for their campaigns." Former gubernatorial candidate Jerry Kilgore, who "is expected to lead Giuliani's campaign in Virginia," will host the Giuliani event.

Romney Addresses Alabama Republicans. The AP (2/9) reports Mitt Romney "brought his presidential campaign to Alabama Friday night, and he sought to dispel any concerns about his past views on social issues." He told Montgomery Republicans that he is opposed to same-sex marriage and said the "Roe versus Wade mentality cheapens the dignity of human life." Gov. Bob Riley "attended the event and called Romney the 'quintessential candidate.'"

Huckabee Says Current Conflict Is "World War III." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, Whitson) reports Mike Huckabee "delivered a wide-ranging speech to about 40 people, many of them business leaders," at Daniel Webster College in Nashua Friday, and said the "next President has to recognize the war in Iraq's true gravity." Huckabee said, "We need to understand that this is, in fact, World War III." Ex-Rep. Charlie Bass was among the attendees, but "stopped well short of offering his endorsement. 'I'm remaining uncommitted at this point,' he said."

Huckabee Defends Traditional Definition Of Marriage. In an interview with the AP (2/9, Elliott) following the speech, Huckabee, "in response to questions about whether Vice President Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter should have the right to wed," said marriage "shouldn't be treated as an experiment." Huckabee said "heterosexual marriages face enough challenges without adding new configurations to the mix." He "declined to comment on Mary Cheney's decision" to have a child, saying, "I wouldn't get near specific cases."

Perry Consultant Says Texas Governor Has No National Ambitions. The Houston Chronicle (2/10, Elliott, 530K) reports Gov. Rick Perry's chief political consultant, Dave Carney, said Perry "has no interest in national politics and may seek re-election in 2010." Carney said "speculation that recent decisions by Perry, including his mandate that middle-school girls be inoculated against a sexually transmitted virus linked to cervical cancer, are designed to raise the governor's profile nationally is 'one of the most retarded things about the political observers in Texas.'"

WSJournal Considers "Wide-Open Republican Race." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "Now is the season of Republican discontent, extending even to the party's Presidential candidates. For the first time in decades, no dominant candidate has emerged and GOP voters seem to be in a Missouri state of mind: Show us what you really believe. We know exactly how they feel. John McCain has been considered the front-runner," and "his fortitude on Iraq has been all the more impressive since the war has become unpopular and threatens the media adulation he has long enjoyed. Tenacity is a Presidential asset, especially in dangerous times. But among many Republicans, Mr. McCain is also paying a price for his years as a policy 'maverick.'" Mitt Romney "has shown he can win votes in a blue state, and he was successful both as a capitalist and as manager of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics," but he "is something of an empty policy slate." As for Rudy Giuliani, "a Northeasterner who favors gun control and abortion rights isn't supposed to have a Ralph Nader's chance in the GOP primaries. Yet today Mr. Giuliani leads in the national polls and is all but tied with Mr. McCain in New Hampshire. Some of this is no doubt due to name recognition after his 9/11 heroics. On the other hand, maybe cultural conservatives aren't the single-issue voters of media lore. Mr. Giuliani can point to the revival of the previously ungovernable New York, and his temerity and experience in a crisis are qualities that voters look for in a Commander-in-Chief. … All in all, this looks like the most wide-open Republican race in years. That may be a good thing if it forces the candidates to battle over ideas and revive the GOP reform agenda that got lost in the fog of the 109th Congress."

Harvard Chooses First Female President. The Washington Post (2/10, Strauss, Kinzie, 690K) reports on its front page that Harvard University "is about to name its first woman president since its founding in 1636, tapping a Civil War historian to succeed Lawrence Summers, whose tumultuous tenure was marked by controversial remarks about women and clashes with faculty members. Drew Gilpin Faust, 59, dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study and a leading historian on the American South, will be formally appointed president as early as this weekend, according to a source with knowledge of the decision." The New York Times (2/10, Rimer, Finder, 1.16M), also on the front page, says Summers "turned to Dr. Faust two years ago to help calm the furor over his remarks about women in math, engineering and science. He asked her to oversee two committees he created to come up with ways to recruit, retain and promote women in those fields at Harvard."

The Boston Globe (2/10, A1, Bombardieri, Sacchetti, 413K), Los Angeles Times (2/10, Paddock, Trounson, 850K), Financial Times (2/10, Knight), Philadelphia Inquirer (2/10, A1, Kerkstra, Matza, Woodall, 385K), and Wall Street Journal (2/10, A2, Hechinger, Golden, 2.04M) are among the major newspapers with prominent stories on the pick; ABC World News (2/9, story 4, Gibson, 8.78M) ran a brief item on the Faust choice.

Ex-President Bush Friends With Television Actress. The Washington Post (2/10, C3, 690K) "Names & Faces" column writes, "Eyebrows hit the roof earlier this week when Teri Hatcher, 42, and George H.W. Bush, 82, were spotted lunching together in Beverly Hills. Shots of the twosome chatting and kissing goodbye -- on the cheek, folks -- in the Los Angeles Country Club's parking lot have surfaced all over the Web." The two have been friends since they were seated together at a Las Vegas hotel opening several years ago, and Hatcher and her daughter "visited the Bush compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, last year, Bush spokeswoman Jean Becker told us yesterday." Becker said, "They enjoy each other's company. … It's not about politics -- they have a very personal and friendly relationship."

the New York Times (2/10, A15, 1.16M) Gar Alperovitz, professor of political economy at the University of Maryland, writes Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "seems to have grasped the essential truth that no nation — not even the United States — can be managed successfully from the center once it reaches a certain scale. Moreover, the bold proposals that Mr. Schwarzenegger is now making for everything from universal health care to global warming point to the kind of decentralization of power which, once started, could easily shake up America's fundamental political structure. … California's governor has also put his finger on a little discussed flaw in America's constitutional formula. The United States is almost certainly too big to be a meaningful democracy."

States' Chambers Of Commerce Accused Of Embracing Big Government. In the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M), Stephen Moore writes, "The Chamber of Commerce, long a supporter of limited government and low taxes, was part of the coalition backing the Reagan revolution in the 1980s. On the national level, the organization still follows a pro-growth agenda -- but thanks to an astonishing political transformation, many chambers of commerce on the state and local level have been abandoning these goals. They're becoming, in effect, lobbyists for big government. … In as many as half the states, state taxpayer organizations, free market think tanks and small business leaders now complain bitterly that, on a wide range of issues, chambers of commerce deploy their financial resources and lobbying clout to expand the taxing, spending and regulatory authorities of government . This behavior, they note, erodes the very pro-growth climate necessary for businesses -- at least those not connected at the hip with government -- to prosper."

North Korea Nuclear Deal Could Be Unveiled This Weekend. The New York Times (2/10, Yardley, Sanger, 1.16M) reports the US and North Korea "appeared on Friday to be inching closer to a deal that would establish a schedule for the North to shut down and seal its main nuclear facilities within two months, in return for shipments of fuel oil from South Korea and the beginning of talks over normalization of relations with Washington." However, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "cautioned that the two sides remained stuck on 'one or two' small issues." The Times says the White House and the State Department "were preparing for a major announcement this weekend, and described the agreement as very different from the" 1994 Agreed Framework. An Administration source told the Times, "This is the Libya model."

AFP (2/10, Kwanwoo, Sato) reports comments by Hill that "a deal that would see North Korea take the first steps towards ending its nuclear weapons programme is close but hurdles remain." He "said envoys to the talks had agreed on a range of fundamental issues, after host China circulated a draft accord that outlined steps member nations would take to begin the process of North Korea disarming." But in more negative tones, the AP (2/10, Chang) headlines its coverage, "North Korea Nuclear Deal In Trouble," saying negotiators in Beijing "struggled Friday to find a compromise as differences emerged over a Chinese proposal on how to begin the disarmament process."

American Tapped As UN Political Affairs Head. The New York Times (2/10, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Stirred by criticism of the slow pace of senior appointments, Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, on Friday named four new cabinet members, including an American diplomat, while keeping a dozen other senior officials in place." Ambassador B. Lynn Pascoe "becomes under secretary general for political affairs, a delicate position in United Nations efforts to mediate disputes in international trouble spots. Mr. Pascoe, a Chinese speaker, has extensive experience in Asia." In addition, Japan's Kiyotaka Akasaka will become under secretary general for communications and public information. France's Jean-Marie Guéhenno will remain under secretary general for peacekeeping operations. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/10, A1, Pisik, 88K) says Pascoe's appointment was part of "a sweeping management shake-up that promises to boost the United States' voice in the organization's diplomacy and peace-making efforts." The moves were "part of a broad reorganization of top management by" Ban.

Palestinian Unity Government May Not Satisfy Aid Resumption Requirements. Continuing coverage of the Hamas-Fatah unity government agreement focuses today on domestic Palestinian and international reaction. Under the headline, "In Palestinian Peace Deal, Hope and a Political Snare," the New York Times (2/10, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the deal "was greeted with relief by many Palestinians on Friday as their best hope for an end" months of fighting. However, "it poses a challenge for the Bush administration" because of the three Quartet-endorsed benchmarks. "Without the three -- and the Mecca accord does not accept them -- an international boycott on the Palestinians would continue."

In a front-page piece on the impact of the deal on Israel, the Washington Times (2/10, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Officials from Hamas and Israel dashed hopes yesterday that a Palestinian unity deal reached in the Saudi holy city of Mecca would end a crippling economic embargo or lead to a resumption of Palestinian-Israeli peace talks." A key Hamas leader "urged militant groups to resume attacks on Israel and denied that Hamas would respect past peace deals with the Jewish state -- a central element of the accord." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "told a security conference in Munich that Hamas remained dedicated to Israel's destruction," and "a top lawmaker in the ruling Kadima party said the accord falls short of conditions set by the international community to lift an economic embargo against the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority."

The Washington Post (2/10, A13, Kessler, 690K) says the Administration is "wary" of the deal because it "could divide Washington and its allies" and "affect" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's upcoming trip to the region. The accord, to which the Administration "reacted cautiously," "threatens to expose divisions between the United States and its European allies while complicating" Rice's "peace mission later this month." Rice "is preparing for a major plunge in Middle East peacemaking, meeting with Abbas and [Olmert] to begin sketching the contours of a Palestinian state. This week, Rice met with Israeli, Egyptian and Palestinian envoys in preparation for the summit, and U.S. officials said yesterday that she remains committed to her plans."

The AP (2/10, Gearan) titles its coverage, "U.S. Cautious On Palestinian Accord." Washington "and other world powers avoided endorsing a planned political bargain between warring Palestinian factions Friday, saying it was too soon to say if the new government will meet international conditions for legitimacy and financial aid. " Administration officials "said little in public beyond careful praise for Saudi Arabia's role in bringing the two factions together. Behind the scenes, officials did not sound optimistic that the deal can end Palestinian violence or a year-old international boycott." AFP (2/10) focuses its report on continued Quartet insistence that any Palestinian government recognize Israel.

WPost Assails US "Ineptitude," Ineffective Policy. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (2/10, A16, 690K) says the accord could "prevent the eruption of another civil war in the Middle East. Saudi Arabia, which hosted the talks, can also hope that its diplomacy -- and the reported promise of $1 billion in aid to the new government -- will begin to draw the Sunni Hamas movement away from its alliance with Shiite Iran. All that would be decidedly to the good." However, it is "considerably more uncertain" whether the deal with foster Israeli-Palestinian cooperation. The "accord has confounded an already confused U.S. policy in the Middle East." Saudi leaders have "stepped into the diplomatic vacuum created by American policy and brokered a deal across a divide that only the Bush administration and Israel perceived; as the Saudis see it, the dividing line in the region is sectarian, not ideological. Unable to embrace the Palestinian accord but reluctant to offend a Saudi ally it has been counting on for help against Iran, the Bush administration adopted an awkward wait-and-see position. As events unfold in the coming days, it will watch from the sidelines, to which it has been relegated by its own ineptitude."

Israeli Renovation Project Sparks Rioting In Jerusalem. ABC World News (2/9, story 4, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In the Middle East, Jerusalem, fierce clashes between Israeli police and Palestinians on the area known to Jews as the Temple Mount and to Muslims as the A Haram al Sharif, where they believe Muhammad began his journey to heaven." The New York Times (2/10, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "Israeli troops charged onto the grounds of Jerusalem's most contentious religious site on Friday and fired tear gas and stun grenades at stone-throwing Palestinians who were protesting Israeli excavation work taking place nearby. The confrontation…marked the fourth straight day of Palestinian protests against Israel's renovation of a 50-yard walkway leading up to the compound, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount."

the prophet Muhammad ascended to Heaven, the third-holiest site in Islam." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Hadid) adds, "Protests spread across the Arab world, with demonstrators accusing Israel of plotting to harm Islamic shrines. Israeli officials accused Palestinians of distorting the project to rally their fractious population against the Jewish state. They insist that the replacement of the ramp, which was damaged in a 2004 snowstorm, would not harm the holy site about 200 feet away."

Hezbollah Demands Return Of Weapons Seized By Lebanese Government. The New York Times (2/10, A8, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah "acknowledged Friday that it owned a truckload of arms seized Thursday by Lebanese customs authorities in an East Beirut suburb and demanded their return." The group's leaders "insisted that the movement of the arms did not violate the militants' accord with the government." However, Defense Minister Elias Murr "said the Lebanese Army intended to keep the weapons and pledged to use them against Israel if needed. Lebanese and Israeli soldiers exchanged fire across the border on Wednesday for the first time in decades."

Russia Criticizes US Missile Defense Plans. The New York Times (2/10, A7, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Russia's defense minister chose a NATO session here on Friday for a pre-emptive verbal assault on American plans to base elements of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe." Sergei Ivanov "argued that there was no rationale for basing American antimissile radars and interceptors in former Soviet satellite states that have now joined the NATO alliance." He "warned that Russia could easily overwhelm the small defensive system under consideration." The Financial Times (2/10, Dombey, Sevastopulo, Buckley) reports, "Ivanov's comments came after Russia's army chief of staff warned that expansion of the US military presence in Russia's traditional zones of influence was a serious security threat. ... Earlier this week, Mr Ivanov announced a big increase in military spending to fund a new generation of intercontinental ballistic missiles, nuclear submarines and aircraft carriers."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Spiegel, 850K) reports that Ivanov said "the plan to base interceptor rockets and radars in Poland and the Czech Republic appeared to be aimed at shooting down Russian weapons." He countered "U.S. arguments that the Europe-based system was needed to destroy North Korean missiles, adding that American claims Iran posed a threat to Europe were equally specious."

Litvinenko's Allies Believe KGB-Successor Assassinated Him. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Murphy, Rotella, 850K) carries claims by friends of Alexander Litvinenko who "have pieced together their own picture of how the former agent died. ... Based on their conversations with Litvinenko as he lay dying, their own contacts in the world of former KGB agents, and their meetings as witnesses with police investigators, these Russians believe Litvinenko's slaying was...a punishment for betrayal from an organization that forgets nothing." Litvinenko's colleagues in London "believe that the true killer may have been a tall, elusive Russian man known only as Vladislav who shows up on airport surveillance videos and was briefly present during Litvinenko's fatal lunch, then disappeared without a trace."

Polish Town Seeks Reagan Statue To Replace Communist Monument. AFP (2/9) reports, "Opponents of Poland's former communist regime reportedly want to pay a posthumous homage" to President Reagan by "erecting his statue in the place of a Soviet-era monument." A group of activists once opposed to the communist-era government said in a letter to the mayor of Katowice "that the staunchly anti-communist Reagan had been a 'symbol of liberty'" and therefore deserves "to become the centrepiece of the city's Freedom Square, replacing a monument to the Soviet troops who drove out the occupying Nazis in 1945."

France's Royal Said To Wage Unconventional Presidential Campaign. In a 3,000-word piece on its front page, the Wall Street Journal (2/10, Galloni, 2.04M) profiles French Socialist presidential candidate Segolene Royal. "Many senior members of her Socialist Party aren't sure whether to call Ms. Royal's campaign a bold or amateurish foray into the hallowed halls of French presidential politics." Over the past two years, her "crowd-pleasing proposals and glamorous looks have transformed her from a back-bench Socialist politician into one of the two front-runners for France's highest office." That "rapid rise speaks to the growing disconnect in France, and throughout much of Europe, between an aging generation of leaders and voters who feel their economic and social concerns are going unheard." Royal "has come this far by tossing ideology out the window and by selling her personality instead of her beliefs, a phenomenon rarely seen in continental Europe."

UN Peacekeepers Seize Haitian Slum, Fail To Capture Key Gang Leader. On its front page today, the New York Times (2/10, Lacey, 1.16M) details recent efforts by Haitian President Rene Preval and UN peacekeepers to combat street gangs in Port-au-Prince. "With a disbanded army and a corrupted wreck of a police force, successive presidents have either used the gangs against political rivals or just bought them off. Recently, something extraordinary has occurred. [Preval] decided to take on the gangs and set the 8,000 United Nations peacekeepers loose on them, a risky move that will determine the security of the country and the success of his young government." Preval "has grown increasingly impatient with the gangs as they resisted surrendering their guns and continued wreaking havoc on" the capital.

The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Roig-Franzia, 690K) notes, "U.N. troops fought a block-by-block gun battle with gangs in one of this capital's notorious slums Friday, in the force's largest offensive since being deployed here in 2004." Two peacekeepers and several gang members "were injured in heavy fighting that sent the loud clap of automatic weapons fire into the air above Cite Soleil, where poverty is rampant and canals serve as open sewers." While Haiti "has a notoriously corrupt and dysfunctional justice system," officials claim "a special team of prosecutors and judges has been identified by" Preval "to handle high-profile cases." BBC.com (2/10) titles its coverage, "UN Troops Flood Into Haiti Slum."

LATimes Sees "Faint Pulse" Of Venezuelan Democracy Despite Chavez. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) says Venezuela today is "a place where democracy is a little more nonbinding than elsewhere." The recent move by National Assembly members to vote "themselves into irrelevance" eliminated Chavez's "need to even use [their] rubber stamp" to pass legislation. He "is expected to use his powers to, among other frightening things, do away with presidential term limits so he can remain in office indefinitely." Noting opposition comparisons of Chavez's action to Hitler's in the early 1930s, the Times says "democracy still has a faint pulse in Venezuela," because "any Chavez decree can theoretically be overturned by public referendum, as long as opponents gather signatures from 5% of the electorate." Chavez, "destructive as his economic policies will eventually be to Venezuela, is no Hitler. Now Mussolini, on the other hand …"

Indian Economic Leaders Work To Stave Off "Inflationary Spiral." Under the headline, "India Finds Its Economy On The Verge Of Overheating," the New York Times (2/10, C1, Bradsher, 1.16M) reports, "With breakneck growth, an outsourcing industry that leads the world and hundreds of millions of consumers demanding more class and comfort, India has an economy many countries would envy." However, "signs of a potentially dangerous inflationary spiral are beginning to emerge. Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and his closest economic advisors gathered just last weekend over fears that India's extraordinary economic expansion was starting to overheat, an issue they labeled as a 'key short-term priority.'" The Times says Singh "may have waited too long." While "inflation in India remains much lower than" elsewhere, "prices are rising more than twice as fast as in China, India's archrival for foreign investment and economic leadership among emerging markets. Prices are also increasing considerably faster than in industrialized countries."

Expanding Economy Having Little Effect On Child Malnutrition. A separate New York Times (2/10, A7, Sengupta, 1.16M) piece notes, "Even after India's years of sustained economic growth, child malnutrition rates are comparable to some of the poorest countries, and at times worse." A government report released yesterday claims that "nearly half" of all children under three years of age "are clinically underweight, the most reliable measure of malnutrition. Additionally troubling, the incidence of child malnutrition declined only one percentage point, to 46 percent, in seven years" despite annual economic growth rates of six to eight percent.

WSJournal Pans Thai Actions On Pharmaceuticals. In an editorial today entitled, "Theft In Thailand," the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M) assails the Thai government's IPR policies. "By seizing patents for HIV/AIDS treatments and heart disease, Thailand has asserted that governments have the right to take intellectual property whenever they please." Recent actions to produce local generics "may be technically legal. The WTO language on compulsory licensing is regrettably vague, and doesn't list specific causes for which governments can seize private patents." However, Thailand "did not bother to consult prior to issuing the compulsory licenses, and the drug companies woke up to read about it in the papers. So it clearly breached the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 31." It is "anyone's guess" how the Thai government will provide more value for drug consumers.

China's Hu Encounters Some Opposition During Africa Tour. An analysis piece in the New York Times (2/10, A3, Wines, 1.16M) examines the "resistance" met by Chinese President Hu Jintao during the Africa trip he completed yesterday. Calling the "reality" of the Chinese global "juggernaut" "more nuanced" than previously thought, the Times says the "visit tested a basic tenet of China's economic relations: that business is business, and what a partner nation's people think about it is not China's — or the world's — preoccupation." While Hu "met his share of flag-waving supporters, of course, and the official parts of his trip — the meetings and agreement-signings with heads of state — were a diplomatic and commercial success," the Times says "an undercurrent of disquiet accompanied Mr. Hu's barnstorming. Mostly, it came not from heads of state, but from the people they rule, some of whom resent China's growing influence [across the continent] — for economic, racial and ideological reasons."

South Africa's Mbeke Acknowledges Growing Concern About Crime. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Timberg, 690K) notes South African President Thabo Mbeki "sought to reassure worried South Africans that his government is stepping up its fight against crime but offered little new detail on how it can curb levels of rape, robbery and murder that are among the highest in the world." The Post cites "weeks of rising political pressure amid a string of high-profile attacks," and says his remarks yesterday "went further than he had before in acknowledging that levels of violent crime terrify many South Africans. He avoided quibbling over whether rates are rising or falling, or by how much -- an approach that provoked a sharp backlash after an interview last month." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Dixon, 850K) says Mbeki has been "engulfed by a tide of public anger over violent crime." His remarks "acknowledged … that the government needed to work harder to eradicate what he called an 'ugly and repulsive' scourge."

Branson, Gore Join On $25 Million Global Warming Challenge. Major media report businessman Richard Branson's offer of "a $25 million prize Friday to anyone who can come up with a way to blunt global climate change by removing at least a billion tons of carbon dioxide a year from the Earth's atmosphere," as the Washington Post (2/10, A13, Sullivan, 690K) described it. Branson "said the prize was similar to cash inducements that led to some of history's most notable achievements in navigation, exploration and industry," and further "pledged to invest $3 billion in profits from his transportation companies … to fighting global warming." He appeared with former Vice President Al Gore, who "will serve as a judge in the contest, known as the Virgin Earth Challenge." Gore "said he hoped the contest would spur scientific innovation without distracting from more practical steps people can take to battle global warming, from using energy-efficient light bulbs to pressuring politicians to confront 'the crisis of our time.'" The New York Times (2/10, C3, Kanter, 1.16M) says Branson "urged governments to match the prize money he offered. He spoke of past efforts to encourage leaps forward in technologies," while Gore "said the prize was intended for a project that would be different from technologies currently under development that capture and store large amounts of carbon dioxide from heavy emitters like coal-fired electric plants."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Five British Muslims Arraigned In Terror Plot Probe. The New York Times (2/10, A7, Cowell, 1.16M) describes the transfer to London of five Britons accused of plotting to kill a Muslim British soldier, and the arrest yesterday of a sixth alleged accomplice. "Of the five who faced terrorism charges in court on Friday, only one, Parviz Khan, 36, was specifically charged with engaging 'in conduct to give effect to his intention to kidnap and kill a member of the British armed forces.'" The "five suspects who appeared in court on Friday were ordered to be held until a hearing on Feb. 23. The police in Birmingham said the case had been referred to a London court under protocols covering terrorism cases." The arrests late last month of "nine suspects in Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, stirred worries and anger among many Muslims, who said they believed that the police action and extensive coverage by television and newspapers had further stigmatized Islam. One of the three men released after the arrests said Britain had become a police state for Muslims." The Washington Post (2/10, A13, Sullivan, 690K) reports the plot is "widely seen as a new kind of extremist threat in Britain."

Prosecutors Contend Padilla Competent To Stand Trial. The Washington Post (2/10, A18, 690K) reports, "An evaluation of suspected al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons has found him competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, government attorneys said in court documents filed Friday. Padilla 36, can understand the court proceedings and communicate with his attorneys, according to prosecutors' description of the report's conclusions." Padilla "contends that he was tortured in custody. His attorneys say he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Key House Members Claim DHS Budget Is Inadequate. The Washington Times (2/10, Seper, 88K) reports House Homeland Security Chairman Bennie Thompson this week "challenged" Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff "to explain how his agency's budget was adequate to guard against a terrorist attack or another Katrinalike disaster, saying 'we cannot continue to protect the homeland on the cheap.'" Thompson "said President Bush's proposed $35 billion Homeland Security budget does not address necessary funding for key programs and leaves the nation vulnerable to terrorists and natural disasters." Ranking member Peter King "also questioned whether the department's budgeting process needed revamping, saying agency officials were basing spending increases on a 2003 budget 'guesstimate' when the agency was formed."

Bush Budget Accelerates "Realignment" Of Federal Protective Service. The Washington Times (2/10, Waterman, 88K) reports President Bush's 2008 budget "proposes cuts to the Federal Protective Service, police that guard U.S. government buildings, a move labor unions say will be 'the last nail in the coffin' of the agency that is being replaced by private contractors. Administration officials say changes to the agency in the Department of Homeland Security improve efficiency without sacrificing security, and that private security firms already guard the vast majority of federal buildings."

Some Dallas Residents Worry Bush Library Will Become Terror Target. The Dallas Morning News (2/10, Holland, 500K) reports, "Terrorists will destroy the Bush library and take out most of the Park Cities at the same time. The question isn't if but when, says Sam Boyd, a Park Cities lawyer. Mr. Boyd isn't alone. A number of Park Cities residents say they fear that building the presidential library in University Park would be like painting a big, red target on their community." But "security and terrorism experts have mixed sentiments. Although some say presidential libraries are unlikely targets, others say Bush's library may change that because the president is such a polarizing figure worldwide."

Veteran Federal Judge Plays Central Role In Post-Katrina Suits. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B1, Pleven, Prada, 2.04M) reports, "Lyonel Thomas Senter Jr.'s roots run deep in northern Mississippi. … Now, at 73 years old, Judge Senter has become a defining figure in the coastal south of the state, presiding over a deluge of legal cases that grew out of Hurricane Katrina." The Journal notes that "most claims have been resolved, but thousands of homeowners in the Gulf region are still suing their insurers, and billions are still at stake. At issue in many of these cases is a messy question. Were homes destroyed by the ferocious winds of the storm or the surging Gulf waters that came with them? Insurers typically cover wind damage but exclude water damage, because it's covered under the federal government's flood insurance program. Yet who knows what's behind the damage when a house has been wiped off the map?"

FEMA Response To Florida Tornadoes Seen As Success. In a generally positive report, NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 5, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) said, "There is evidence tonight that things that this nation's disaster relief agency FEMA are getting better, at least when it comes to the response of the tornados in central Florida last week. Obviously a smaller disaster than Katrina, but this was a test of the post-Katrina FEMA and its ability to pass a crucial response test."

WAR NEWS:

Senators Consider Report On Pre-War Intelligence As Feith Defends Efforts. All three broadcast networks led Friday night with the release of Pentagon Office of Inspector General's report on the "Pre-Iraqi War Activities of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy." Reports are critical of the Defense Department and then-Under Secretary Douglas Feith, focusing on the IG's criticisms and generally downplaying the conclusions that Feith broke no law. Several stories include Feith's defense of his work, and Feith himself appeared on CNN to make his case. Several print reports also consider how congressional Democrats will react to the IG report.

ABC World News (2/9, lead story, 3:15, Gibson, 8.78M) said the IG report "said one man charged with collecting US intelligence on Iraq did not accurately come to the conclusion that Iraq and al Qaeda were allies." ABC (Karl): "The report suggests that before the war, senior Pentagon officials were so eager to prove that Saddam Hussein had ties to al Qaeda, that they ignored evidence to the contrary and manipulated the intelligence. It's a damning conclusion, but the report stops short of saying the officials broke the law." Feith has "absolutely no contrition on the central charges of this report. He believes what he did was absolutely correct, and by the way the Pentagon also said that Feith did nothing inappropriate."

The CBS Evening News (2/9, lead story, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) opened with what it called a "new report on the faulty intelligence that led to the Iraq war nearly four years ago. It concludes the Pentagon was way off base when it reported Saddam Hussein was conspiring with al Qaeda. But what's remarkable is where the report came from -- the Pentagon itself." CBS (Martin): "Convinced the CIA was doing shoddy work in the months before the war, a small Pentagon office presented senior White House aides with its own, much stronger conclusion about the links between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda. Today, the Pentagon's own inspector general told Congress that was inappropriate. Of course, it's years too late to do much about it." CBS says Feith "still contends more people should have challenged the official intelligence."

NBC Nightly News (2/9, lead story, 3:20, Reid, 9.87M) said that "when the Iraq war began, more than half of the American people believed Saddam Hussein had been personally involved in the 9/11 attacks. ... Now a long awaited report finds that [Feith's] office took inappropriate action by conducting its own alternative intelligence assessment." Feith "insisted he did not manipulate intelligence but merely criticized the work of the CIA."

In an interview with CNN's The Situation Room (2/9, Blitzer), Feith said, "What the Inspector General is criticizing is the fact that people in the Pentagon criticized the quality of the CIA intelligence. And the Inspector General, I think, wrongly says that the criticism of intelligence was intelligence work. And that it was inappropriate for non-intelligence people to do that." Blitzer: "But in this case they were right and you were wrong." Feith: "No, they were not right." Blitzer: "There was no connection that the 9/11 Commission could come up with to show that there was a connection -- a deliberate prewar operable connection between al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein." Feith: "Which nobody ever claimed. I mean, that's -- it shows how much misinformation there is, even somebody as well as informed as you is misinformed on the point."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Barnes, 850K), in a very critical report, says the "findings lend credence to charges by White House critics that Feith, who has since left the department, was out of line when he sought to discredit analyses by CIA intelligence officials that discounted alleged ties between Al Qaeda and then-Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Miller, Barnes, 850K) additionally says the work of the "special Pentagon unit" run by Feith is "one of the lingering symbols of the intelligence failures leading up to the war in Iraq. ... Most of the evidence that Feith's Office of Special Plans cited in making its case for significant collaboration between Baghdad and Al Qaeda has crumbled under postwar scrutiny."

The Financial Times (2/10, Sevastopulo) says the report "comes at a critical time for the White House as President George W. Bush struggles to keep Republican support for the war in Iraq." Defense Secretary Robert Gates is quoted as saying, "Based on my whole career, all intelligence -activities need to be carried out through established institutions where there is oversight." However, Gates said "he had not read the report."

Senators Consider Impact, Importance Of Report. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/10, Pincus, DeYoung, 690K) reports, "Senate Democrats and Republicans disagreed yesterday over the meaning and importance" of the report. Democras used the report "to bolster their contention that the administration misused intelligence to promote the urgency of invading Iraq. Republicans implied that the intelligence community had soft-pedaled crucial reports of a close al-Qaeda relationship with Saddam Hussein and that Feith's office had put them in the proper perspective." AFP (2/9, Sanz) reports Senate Intelligence Chairman Jay Rockefeller said Feith "may have violated the 1947 National Security Act by failing to keep Congress informed."

The New York Times (2/10, A6, Cloud, 1.16M), in a story headlined "Inquiry on Intelligence Gaps May Reach to White House," reports Senate Armed Services Chairman Carl Levin said he "would ask current and former White House aides to testify" about the report. Levin said National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and former vice presidential chief of staff I. Lewis Libby, who "both received a briefing from the defense secretary's policy office in 2002 on possible links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's government," could be among those called to testify. The Washington Times/AP (2/10) says the IG found that "Pentagon officials undercut the intelligence community in the run-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq by insisting in briefings to the White House" than a Hussein-al Qaeda connection existed. And on its Web site, The Hill (2/9, Marre) reports Levin "said he would seek a declassification of the entire report, which would make it available to the public." (An unclassified executive summary of the report is currently available online.)

Sen. Ben Nelson said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/9, Matthews), "I think nobody is surprised anymore about what comes out. I think it's the makings for a spy novel. I'm sure Grisham is looking at it for material to write a book. But it's so unfortunate. I think the report said 'inappropriate.' Well, it's beyond inappropriate. It's unfortunate. I think most everybody would expect that what you get from the White House would be something that you could trust, you could rely on, and that it work, that it would materialize. In this case, it's been just the opposite."

WPost Corrects Misattributions In Friday Pentagon IG Report Story. The Washington Post (2/10, A2, 690K) corrects its Friday front-page article on the Pentagon IG report. The Post story "incorrectly attributed quotations to that report. References to Feith's office producing 'reporting of dubious quality or reliability' and that the office 'was predisposed to finding a significant relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda' were from a report" issued by Levin "in October 2004. Similarly, the quotes stating that Feith's office drew on 'both reliable and unreliable reporting' to produce a link between al-Qaeda and Iraq 'that was much stronger than that assessed by the IC [intelligence community] and more in accord with the policy views of senior officials in the Administration' were also from Levin's report. The article also stated that the intelligence provided by Feith's office supported the political views of senior administration officials, a conclusion that the inspector general's report did not draw." CNN's Wolf Blitzer noted the Post's correction during his interview with Feith.

NYTimes Says Levin, Rockefeller Have Duty "To Give Americans The Answers." The New York Times (2/10, 1.16M) editorializes, "It took far too long, but a report by the Pentagon inspector general has finally confirmed that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's do-it-yourself intelligence office cooked up a link between Iraq and Al Qaeda to help justify an unjustifiable war. … The Pentagon report is one step in a long-delayed effort to figure out how the intelligence on Iraq was so badly twisted -- and by whom. That work should have been finished before the 2004 elections, and it would have been if Pat Roberts, the obedient Republican who ran the Senate Intelligence Committee, had not helped the White House drag it out and load it in ways that would obscure the truth." The Times says it is now up to Levin and Rockefeller "to give Americans the answers."

Gates Says Evidence Links Iran To Arming Of Iraqi Insurgents. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/10, Scarborough, 88K) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates said there is "solid circumstantial evidence that Iran is supplying insurgents with explosives that are killing U.S. troops in Iraq." A US "report was put on hold after some White House officials determined the evidence was not strong enough to back up some of its assertions. But they have not backed off the general charge that Iran is indirectly fighting the United States via Iraqi insurgents." Also on its front page, the New York Times (2/10, Gordon, 1.16M) says "any assertion of an Iranian contribution to attacks on Americans in Iraq is both politically and diplomatically volatile." But the US conclusions are "based on a number of factors, including an analysis of captured devices, examination of debris after attacks, and intelligence on training of Shiite militants in Iran and in Iraq by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and by Hezbollah militants believed to be working at the behest of Tehran." The AP (2/9, Baldor) reports that Gates' allegations about "serial numbers and other markings" were "some of the administration's first public assertions on evidence the military has collected."

Iranian Arrest Of Al Qaeda Suspects Colors Debate Over Iran. The Washington Post (2/10, Linzer, 690K) reports on its front page, "Last week, the CIA sent an urgent report to President Bush's National Security Council: Iranian authorities had arrested two al-Qaeda operatives traveling through Iran on their way from Pakistan to Iraq. ... The arrests were presented to Bush's senior policy advisers as evidence that Iran appears committed to stopping al-Qaeda foot traffic across its borders, the intelligence official said. That assessment comes at a time when the Bush administration, in an effort to push for further U.N. sanctions on the Islamic republic, is preparing to publicly accuse Tehran of cooperating with and harboring al-Qaeda suspects." Within the administration, "One faction is pressing for more economic embargoes against Iran, including asset freezes and travel bans for the country's top leaders. But several senior intelligence and counterterrorism officials worry that a public push regarding the al-Qaeda suspects held in Iran could jeopardize U.S. intelligence-gathering and prompt the Iranians to free some of the most wanted individuals."

US Allegedly In "Advanced" Stages Of War Planning Against Iran. The British newspaper the Guardian (2/10, MacAskill) reports, "US preparations for an air strike against Iran are at an advanced stage, in spite of repeated public denials by the Bush administration, according to informed sources in Washington. The present military build-up in the Gulf would allow the US to mount an attack by the spring. But the sources said that if there was an attack, it was more likely next year, just before Mr Bush leaves office."

IAEA Suspends Iran Aid Programs. Under the headline, "World Atomic Agency Suspends 22 Programs Of Aid To Iran," the New York Times (2/10, Broad, 1.16M) notes the International Atomic Energy Agency "said yesterday that it had suspended 22 of its 55 technical aid programs with Iran, giving Washington a modest victory in its efforts to isolate Tehran internationally in the hope of curbing its nuclear ambitions." IAEA officials reported to the IAEA Board that they "had also suspended a number of lesser activities, including three fellowships, participation in a training course and procurement of 15 pieces of equipment." Iranian Ambassador Ali Asghar Soltanieh "denounced the suspensions as 'a very dangerous game' that would have no impact on its disputed nuclear program. Rather, he said in an interview, they will undermine the atomic energy agency's authority and many countries' desire to join it."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Murphy, 850K) reports, "Analysts said the IAEA action would probably not have a significant effect on Iran's nuclear program but would be likely to be perceived as a blow nonetheless. Iran is one of the largest recipients of U.N. nuclear technical cooperation. ... Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is supposed to make an announcement on the nuclear program during Sunday's planned street demonstrations in celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution. Many analysts believe he will announce some progress in setting up the first of 3,000 enrichment centrifuges Iran has said it is building at a major new underground facility in Natanz."

The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Jahn) reports the IAEA "suspended nearly half the technical aid it provides to Iran, a symbolically significant punishment for nuclear defiance that only North Korea and Saddam Hussein's Iraq had faced in the past. The decision was in line with U.N. Security Council sanctions imposed on Iran for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment. It must still be approved by the 35 countries on the board," but "with the agency empowered by the Security Council to freeze any aid to Iran that could be misused for nuclear weapons, approval was likely." BBC.com (2/10) also reports the story.

US Forces Accidentally Kill Several Kurds. The New York Times (2/10, A6, Oppel, Cloud, 1.16M) reports, "An American military helicopter killed as many as nine Kurdish militia fighters early Friday in the northern city of Mosul when the aircraft mistakenly attacked a guard post. ... The United States command in Baghdad said American troops erroneously believed that they had identified insurgents near the hide-out of a bomb-making cell linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The command said the strike killed five Kurds, described as policemen; Kurdish officials said as many as nine were killed." The victims were "members of a militia force that is a crucial ally of the United States."

The Washington Post (2/10, A14, Londono, 690K) says the US claimed the group showed "hostile intention." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Roug, 850K) reports, "Kurdish officials reacted angrily, saying the airstrike on one of the main roads in Mosul was inexplicable." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Gamel) reports, "Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman denounced the air strike, but a spokesman for the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, Azad Jundiyan, said the party realized the air strike was a mistake."

Surge Shows Few Concrete Results So Far. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, Roug, 850K) says, "A month after the Bush administration announced a 'surge' in troops for Baghdad, Iraqis are still waiting for anything to change. Fewer than 20% of the additional Iraqi and American troops have arrived so far. And the roughly 5,000 that have arrived have yet to make a visible impact in this sprawling city of 6 million people, where thousands of paramilitary gunmen patrol the streets. ... Iraqis are increasingly impatient." Defense Secretary Robert Gates "has said he is investigating whether he can speed the pace of the troop buildup. But a senior Pentagon official said this week that it was unlikely that U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad any faster than planned."

Some Troops Suggest Letting Civil War Play Out. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 3, 3:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We have an unusual and unexpected firsthand look tonight at just how dangerous it is on the ground in Iraq. ... Richard Engel was embedded today with the US First Infantry division in a Sunni neighborhood called Adel in western Baghdad." NBC (Engel): "It was billed as a routine patrol, part of this new security crackdown. … Our patrol was headed to a mosque, just a routine mission to monitor the Friday sermon. ... [A bomb] was badly timed and exploded just ten feet away." Staff Sgt. Chris Copley: "It is pretty much a lost cause. Nothing it seems we do is doing any good. Every country goes through a civil war. So, I mean, maybe it would be better for them to have a civil war and hash it out and try to help them after that."

Petraeus Assuming Command. ABC World News (2/9, story 2, 2:45, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Gen. George Casey has been confirmed as next Army Chief of Staff. He has spent nearly three years in Iraq, calling the shots during some of the war's fiercest battles." ABC (Raddatz): "On his farewell trip through Iraq this week, Gen. Casey got an unexpected look at the fighting he had hoped would diminish during his tenure. His convoy passed by a firefight with the sounds of tank fire impossible to miss. But Casey saw much progress on his visit. ... Tomorrow, Casey turns over his command to Gen. David Petraeus, who will oversee the new plan for Iraq, a plan which many say is Iraq's last chance."

BBC.com (2/10) reports Petraeus "is assuming control, ahead of a fresh push to quell violence in the capital, Baghdad." The Financial Times (2/10, Sevastopulo) says Iraqis "referred to Gen Petraeus as 'King David', a sobriquet some officers use to refer to his perceived arrogance. But some have privately argued that his arrogance and ambition will be an asset since he will take risks that his more cautious predecessor, General George Casey, would have avoided." AFP (2/9, Ickes) characterizes Petraeus as "tasked with turning around a faltering mission which faces mounting US casualties and a dramatic collapse in domestic political support." He "is now the figurehead for a controversial gamble."

LATimes Says Congressional Resolution On Surge Needed. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) editorializes, "Congress should go on record as a way of pressing Bush and the Iraqi government to make the most of what may be the last politically realistic chance of pacifying that country and keeping it together. ... The president, Gates and Gen. David H. Petraeus should be given time to make a success of their new approach, but that time should be measured in months, not years. If it takes a resolution from Congress to make that point to the president, so be it."

Helicopter Crash Video Is Shown. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 2, 1:35, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "More on that dramatic videotape of what insurgents say shows them bringing down a US military transport helicopter in Iraq. That is not what the Pentagon says it is." NBC (Yang): "Take a look at this video. It was posted today on the internet by a group with ties to Al Qaeda. It begins by showing a helicopter maneuvering in the sky. It looks like a Marine Sea Knight helicopter, the same type of helicopter that went down Wednesday. ... The Pentagon says it doesn't prove anything. … The Pentagon is pointing out this could be doctored."

Key Sunni Office Holder Given "Placeholder Status." On its front page today, the Washington Post (2/10, Londono, 690K) describes at length the political "weakness" of Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam al-Zobaee, a Sunni. "Zobaee, in principle one of Iraq's most powerful men, offers [an] anecdote to illustrate his powerlessness, which he says is a product of the Shiite-led government's efforts to cast aside high-ranking Sunnis like him. Shiite political leaders say Zobaee, one of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's two deputies, deserves his placeholder status." The Post says the "marginalization of Zobaee -- who denies being an instigator of violence -- is a prominent example of the strained relationship between Sunni and Shiite leaders, an acrimony that many see as the main obstacle to deterring violence and laying the foundation for reconciliation in Iraq."

Rice Feels Heat In Rumsfeld's Absence. CNN.com (2/9, Labott) reports, "On January 11, the secretary of state got an earful from both sides of the aisle. ... These are rough and uncharted waters for Rice, who sailed through the first six years of the Bush administration relatively unsullied as her colleagues -- particularly former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- took the heat for the quagmire in Iraq." Rice "remains the most popular member of the Bush administration; her approval ratings in polls are higher than Bush's. But the honeymoon is clearly over. Rice has inherited the role Rumsfeld played as a primary spokesman of the Iraq war -- and the primary lightning rod for criticism about it."

Appeals Court Backs US Citizen Detainee. The Washington Post (2/10, A14, White, 690K) reports, "A federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday that a U.S. citizen in U.S. military custody in Iraq has the right to challenge his detention in a federal court. The judges said all American citizens, regardless of where they are captured and imprisoned, are entitled to federal court review of their cases through habeas corpus petitions if they are in U.S. custody." Shawqi Ahmed Omar has been held "more than two years" in Iraq, but the court "rejected the Bush administration's claim that the executive branch has nearly unlimited authority during wartime and its assertion that the United States can hold citizens indefinitely if they are in custody overseas." The New York Times/AP (2/10, A16) says the "military says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials when he was arrested. The military decided in 2005 to transfer him to the Central Criminal Court of Iraq for trial, but United States courts have blocked that."

KBR, Military Honor Civilian Contractors. The Houston Chronicle (2/10, Clanton, Ivanovich, 530K) reports, "The Defense Department and KBR on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart. But some honorees at the event said citizen contractors still are not getting the same recognition as the military for sacrifices they make serving their country in Iraq." Contractors or their survivors received the Defense of Freedom Medal. The Chronicle adds that 98 KBR "employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began. Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action."

Center For The Intrepid Praised. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, Gurwitz, 2.04M) reports, "There are symbolic sacrifices in metaphorical wars. Then there are genuine sacrifices in real wars. The latter was on display last week at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, as representatives of a grateful nation dedicated the Center for the Intrepid and two new Fisher Houses to those wounded in the global war on terror. ... Representatives of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund and the Fisher House Foundation spoke at the ceremony, as did Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace. ... The speakers, however, were merely paying tribute. The true dignitaries were the wounded warriors who sat in the front rows."

Ancient Faith Endangered By Iraq War. The Washington Post (2/10, B7, Newmarker, 690K) reports, "Among the casualties of the Iraq war is a little-known religious faith called Mandaeanism that has survived roughly two millennia and whose adherents believe that John the Baptist was their great teacher. While there were more than 60,000 Mandaeans in Iraq in the early 1990s, only about 5,000 to 7,000 remain. Many have fled amid targeted killings, rapes, forced conversions and property confiscation by Islamic extremists."

Pentagon To Extend Troop Deployment In Afghanistan. The AP (2/9, Burns) reports, "The Pentagon plans to extend its buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said Friday. The move comes as U.S. and allied commanders anticipate a renewed offensive this spring by the Taliban, and as they seek additional reinforcements from NATO countries."

Taliban Kill Four Afghan Policemen In Ambush. The AP (2/10) reports, "Taliban militants ambushed a truck full of Afghan police in southern Afghanistan, killing four officers and injuring three, an official said Saturday. The attack occurred Friday evening in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province." AFP (2/10) also reports the fighting, saying, "Four policemen and 11 Taliban have been killed in fresh violence in southern Afghanistan, as a suicide car bomb narrowly missed a NATO military convoy."

Iranian-American Helps Build Afghan Schools. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "We highlight one person who is truly making a difference in society. Tonight she lives here in America, but devotes her time, energy and attention to a faraway place and in her own way she is helping to change the face of America half a world away." NBC (Maceda): "Two years ago, there were just a couple of tents here in the Jalalabad desert. Now the school is a red brick building with 2,000 students. Thanks to Fari Moini, a tiny Iranian-American with a big heart the kids call Momma." Fari Moini: "Continue your education. It is very, very important."

Gates To Meet With Musharraf Next Week. AFP (2/10) reports Defense Secretary Robert Gates "will visit Pakistan early next week for talks with President Pervez Musharraf on the threat from Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan, official sources said. ... He is expected to fly to Afghanistan afterwards."

Army Wife Counsels Others. CBS Evening News (2/9, story 6, 2:00, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "In our series American Heroes, we honor the men and women who sacrifice so much on the battlefield. But in reality, their spouses also make tremendous sacrifices back home. Tonight, the Army wife who's reaching out to many others just like her." CBS (Strassmann): "It's all on them now, the kids, the house, a full year's worth of worry. As Fort Stewart soldiers redeploy to Iraq, the wives left behind look for support wherever they can find it." Tara Crooks, Army Wife Talk Radio: "You're listening to Army Wife Talk Radio, the Internet's talk radio program for and by Army wives. My name is Tara Crooks and I'm your host." Strassmann: "Tara Crooks just talks, one Army wife to another."

AEI Scholar Bashes Emergency Supplemental Funding "Trick." In the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K), AEI fellow Veronique De Rugy writes that President Bush's "trick" of "socking about $235 billion into two 'emergency supplemental' funding requests for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan…didn't fool the public for very long. But the longer the White House and Congress continue to treat 'war-related' funding as a separate item from the budget for the Department of Defense, the harder it will be to control a ballooning federal budget."

DOJ:

Ousted Arizona US Attorney Cites Policy Dispute With Main Justice. The Arizona Republic (2/10, House, Wagner) reports, "Former U.S. Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton said Friday that he left office in January for "principled reasons, not performance issues," as a deputy attorney general suggested this week." The

Republic continues, "Charlton, who was one of six top federal prosecutors across the country forced to resign, said there had been 'policy disputes' with his Justice Department higher-ups. Charlton spoke to The Arizona Republic on Friday in his first public comments since being asked to step down. … Although Charlton declined to elaborate, two sources said a main disagreement between Charlton and officials in Washington centered on when to seek the death penalty in federal murder cases." The Republic adds, "As a U.S attorney, Charlton has pursed the death penalty in some cases. But his insistence on determining whether to push for capital punishment on a case-by-case basis clashed on at least two instances with a Justice Department effort to centralize decisions nationally and to seek the death penalty in a uniform way. … Charlton acknowledged that he was among the prosecutors who received a telephone call on Dec. 7 from Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, asking him to resign. … 'I certainly was given no indication there were performance concerns,' Charlton said." The Republic notes, "Like all U.S. attorneys, Charlton served at the pleasure of the president. He was appointed in November 2001. … Even so, Charlton said that he told Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, of the call and that Kyl agreed to speak to officials at the department on his behalf. … 'Senator Kyl informed me that after his conversation with the Department of Justice that the department agreed they would reconsider their asking me to resign,' Charlton said. … But, Charlton said, 'it then became apparent to me that our views had become so divergent and disparate that I would resign.' … A Justice Department official in Washington who asked not to be identified said that Charlton's distinction between policy and performance 'may be an issue of semantics.' … 'Policy is set at a national level,' the official said. 'Individual U.S. attorneys around the country can't just make up their own policy agendas. Such a situation would result in chaos with 93 different U.S. attorneys implementing different policy decisions around the country. That is no way to run an organization.'"

The AP (2/10) reports, "Former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods said Friday the Justice Department in Washington pressed Charlton to apply the death penalty in certain cases, but Charlton resisted because he didn't believe it was the right thing to do. Charlton resigned in December and left office at the end of last month. … 'It's obvious that they may have felt there were more circumstances where (the death penalty) was warranted than he did,' said Woods, who has spoken with Charlton recently. 'I think he should get credit for standing on principle rather than just doing what he was told so he didn't make waves. A lot of people don't have the guts to stand up and say "no"' … Woods did not know whether the conflicts led directly to Charlton's departure after serving as the U.S. attorney for Arizona since 2001. Charlton took a job with a Phoenix law firm."

More Commentary On US Attorney Dismissals. The Tacoma (WA) News Tribune (2/10) editorializes, "John McKay, by all accounts, was a stellar U.S. attorney. … Since becoming Western Washington's top federal prosecutor in 2001, he led an aggressive team that filed charges against twice as many defendants and posted a higher conviction rate despite the bigger case-load." The News-Tribune continues, "McKay won admiration of federal judges and state law enforcement officials, and earned the Navy's highest civilian honor for creating an interagency information-sharing system that has become a national model. … Even his bosses seemed to think McKay was doing a topnotch job. Just last March, Justice Department evaluators gave McKay's office a glowing review, calling him an 'effective, well-regarded and capable leader.' … So it came as quite the surprise when McKay announced in December that he was stepping down. There was no plum appointment or job waiting in the wings, only a chance to pursue other opportunities — usually code for "I was shown the door.' … As so, it turns out, McKay was. He spoke out this week in defense of himself and his former employees after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate judiciary panel that McKay and five other Republican U.S. attorneys were forced to resign for 'performance-related' issues." The Tribune adds, "McKay says no one ever raised performance issues with him, not even on Dec. 7 when a senior Justice Department official called out of the blue to tell him he had to resign by the end of January. … The truth behind the mass exodus has a lot more to do with the politicization of the U.S. Attorney's Office than it does with poor lawyering. A Justice Department source told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer that President Bush and the Republican Party want to 'build their bench' by replacing top prosecutors with younger conservatives to enhance their résumés for future positions."

The St Petersburg (FL) Times (2/10) editorializes, "U.S. attorneys act as chief federal prosecutors within the states and are charged with being fair and independent. But there is no job that can't be filled by political loyalists. … In a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general, claimed that most of the incumbents had been replaced for performance issues. Yet he admitted to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that H.E. Cummins III, a former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, had done nothing to justify being removed. Cummins was replaced with a former political director for the Republican National Committee." The Times adds, "In ousting San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the Bush administration has signaled to others in its corps that investigating public corruption comes at a price. Lam headed the office that unearthed the misdeeds of congressman Randy 'Duke' Cunningham, who is now in prison after admitting taking more than $2-million in bribes. The probe had been continuing under her leadership and included other members of Congress." The Times concludes, "Senate confirmation is integral to reducing the partisanship of presidential appointments and is especially important for posts where impartiality and independence are needed qualifications. The new law that makes it possible to cut the Senate out should be repealed, as a measure introduced by Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., would do. Meanwhile, Schumer and other senators should continue to press for better explanations for the removal of people who seemed to be doing their job."

In a column for the Vancouver (WA) Columbian (2/10), Gregg Herrington writes, "Some 90 U.S. attorneys around the country serve at the pleasure of the president, prosecuting, or not, federal crimes. … But the Bush White House likes its minions to be attuned to the greater vision: moving the blue states into the red column. And how can one do that if one is working closely with the other side, sharing credit with Democrats while beefing up the federal crime-fighting apparatus in Southwest Washington?"

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

DOJ, SEC Eye Jobs' Role In Pixar Stock Options. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Page C - 1, Guynn) reports, "These days, the most animated discussions about Steve Jobs have nothing to do with his high-tech wizardry and everything to do with his alleged involvement in a growing stock-options manipulation scandal that has engulfed Apple Inc., the Cupertino technology giant he runs, and Pixar Animation Studios, the Emeryville movie company he sold to Walt Disney Co. last year." The Chronicle continues, "Federal prosecutors in San Francisco are scrutinizing options awarded to top Pixar executives on dates that guaranteed them the highest potential profits. Among the grants being reviewed: Two-time Oscar-winning animated film director John Lasseter and former Pixar President Edwin Catmull received options that allowed them to buy Pixar stock at the lowest price in 2000. In 1997, Lasseter received options just before a production agreement with Disney that pumped up shares nearly 50 percent." The Chronicle adds, "The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that Jobs, then Pixar's chairman and CEO, signed the 2001 employment contract with Lasseter that included a large options grant on a date more than three months before the contract was signed. The Journal cited a person familiar with the matter. … It remains unclear what role if any Jobs played in selecting the favorable date, according to the Journal. But the timing grabbed the attention of federal authorities, prompting an investigation by Disney that has not been completed. … In a conference call with investors in November, Disney CEO Bob Iger said the board began the investigation after being contacted by the SEC and the Justice Department."

SEC Launches Formal Probe Of KLA-Tencor Options Backdating. The San Jose Mercury News (2/10, Schwanhausser, Blitstein) reports, "The Securities and Exchange Commission has elevated its probe into stock option backdating at KLA-Tencor into a formal investigation, the company said Friday." The News continues, "The San Jose maker of chip-inspection equipment, which said it learned the news Feb. 2, has faced an informal investigation by the SEC and a separate probe by the Justice Department since last May, when newspaper reports raised questions about the fortunate timing of options awarded to Chairman Kenneth Levy." The News adds, "Last week, KLA acknowledged in its 2006 annual report that the company intentionally priced stock options 'retroactively,' falsified documents and violated its stock plan rules about issuing discounted options. The company said that some former executives selected the 'fortuitously low' prices, while others were aware of the abuses. … The internal inquiry led to the ouster of Levy, a Silicon Valley pioneer, General Counsel Stuart Nichols, and director Jon Tompkins, the former CEO of Tencor before it merged with KLA. … The company also fired Kenneth Schroeder, a former chief executive who most recently served as a senior adviser, and canceled all tainted options he held. Although KLA-Tencor hasn't said so explicitly, its reports appear to blame Schroeder for much of the options abuses. Schroeder plans to fight his firing and the cancellation of his options, KLA-Tencor said."

GM Accounting Issues Remain Unresolved. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A3, Stoll) reports, "General Motors Corp. said late Friday it still isn't ready to say when it will resolve accounting issues that forced it to delay filing its fourth-quarter and full-year financial results for 2006." The Journal continues, "Separately, shares of GM and Ford Motor Co. rose Friday after Deutsche Bank upgraded the auto giants' shares to 'buy,' citing optimism that the companies can win health-care-cost savings from the United Auto Workers union this fall. Shares of GM were up 6.5% to $36.01 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Ford were at $8.73, up 2.1%, on the NYSE." The Journal adds, "GM was originally scheduled to report preliminary fourth-quarter results Jan. 30 but announced two weeks ago that it would postpone the release. The company said it would provide further information on the progress of its financial reporting during the week of Feb. 5 and that it would submit its 10-k report with the Securities and Exchange Commission by the Mar. 1 deadline."

reports, "Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord sold $18.3 million worth of company stock last week, just days before the Bush administration unveiled a multibillion-dollar cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to plummet." The Post continues, "Lord sold 400,000 shares of company stock Thursday, Feb. 1, and Friday, Feb. 2. The following Monday, after President Bush announced a budget that would cut subsidies to the student-lending industry by about $19 billion over five years, Sallie Mae's stock plunged about 9 percent, to $42.37 from $46.46, its lowest closing price in more than two years." The Post adds, "In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that night, SLM Corp., as Sallie Mae is formally known, disclosed Lord's sale of the shares, which it said was done to fund unspecified personal projects. … Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, said this week that Lord had planned to sell the shares for weeks and told the company about his plans to sell the stock, which represented about 29 percent of the Sallie Mae shares he owns outright, nine days before the sale." The Post notes, "Democrats in Congress have been calling for changes in student loan programs that would hurt Sallie Mae. The Reston-based student lending company has opposed the changes. But, Joyce said, Lord had no idea Bush would propose such huge rollbacks of lender subsidies. 'Nobody had these cuts on their radar screen,' he said. 'The student lending community did not see this coming.' … 'I can understand that people are raising questions, but the timing was just completely coincidental,' Joyce said. 'He had been thinking of doing this for many weeks. He was watching the market and just elected to do it on Thursday and Friday.' … If Lord had sold his shares at Monday's closing price of $42.37, he would have received about $1.4 million less. Lord sold the shares in a series of transactions over the two days at prices that ranged from $45.75 to $46.03. … Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department, said some Capitol Hill staff members were briefed on the proposed budget last Thursday but that the suggested cuts were not shared with Sallie Mae officials before Monday's announcement."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Provides Glimpse Into White House Crisis Response. The AP (2/10, Yost) reports, "David Addington, chief legal adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney, says he was taken aback when the White House started making public pronouncements about the CIA leak investigation." The AP continues, "In the fall of 2003, President Bush's press secretary was categorically denying that either Karl Rove or I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby was involved in exposing the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA employee married to a critic of the war in Iraq. … 'Why are you making these statements?' Addington asked White House communications director Dan Bartlett. … 'Your boss is the one who wanted' them, Bartlett replied, referring to Cheney. … With that, 'I shut up,' Addington recalled recently for jurors in Libby's CIA leak trial, which begins its fourth week on Monday with Libby's lawyers calling their first witnesses." The AP adds, "So far, the testimony of Addington and other administration aides, along with documents and Libby's audiotaped grand jury testimony, have provided a rare glimpse of how the Bush White House scrambled to respond to a political crisis as it intersected a criminal investigation. … At the intersection was Cheney, along with Rove and Libby, who were working in the summer of 2003 to rebut claims by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that Bush had misled the nation about prewar intelligence on Iraq. … The White House denials on behalf of Rove and Libby came just before Rove secretly began acknowledging to the FBI that he had confirmed Plame's identity for conservative columnist Bob Novak, who first published her name and relationship to Wilson. … About the same time, Libby came under suspicion because NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert had talked to the FBI, contradicting Libby's version of a conversation between the two men that would become the heart of the perjury and obstruction charges against Libby."

Phishing Schemers Target Job Seekers In ID Theft Scams. The Washington Post (2/10, D1, Shin) reports, "The online news site USA Voice isn't going to win any kudos from media critics. Not for its top story Monday, 'Super Bowl Ads Don't Live Up to the Hype.' And not for its Fox News-style slogan, 'USA Voice: Honest and Unfiltered.' … As a phishing scheme, however, privacy experts say it's a winner." The Post continues, "The Web site for the 'world's fastest growing news organization' looked good enough to fool Katherine Brinton, an aspiring journalist in Philadelphia. After posting her resume on Monster.com nine months ago, the 23-year old received an e-mail from USA Voice in November that said it was looking for reporters with 'excellent writing skills' and an 'innate ability to find the truth.' … Brinton filled out an online application with her name, address and telephone number. But instead of job offers, she began receiving a stream of unsolicited e-mails hawking Viagra, payday loans and penny stocks. … Brinton fell victim to a sophisticated phishing scam, which, in recent months, targeted thousands of job seekers on such popular Web sites as Monster.com and CareerBuilder.com. Phishers send out seemingly legitimate e-mail in an attempt to get people to reply with personal information then used in a variety of scams. … Since June, the Better Business Bureau serving Metro Washington has logged more than 8,000 inquiries about USA Voice and a related entity, Instant Human Resources. USA Voice lists a downtown Washington address; Instant Human Resources lists an address in Rockville. Both locations turned out to be a service that forwards mail for other businesses. Instant Human Resources' parent company, Internet Solutions, says it is based in Orlando." The Post notes, "In 2006, about 109 million U.S. adults received phishing e-mails, up from 57 million in 2004, according to research firm Gartner, of Stamford, Conn. About one in six phishing e-mails are opened -- a better rate than for e-mails from legitimate businesses, said Jeff Wilbur, vice president of marketing for e-mail security firm Iconix. … The majority of phishing e-mails claim to be from financial institutions, but phishers have also switched to mimicking dating, social networking and other kinds of online services. In those cases, victims might let their guard down because they are not giving out financial information, Wilbur said. But such attacks can leave them just as vulnerable to identity theft. … Job search sites offer identity thieves a rich source of personal information and a pool of potential victims willing to divulge even more in hopes of landing employment. Since 2004, some of the largest online job search firms, such as Monster and CareerBuilder, have taken more precautions against criminals looking to collect personal information from their users."

Nobel Winner Wiesel Attacked At California Conference. The New York Times (2/10, McKinley) reports, "Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, was attacked at a San Francisco hotel last week by an unknown assailant, the police said yesterday." The Times continues, "Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, said Mr. Wiesel, 78, was attending a conference when a man approached him in an elevator and asked to interview him. After a brief discussion, the man dragged Mr. Wiesel off the elevator and tried to restrain him, but Mr. Wiesel screamed, and the attacker fled."

The AP (2/10) reports, "Gittens said police are investigating the incident as a crime. He said investigators were aware of a posting at an anti-Semitic Web site in which a man claimed responsibility for the attack, but declined to comment further. … Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camps at Auschwitz and Buchenwald during World War II, has worked for human rights in many parts of the world and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986."

Judge Rules California Sex Offender Restriction Is Not Retroactive. The AP (2/10) reports, "A federal judge ruled that a voter-approved restriction on where sex offenders can live could not be applied retroactively, potentially freeing thousands of parolees from a ban on living within 2,000 feet of a school or other place where children gather." The AP continues, "The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said there was nothing in the law, Proposition 83, that specified its provisions were to be applied retroactively." The AP adds, "The proposition, known as Jessica's Law, was approved Nov. 7 by 70.5 percent of voters and took effect the next day. It also increases prison terms for sex offenders and requires lifetime satellite tracking of rapists and other felony sex criminals after their release from prison."

Judge Orders Former Coke Secretary Jailed Until Sentencing. The Atlanta Journal-Constitution (2/10, Stanford) reported, "A federal judge ordered ex-Coke secretary Joya Williams to jail Friday, saying she had an 'utter disregard for the law.' … She will be sentenced May 23." Assistant U.S. Attorney Jay Pak said "during a hearing Friday that Williams, 41, admitted being 'high as a kite' on Vicks cough medicine as the jury read the guilty verdict last week. Pak said she had drunk an entire bottle of the medication." The AJC noted, "Jurors convicted Williams under the federal Corporate Espionage Act of trying to sell confidential Coke documents and sample test products for $1.5 million to an undercover FBI agent posing as a Pepsi go-between." In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/10, Turner) added, "U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester told…Williams that her behavior since her arrest in July has showed that she 'would do anything to avoid going to jail.' … Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, called the government's claim that her client is a risk to the community and a risk of flight 'more than offensive.'"

Former New York Comptroller Fined For Defrauding State. The New York Times (2/10, Confessore) reports, "The former state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, praised his replacement on Friday, after a hearing at which a judge sentenced him to pay a $5,000 fine for his use of state employees to chauffeur his wife." The Times continues, "The State Legislature voted on Wednesday to appoint Thomas P. DiNapoli, an assemblyman from Nassau County, as the new comptroller, two months after Mr. Hevesi resigned as part of a plea deal with the Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares. … Before resigning last year, Mr. Hevesi agreed to plead guilty to a felony charge of defrauding the government and to submit a DNA sample for the state's criminal database." The Times adds, "In delivering the sentence, Judge Stephen W. Herrick described Mr. Hevesi's actions as 'unexplainable and totally unacceptable,' but cited Mr. Hevesi's decades of public service, cooperation with the investigation and agreement to leave politics as reasons for the mild sentence. … 'Your fall from grace here has been total and from a very great height,' Judge Herrick said. Mr. Hevesi served for more than two decades in the Assembly and later as New York City comptroller before he won election to the state comptroller's job in 2002."

Jury Spares New York Drug Lord Death Penalty After Murder Convictions. The New York Times (2/10, Rashbaum) reports, "A notorious street-corner crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was spared the death penalty yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn when a jury failed to reach a unanimous verdict to execute him for ordering the killing of two rivals." The Times continues, "The jury's action will result in a sentence of life without the possibility of release for the convicted drug dealer, Kenneth McGriff, 46, who was known as Supreme and whose drug crew, the Supreme Team, held sway on the streets of southeast Queens in the 1980s." The Times adds, "All the jurors, who were questioned by the judge before being selected to serve on the case, had said they were willing to sentence the defendant to death if the evidence warranted it. On the verdict sheet, the jury noted that 'execution would not be an option' if the case had been tried in state court. … One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David A. Ruhnke, who defended the case with Jean Barrett, said his client was relieved by the jury's action. … He contended that the case should never have been prosecuted in federal court and suggested that the government's decision to seek the death penalty was inappropriate." The Times notes, "Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, whose office prosecuted the case, would not directly address Mr. Ruhnke's comments, saying only, 'The decision to impose the death penalty is solely within the province of the jury, and we respect their decision.'"

The AP (2/9, McShane) reports, "Jurors, who deliberated just over 2 1/2 hours on the sentence, convicted him last week of paying $50,000 for the 2001 killings of an obscure rapper named Eric 'E-Money Bags' Smith and Troy Singleton. … Prosecutors said Smith was killed for his fatal 1999 shooting of a McGriff associate, while Singleton was targeted because McGriff felt he might retaliate on Smith's behalf." The AP adds, "McGriff was the founder of the Supreme Crew, a brutal drug gang that operated in Queens during the 1980s. At its peak, the Supreme Team's network of dealers was making $200,000 a day, authorities said. … After McGriff did prison time on a drug conviction, he was released in 1997 and aligned himself with neighborhood friend and music mogul Irv 'Gotti' Lorenzo. Defense attorneys claimed this was part of McGriff's plan to create movies and music. … Prosecutors said McGriff returned to the drug business in New York and Baltimore. Lorenzo and his brother, Chris, were indicted with McGriff but acquitted at a separate trial of using their label Murder Inc. to launder $1 million in drug money."

Appeal Court Overturns DC Police Officer's Illegal Gratuities Conviction. The Washington Post (2/10, B2, Miller) reported, "By a 7 to 5 vote, a federal appeals court [Friday] overturned the conviction of a former D.C. police detective arrested in an FBI sting. Nelson Valdes was convicted in October 2002 of three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450. Valdes provided the informant with names and addresses in March 2001 to match four license plates and checked on warrants on another person, prosecutors said." The Post notes, "A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals reversed the conviction a year ago, ruling in a 2 to 1 decision that the gratuities charge -- which bars seeking or accepting gratuities 'for or because of any official act' -- did not apply to Valdes's conduct in the case."

FBI Probe Leads To Prostitution Allegations Against California Police. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Surdin, Krikorian) reported, "At least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that have been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown. The internal affairs investigation by the Inglewood Police Department began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia. … Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included 'very detailed ledgers' that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation." The Times noted, "Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution." Inglewood City Councilman Ralph Franklin "said it was aimed at determining whether the alleged sexual misconduct involved a large number of officers over an extended period of time. He said the FBI was assisting police in the investigation." The AP (2/10) also reported on the intestigation.

Texas Man Charged With Hurricane Relief Fraud. The Texarkana (TX) Gazette (2/10, LaRowe) reports, "A Texarkana man has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Texas in a fraud case related to hurricane relief in the Eastern District of Texas." The Gazette continues, "Gary Williams Trice, 36, has been charged with mail fraud after he allegedly illegally acquired $36,000 in FEMA hurricane assistance money. Trice is alleged to have submitted as many as 14 fraudulent applications for assistance based on hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma by using different names, addresses and Social Security numbers." The Gazette adds, "The investigation was conducted jointly by the United States Department of Labor's

Office of the Inspector General, the United States Postal Service and the Department of Homeland Security. … 'Hurricane-related fraud remains a priority of the Department of Justice,' said United States Attorney Matthew Orwig in a press release issued this week. 'Applications for assistance are continuing to be reviewed and any appearances of fraud will be thoroughly investigated.'" The Gazette notes, "The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force was created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud."

O'Malley, Kaine Faced With Death Penalty Decisions. The Washington Post (2/10, Wagner, Craig, 690K) says on its front page that Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and Virginia Gov. Timothy Kaine "both face decisions" on the "divisive" capital punishment issue "that will be watched closely in their states and beyond. O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, has pledged to work with lawmakers to repeal Maryland's death penalty -- and could effectively halt executions through the end of his tenure even without their support, given a recent court ruling. Kaine, who was sworn in last year, presides over a state where executions are far more frequent. He soon could have to decide whether to sign bills to expand capital punishment in Virginia."

Catholic Maryland Legislators Split On Death Penalty Abolition. The Washington Times (2/10, Lobianco, 88K) reports, "Key Catholic lawmakers in the General Assembly are splitting with major Catholic groups over an attempt to abolish the death penalty in Maryland. 'I know it's a little inconsistent, but I do feel [the death penalty] is a deterrent,' said Sen. Norman R. Stone Jr., Baltimore County Democrat and a Catholic. 'Maybe you don't reconcile it until you meet your maker,' said Delegate Susan K. McComas, Harford County Republican and a Catholic who is a member of the House Judiciary Committee."

CIVIL LAW:

DOJ Faces Backlog Of Healthcare Fraud Cases. The Fort Worth Star-Telegram/Cox News Service (2/10, Malone) reports, "Federal prosecutors admitted having a backlog of more than 150 cases in which pharmaceutical companies are accused of defrauding federal and state healthcare programs, a Justice Department lawyer acknowledged to a congressional panel Friday." Cox continues, "Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, said his department has recovered $5.3 billion since 1999 from major drug manufacturers in a variety of kickback schemes and overcharges that defrauded Medicaid and Medicare. … But when asked by House Committee on Oversight Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., why the government doesn't move faster on these cases to recoup even more taxpayer money, Tenpas said his office is short on lawyers and investigators. … 'These are very complex cases,' he said, adding that his office has not added new positions, despite estimates that the prescription drug fraud cases produce $15 in payments and penalties for every $1 spent on prosecution." Cox adds, "Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of a Medicaid task force for the Texas attorney general's office, said at the congressional hearing that his team of lawyers had more than paid its way by recovering $64.1 million from just four manufacturers that had overcharged the state and federal government for prescription drugs. … O'Connell, in an interview later, estimated that his office has collected more than $100 million from drug companies since his anti-fraud office was set up in 1999. Expenses for his task force, recently expanded to 10 lawyers, have added up to $5 million to $7 million, he said. … Waxman repeatedly raised concerns about the new prescription drug benefit, known as 'Part D' for Medicare recipients. … The new program 'is going to cost $1 trillion over 10 years -- $50 billion over this next year,' Waxman said. 'That program's got to be as ripe for fraud as any other.' … Tenpas said officials at the Justice Department are 'clearly concerned there could be fraud in that program' but added that after only one year of operation and not enough data 'we don't have many conclusions yet.'"

GAO Warns Of Medicare Drug Overcharging. The AP (2/10) reports, "Federal law makers should consider doing more to ensure the government is not overcharged for prescription drugs, according to a government watch dog." The AP continues, "A director for the Government Accountability Office told members of Congress Friday that the Medicare drug benefit program is vulnerable to false billing schemes because it relies on private companies to report drug prices. Under the program, about 42 million eligible senior citizens can choose between thousands of prescription drug plans offered by health insurers that individually negotiate drug prices with manufacturers." The AP adds, "GAO's health care director John Dicken said the Medicare drug program's 'complex set of relationships and transactions with private entities' makes it difficult to verify the accuracy of drug prices charged to the government. Dicken told members of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform that Medicare needs to have systems in place to spot inflated price reporting."

Waxman Pledges Probe Of Drugmaker "Profiteering." Bloomberg (2/10, Marcus) reports, "Representative Henry Waxman pledged Congress will investigate a range of allegations that drugmakers are 'profiteering' by overcharging federal health programs. … 'If even half of them are true, billions of federal dollars that should be buying needed care are instead adding to drug company profits,' Waxman, Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said at a hearing today on alleged fraud and abuse in drug pricing." Bloomberg adds, "Democrats promised more aggressive oversight of government practices when they took control of Congress in January, and the hearing was an initial effort to apply such scrutiny to health- care costs. … The Justice Department has recovered more than $5.3 billion related to pharmaceutical fraud in federal and state programs since 1999, Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, told the committee. … 'It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs,' Tenpas said in a statement submitted to the committee."

Sailor, Family Sue Navy Alleging Hospital Malpractice. The Navy Times (2/10, Amos) reports, "A Navy family has filed a claim against the Navy for $150 million, alleging that malpractice by Naval Hospital Jacksonville doctors and staff caused their newborn son to suffer severe brain damage that has left him unable to walk, talk or see." The Times continues, "Sean Cronin, a civilian lawyer representing Electronics Technician 3rd Class Joseph Alcorn and his wife, Kendra, said injuries to their son Gavin, the second child born during a twin pregnancy, were caused when he did not receive enough oxygen during delivery in May 2005. … Cronin said hospital records show that Gavin's limbs were blue and that he was not breathing when he was delivered about an hour after his sister. … Gavin's sister had unrelated complications during delivery but has since recovered." The Times adds, "Shortly after delivery, Gavin was transferred to a civilian hospital in Jacksonville, where doctors used an MRI to determine that he suffered brain damage during delivery, Cronin said. … Capt. Raquel Bono, commanding officer of Naval Hospital Jacksonville, said Navy doctors identified Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy as high risk before delivery and took steps, including having extra doctors present during delivery, to prevent complications. She said close attention was paid to the fetal heart rate and to the mother's uterine contractions. … Bono would not say which, if any, prenatal risk factors other than a multiple delivery were present during Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy, but she defended the actions of doctors and staff at the hospital, which she said delivers about 120 babies each month and conforms to national standards set by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists. … The Navy has six months to respond to the Alcorn's claim. It can pay the full amount, offer a reduced settlement or pay nothing. … After the six-month period, if the family is not satisfied with the Navy's response, they can file a lawsuit in U.S. District Court. … At that point, Justice Department lawyers would take over the lawsuit's defense."

Expert Cites Controller Fatigue As Factor In Chicago Air Crash. The Chicago Tribune (2/10, O'Connor) reports, "An aviation consultant testified Friday that an air-traffic controller's fatigue was a contributing factor in the midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others seven years ago." The Tribune continues, "At a federal trial stemming from lawsuits over the crash, Farrell Smith, a former Federal Aviation Administration official, said records showed that controller Gregory Fowler worked more than seven hours that day without taking a break. … In the hour before the collision, Fowler had been involved in 416 transmissions with pilots, one every 8.65 seconds, Smith said. .. . 'He's vulnerable to fatigue, mental and physical,' Smith said of Fowler, whom lawyers for the three victims' families blamed for the collision. 'It's critical safety-wise to give them a break, so they're sharp and aware.'" The Tribune adds, "Collins had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P flown by student pilot Sharon Hock as the two aircraft approached Waukegan Regional Airport near the lakefront. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, while Hock died when her plane plummeted onto a Zion street. … On Friday Paul Pieri, a former flight instructor who witnessed the crash, testified that he had been surprised when Collins' plane passed in front of his shortly before the collision. If Collins had accurately reported his position, Pieri said, 'He should have already been past me on final approach' to the airfield. … Justice Department lawyers, representing the FAA at the trial, contend that Collins caused the collision."

Texas Man Pleads Guilty To Operating Multi-State Immigrant Brothel Ring. The Austin (TX) American-Statesman (2/9, Kreytak) reports, "A man who federal authorities say managed brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City in an elaborate multistate immigrant smuggling and prostitution ring pleaded guilty in federal court Friday." The A-S continues, "The ring included brothels in 13 cities, including ones across Texas, as far west as Las Vegas and as far east as New York City and Atlanta, according to documents filed with Juan Balderas-Orosco's plea. The operators snuck hundreds of women into the country from Mexico as well as Central and South American countries, and forced them to have sex with as many as 40 men — mostly undocumented immigrants — a day, the documents said. … Their bosses, who moved the women among the brothels in the interstate network, kept all or part of the women's earnings, the documents said. … 'The prostitutes reported they were not free to leave the brothels on their own, and the brothel operators were usually armed with firearms,' one court document said." The A-S notes, "Balderas, 34, faces 10 years in prison at a later sentencing on each of three crimes: transportation for prostitution, conspiracy to smuggle, transport and harbor illegal aliens, and importation of aliens. … Balderas, who was the manager of brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City, is the lead defendant in an indictment filed last year in U.S. District Court in Austin charging 12 people in the case with various smuggling and prostitution crimes."

US Opposes Dismissal Of Charges Against Seale. The AP (2/10, Elliott) reports from Jackson, MS, "Kidnapping remains a capital crime under federal law and there is no statute of limitations that would justify dismissing charges against a reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men, say federal prosecutors." The AP continues, "James Ford Seale, 71, has pleaded not guilty to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail. … Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee." The AP adds, "Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown. … In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued. … U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate has not ruled on the dismissal motion." The AP notes, "U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed this week, said Seale's defense was misreading the law. He said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law. … 'The limitations period depends upon the capital nature of the crime, and not on whether the death penalty is in fact available for a defendant in a particular case. Because the defendant is charged with offenses deemed by Congress to be capital in nature, he may be prosecuted for those offenses without limitation,' Lampton said in the government's response. … Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense."

Feinstein Seeks Information On Jailed Border Agents. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Lochhead) reports, "Sen. Dianne Feinstein intervened Friday in the cases of two Border Patrol agents who are imprisoned for shooting an alleged Mexican drug smuggler and who have become a cause celebre for anti-illegal immigration GOP politicians, conservative media and activists." The Chronicle continues, "The California Democrat, who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote letters to three top administration officials -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin -- asking for specific information about their agencies' involvement in the case. … Feinstein is the first prominent Democrat to become involved in the case of the border agents, and her office said she has secured the agreement of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to conduct a committee investigation. She said Leahy is open to a hearing on the matter." The Chronicle adds, "Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos were convicted last March and sentenced Oct. 9 for the 2005 shooting of an alleged drug smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who had driven a van loaded with 743 pounds of marijuana from Mexico to Texas. The agents shot Aldrete-Davila as he tried to flee back across the border with Mexico, then hid evidence of the shooting and failed to report it, according to the evidence presented at their trial. Compean received a 12-year federal prison sentence, and Ramos 11 years and one month. … Last Saturday, Ramos was injured in a fight with five other inmates at the federal prison in Yazoo City, Miss. Prison authorities said he sustained minor bruises and abrasions. … President Bush has so far refused to pardon the agents, though he has said he would 'look at all the facts' and urged others to do the same in a Fox News interview Jan. 31."

Tancredo Meets With Imprisoned Ex-Border Patrol Agent. The AP (2/9) reports Rep. Tom Tancredo, "a Republican presidential candidate and opponent of illegal immigration," met with ex-US Border Patrol agent Ignacio Ramos at the Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex in Mississippi. Ramos is in jail "for shooting a drug smuggling suspect in Texas and then lying about it," and he was recently "attacked by other inmates." Tancredo said, "It is our hope we can get him moved to another part of the facility that is safe for him but not in a segregated environment…23 hours a day in a cell, which he has now." Tancredo "has said the Bush administration failed to protect Ramos and has demanded that the agents receive a full presidential pardon."

Two Sentenced In Indiana Concrete Price-Fixing Scheme. The Indianapolis Star (2/10, Corcoran) reports, "Two men convicted in November of involvement in an Indianapolis-area concrete price-fixing conspiracy will spend nearly twice as long in prison as ringleaders who cooperated and pleaded guilty." The Star continues, "Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney on Friday sentenced Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., to 27 months in prison for violating antitrust law and lying to the FBI. … The prison terms will be followed by two years of supervised release. Both men were ordered to pay $5,000 fines." The Star adds, "The conspiracy's ringleaders, who testified against the Beaver cousins in November, were sentenced to 14 months in prison. … The Beavers acknowledged attending several secret meetings called to set prices, but they still deny participating in the scheme. Both men agreed, however, they had lied to investigators. … Ricky Beaver, 43, also denied price-fixing, saying: 'I only went to two meetings. I didn't agree to anything.' … McKinney was unmoved, saying the jury had spoken, and he agreed the Beavers were active participants." The Star notes, The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials, the largest fine ever paid by a participant in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy. … The Beavers' sentencing came hours after McKinney sentenced John J. Blatzheim, 52, executive vice president of Fishers-based Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., to nine months in prison and a year of probation, and fined him $5,000. … In all, nine current or former officials of four area companies have been sentenced to prison in the scheme to overcharge concrete customers from July 2000 through May 25, 2004, when a series of early-morning FBI raids broke up the conspiracy. … 'We're pleased the defendants received significant sentences that reflect the seriousness of the crimes,' said Scott D. Hammond, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division."

Lear Agrees To Icahn's $2.8 Billion Buyout Offer. The New York Times (2/10, Bunkley) reports, "One of the biggest shareholders of the Lear Corporation, a manufacturer of automotive seats, criticized the company's deal on Friday to sell itself for $2.8 billion to the investor Carl C. Icahn." The Times continues, "The shareholder, Richard S. Pzena, who owns 11 percent of Lear through his firm, Pzena Investment Management, said he believed that the price was too low and that Lear did not need outside help to turn around its business. … Another shareholder, Evercore Asset, which calls itself a relatively small shareholder of Lear, said Friday that it was going to vote against Mr. Icahn's bid. Evercore said the offer price of $36 a share does not reflect the value of Lear." The Times ads, "The deal — the latest in a wave of major investments in the troubled auto parts industry — is worth $5.3 billion, including $2.5 billion in debt that will be assumed by American Real Estate Partners, the investment firm controlled by Mr. Icahn. Mr. Icahn already owns nearly 16 percent of Lear's 76.3 million outstanding shares, which would be valued at $36 each. … That is $3.39 less than the closing price for Lear's stock on Friday; shares fell 1.7 percent after the deal was announced."

The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A3, Kosdrosky) reports, "Lear Corp.'s support of a takeover offer by billionaire investor Carl Icahn has raised questions about whether the auto-parts supplier's board has worked hard enough to get the best deal for shareholders. … Management's welcoming response to the offer also sparked shareholder calls for the company to seek competing bids." The Journal continues, "The auto-parts supplier said on Friday its management supported Mr. Icahn's $36-a-share offer, adding that its board voted unanimously in favor of it, even though Lear stock has been trading at about the offer price. … The deal involving Mr. Icahn's American Real Estate Partners L.P., and valued at about $5.3 billion, is the latest move to grab a bigger stake in the auto-parts sector. Companies like Lear have struggled with lower production from U.S. auto makers, high raw-materials costs and pricing pressures. But deep-pocketed investors have been drawn to the sector because of the low valuations of many ailing companies and the belief some will recover. … At least three major shareholders believe Lear shares have the potential to appreciate well beyond the Icahn offer price and said they will vote against the bid."

Bank Of America Cooperating With DOJ's Municipal Bond Probe. The New York Times (2/10, Bajaj) reports, "Bank of America said yesterday that it was cooperating with a Justice Department investigation into bidding practices in the municipal bond business in exchange for leniency." The Times continues, "The agreement with the bank may be a significant breakthrough for government investigators who have been looking at how the proceeds of bonds issued by cities, school districts and other municipal authorities are invested between the time the money is raised and when it is spent on projects like new water systems and school gymnasiums." The Times adds, "Investigators are examining whether there was collusion among some financial institutions in bidding to handle the bond revenue during those interim periods. … Last November, the Justice Department issued subpoenas and raided the offices of several firms that served as go-betweens for municipalities and large financial institutions. … The investigation is the biggest in municipal finance since the 1990s, when the Securities and Exchange Commission accused some Wall Street firms of "yield burning" — or profiting by overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings. The current investigation is unusual because it appears to involve possible criminal charges."

The AP (2/10, Augstums) reports, "The Charlotte-based bank said the agreement will keep the department from bringing any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in the matter in return for its continuing cooperation. … The bank said it was receiving the special treatment because it went to the department with information about bidding practices in the bond industry before the government began its investigation last year." The AP adds, "Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to a number of Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports."

The Charlotte Observer (2/10, Rothacker) reports, "Bank of America Corp. said Friday that it won't face criminal prosecution for anti-trust matters in the U.S. Justice Department's ongoing investigation of bidding practices in the municipal bond industry." The Observer continues, "The Charlotte bank said it reached a leniency agreement with the agency, in return for its continuing cooperation. The announcement shed new light on the bank's role in a wide-ranging probe that became public late last year. … Under the Justice Department's leniency program, amnesty is available to a company that first reports information to the agency before the government has started its own investigation, the bank said." The Observer notes, "Separately, Bank of America said it had agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS related to certain bond transactions. Under the agreement, the bank said it did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code. … State and local governments issue municipal bonds to raise money for projects ranging from schools to transportation systems to housing projects. In return, investors receive tax breaks on the interest they receive from the bonds. … In 2006, investment banks raised about $379 billion through municipal bond issues, the second best year on record, according to Thomson Financial. Bank of America was the ninth-biggest underwriter." The Observer adds, "The industry faced scrutiny in the 1990s over the marking up of bond prices and now faces renewed examination. Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports. … At the time, the Justice Department said it was looking at 'anti-competitive practices.' The reports also said the IRS was examining whether consultants and underwriters were evading taxes in certain transactions."

Bloomberg (2/10, Selway, Braun) reports, "Bank of America is the first to announce an agreement with the U.S. government in connection with an antitrust probe of bid-rigging of investment contracts that are sold to states and municipalities. The settlement may help speed the pace of the probe, which has roiled an almost 200-year-old market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding. … 'It's a positive step when you see settlements because it does tend to expedite the process,' said Carol Lew, the president of the National Association of Bond Lawyers and a public finance attorney at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Roth in Newport Beach, California." Bloomberg adds, "The agreement came after Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America gave information to investigators before they initiated the probe, the bank said in its statement. The bank said offers of amnesty are available from the Justice Department to the first who reports behavior that is later investigated. … More than a dozen banks, insurers and brokers have been subpoenaed in the investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department's probe follows the IRS in looking into whether there were conspiracies to rig the bidding for so-called guaranteed investment contracts, where local governments invest money raised at bond sales until it is needed to pay for schools and other projects. … The Justice Department has declined to comment on the probe, saying only that it was investigating anti-competitive practices in the industry. Subpoenas issued in the investigation sought information on several financial products, including derivatives."

Market Watch (2/10, Gelsi) reports, "The pact by the nation's second-largest bank with the U.S. Justice Department could mark a breakthrough as the government investigates practices in the multi-billion dollar municipal bond industry. … Bank of America said it's inked a leniency agreement in connection with the department's investigation into bidding practices in the municipal derivatives sector. … 'This amnesty grant was a result of the company voluntarily providing information to the Department before the Department began its investigation, as well as the company's continuing cooperation,' Bank of America said. … In return for the company's cooperation, the Justice Department will not bring any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in connection with matters that the company reported to the Justice Department, Bank of America said."

FirstGroup To Purchase Laidlaw For $3.6 Billion. Bloomberg (2/10, Alloway) reports, "Britain's FirstGroup Plc agreed to buy Laidlaw International Inc., owner of the largest U.S. school-bus company and the Greyhound bus service, for $3.6 billion to triple revenue in North America." Bloomberg continues, "Laidlaw investors will receive $35.25 in cash for each share, Aberdeen, Scotland-based FirstGroup, the U.K.'s biggest train operator, said today in a statement. That's 11 percent more than the closing price of $31.72 yesterday." Bloomberg adds, "FirstGroup will merge its Ryder U.S. student buses division, acquired in 1999, with Laidlaw's fleet to give it a 13 percent share of the North American school bus market. Laidlaw's Greyhound Lines Inc. unit, the largest inter-city bus company, is ``a less obvious strategic fit'' and will be reviewed, FirstGroup said. … Laidlaw, founded in 1924, filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after almost 20 years of expansion. It bought hundreds of small school bus operators during the 1990s, culminating with the acquisition of Greyhound in 1998. … Gina Talamona, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman, said it hasn't been determined whether her agency's antitrust division or the Federal Trade Commission will review the deal."

New EPA Rules Will Reduce Toxic Emissions From Cars By 80%. The Washington Post (2/10, A2, Eilperin, 690K) reports the Environmental Protection Agency "issued rules yesterday that will dramatically cut toxic fumes from cars and trucks over the next 25 years. The regulations, which will reduce the amount of cancer-causing benzene in gasoline and set tighter emission standards for autos in cold temperatures and for fuel containers, will help reduce toxic emissions from passenger cars by 80 percent from 1999 levels by 2030. 'Americans love their cars,' EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a statement. 'By clearing the air from tons of fuel and exhaust pollution, President Bush and EPA are paving the road toward healthier drivers and a cleaner environment.'"

The New York Times (2/10, A9, Barringer, 1.16M) reports, "The final rule, issued under a court-ordered deadline set after environmental groups filed suit about two years ago, provides more uniform reductions around the country than the agency had originally proposed. It was greeted with praise from environmental groups usually critical of the Bush administration in this area and with considerably less enthusiasm by the organization representing the country's 149 refineries."

WPost Encourages US Public To Accept Cloned Livestock. The Washington Post (2/10, A16, 690K), in an editorial, writes, "Ever since the Food and Drug Administration officially vouched for the safety of food derived from cloned animals last month, Americans have given themselves a long and unnecessary national stomachache. Citing concerns over everything from safety to ethics, many of them told pollsters that they are apprehensive about milk and meat from clones entering supermarkets. Members of Congress are preparing to push legislation requiring food from clones and their progeny to be labeled as such. … It is important for the public not to overestimate the differences between cloning livestock for the purpose of breeding and what American ranchers and breeders already do to better their flocks and herds. The facts are less threatening than many Americans realize."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Transnational Gang Summit Closes With Agreement On Data Sharing. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, McGreevy) reported, "An international summit on transnational gangs wrapped up in Universal City on Friday with an agreement between U.S. and Latin American law enforcement leaders to begin crafting four initiatives, including one to improve intelligence sharing on criminals who move back and forth over borders. … 'We have arrested people here who were deported five times, so we want to put some of them on the list so we look harder at the border for the worst of the worst,' said Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal section of the FBI's Los Angeles office." The Times noted, "Also aiding the effort was the announcement this week by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the federal government would accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, which will help track gang members."

FBI Awards Philadelphia Police $2 Million In Seized Drug Money. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/10, Olley) reported, "The Philadelphia division of the FBI gave the Philadelphia Police Department a pat on the back yesterday for its work in trying to cripple the city's lucrative drug trade. Special Agent in Charge J.P. Weis lauded the efforts of Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson, Deputy Commissioner Richard Ross and leaders of the Narcotics Bureau, and presented them with a commemorative plaque and a check for approximately $2 million, which represented a portion of the money they had seized jointly during the 2005-06 fiscal year. He said of the relationship between the two agencies, 'It illustrates the camaraderie between these two units that transcends mere cooperation.'" The Daily News noted, "Just this week, police stopped a tractor-trailer…and found 100 kilos of cocaine with an estimated street value of $10 million. Forfeitures as large as Monday's are what Weis describes as a powerful tool against drug activity."

Husband Of Hawaii FBI Agent Pleads Guilty To Drug Charges. Honolulu Star Bulletin (2/10, Barayuga) reported, "The spouse of a former FBI technician has admitted to conspiring with others to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams, or 1.1 pounds, of methamphetamine." On Friday, Eric Moniz "pleaded guilty…in U.S. District Court to the charge, punishable by a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison. Moniz was one of 23 individuals indicted by a federal grand jury in April after an internal FBI investigation. The FBI began surveillance of employee Charmaine Moniz, wife of Eric Moniz, and her activities at work. They discovered she had been accessing a confidential database and reviewing documents relating to her husband's longtime friend Damien Kalei Hina, an alleged drug dealer in Waialua, as well as Jonathan Kimo Luna and Jess Lundgren." The AP (2/10) also briefly reported on Moniz's plea.

Hawaii Police Officer Admits Protecting Illegal Gambling Operation. The Honolulu Advertiser (2/10, Kobayashi) reported, "A second Honolulu police officer has pleaded guilty in a scheme to protect an illegal cockfight and gambling operation in Waialua." On Friday, Bryson Apo "admitted…that he provided the operators information about when police would raid the illegal activities and also acknowledged that he would bet on the cockfights 'from time to time' during the 2004 to 2005 cockfighting season. … Apo, an eight-year veteran of the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiring to obstruct the enforcement of criminal laws." The Advertiser noted, "The charges were the result of a massive FBI wiretap operation into gambling, drug and other illegal activities. Kevin Brunn, the third officer, is awaiting trial."

The Honolulu Star Bulletin (2/10, Barayuga) reported Apo pleaded guilty "to conspiring with more than five others, including members of a large landowning family in Waialua and two other police officers, to obstruct the enforcement of state laws prohibiting illegal gambling, specifically cockfighting, craps and card games. … The indictment stemmed from a two-year federal investigation that began in 2003 into illegal gambling and cockfighting" in Waialua.

Cuba Transfers Key Drug Cartel Head To Colombia. The New York Times (2/10, A4, McKinley, Romero, 1.16M) reports the transfer of Luis Hernando Gómez Bustamante, "the leader of a Colombian drug cartel that American prosecutors say flooded New York City streets with cocaine," from Cuban to Colombian custody in Bogota. Havana's "decision to send [Bustamante] to Colombia surprised American authorities, law enforcement officials said. Cuba's government has no diplomatic relations with the United States, and some people charged with crimes on American soil have found a haven in Havana." Also known as Rasguno, Bustamante is "the reputed boss of the Norte del Valle cartel," has been in jail in Cuba for three years "on immigration charges." Norte del Valle "was one of the most violent, lucrative and extensive cocaine-smuggling rings in the world, accounting for at least 30 percent of the cocaine being imported into the United States, Justice Department officials said."

DOJ Warns NYC Probes Of Out-Of-State Gun Stings May Be Illegal. The AP (2/9, Gross) reports, "Private investigators hired by the city to conduct sting operations on out-of-state gun shops could be breaking the law, and the dealers they caught making illegal sales will not be prosecuted, federal officials said." The AP continues, "City officials have sued more than two dozen dealers after hiring investigators to pose as buyers attempting straw purchases, in which one person fills out the paperwork for the gun but is buying for someone else. The scam is often used by convicted felons and others barred from owning firearms." The AP adds, "The city argues that the shops - in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - are responsible for many of the illegal weapons that end up in New York, and the suits have led seven dealers to agree to more scrutiny. … The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced in May it was reviewing whether the city acted legally. … 'Potential legal liabilities' arise when civilians do the work of law enforcers, Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said Thursday. The department has decided charges are not warranted against dealers in the sting cases, he said. … It was unclear whether the private investigators could face charges." The AP notes, "After the Justice Department decided not to base criminal prosecutions on the stings, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said that 'the preferred solution' is getting legal agreements with the shops to monitor their sales practices but that the city also plans to retain its right to continue the operations."

Media Given Tour Of Detention Facility For Families Of Illegal Immigrants. The New York Times (2/10, A9, Blumenthal, 1.16M) reports, "Responding to complaints about conditions" at the T. Don Hutto Family Detention Center in Taylor, Texas, the "nation's main family detention center for illegal immigrants, officials threw open the gates on Friday for a first news media tour. They portrayed the privately run converted prison, open since May, as a model facility 'primarily focused on the safety of the children.' Once all the barbed wire comes down, Gary Mead, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement official, said, 'it's going to look more like a community college with a very high chain-link fence.' Among other things, critics have complained about the prisonlike conditions, the food and the limited amount of schooling and recreation provided for children."

The Dallas Morning News (2/10, Meyer, 500K) reports, "The center, just northeast of Austin, has been home to three North Texas Palestinian families in recent months, including members of the Ibrahim family, whose controversial detention sparked a new round of criticism last week. … Human rights observers and civil rights advocates have condemned the decision to keep children in Hutto, citing abuses that include inadequate education, weight loss and psychological trauma.

The government, they say, has a responsibility to find less-restrictive environments when the incarceration of minors is necessary."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Gaouette, Bustillo, 850K) reports Hutto "is a pillar of the Bush administration's effort to crack down on illegal immigrants and detain them until their appeals can be heard. It holds detainees who cannot easily be sent home, as Mexicans can. Hutto has families from 29 countries, most from South America. The center is touted by the Homeland Security Department as a major achievement, and may be a model for future facilities. Hutto also illustrates the administration's bind as its pursuit of border security collides with the reality that many illegal immigrants are minors. On Friday, a majority of Hutto's 383 inmates were children."

Report Blasts DHS Treatment Of Asylum Seekers. The Washington Post (2/10, A6, Fears, 690K) reports, "The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom has issued a report that sharply criticizes federal immigration authorities for rounding up asylum-seekers at the border, detaining them for months in prisonlike facilities and quickly dispatching them back to the countries they fled. Thursday's report by the bipartisan panel was a follow-up to one two years ago that reported similar findings about detention and expedited removal. It said the Department of Homeland Security and two of its agencies -- the U.S. Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement -- did not act on its recommendations and made little effort to help asylum-seekers." Sen. Joseph Lieberman, chairman of the homeland security committee, "pledged to introduce legislation that would force officials to follow procedures. In a statement Thursday, he and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy praised the report as detailed and thorough."

Former NFL Star Stabler Selling Home To Pay Tax Debt. The Mobile Press-Register (AL) (2/10, Kirby) reports, "Former football great and University of Alabama broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed to put his longtime house near Orange Beach up for sale to pay off tax debts, court records indicate." The Press-Register continues, "Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the U.S. Department of Justice asked a federal judge in Mobile this week to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell. Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. was out of the office Thursday and Friday and did not rule on the request, but judges typically grant such motions when none of the parties opposes it." The Press-Register adds, "The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000. … Stabler's lawyer, Robert Galloway, said Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money. Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case. … 'We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it,' he said. 'This is the time of the year that houses sell.'" The Press-Register notes, "The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001. The federal government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000."

The AP (2/10) reports, "The civil action accuses Stabler of moving money from the company to his personal account to avoid paying corporate taxes. It states that he transferred nearly $1.4 million from the Stabler Co. to himself in the form of 'loans' in 1998 and 1999. … At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint. … 'If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations,' the suit states."

Judge Blasts DOJ Over Plea Deal In Utah Tax Case. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/10, Manson) reports, "A federal judge says prosecutors ignored their own policy when they gave a lenient plea bargain to a Bountiful accountant who prepared fraudulent tax returns." The Tribune continues, U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell refused to go along with the deal, which called for no incarceration and no restitution for Lance W. Mercer. Cassell instead ordered Mercer to spend five months in home confinement, then five months in prison and pay $11,378 to the Internal Revenue Service." The Tribune adds, "Cassell scolded the U.S. Justice Department's tax division for agreeing not to ask for any enhanced sentences under federal sentencing guidelines. … Mercer, a tax preparer with a master's degree, had a special skill that he used to cheat the government, Cassell wrote in his order. The accountant used his knowledge of what figures would appear reasonable to make returns 'fly through' IRS processing, Cassell wrote. … However, prosecutors not only declined to request a sentence enhancement based on the special-skill circumstance, they actually objected to any increase, Cassell said." The Tribune notes, "The judge noted that in 2003, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said any sentencing recommendation by the Justice Department 'must honestly reflect the totality and seriousness of the defendant's conduct and must be fully consistent with the guidelines.' .. .About the same time in 2003, Cassell noted, the Justice Department argued to Congress that judges' failure to comply with the guidelines had resulted in reduced sentences and an erosion of the deterrent value of federal sentencing policy. … 'The court firmly agrees with the generally stated position of the department that a sentencing system that involves ignoring the obvious facts is "neither desirable nor capable of sustaining long-term public confidence,"' Cassell said. … He stressed his criticism is not aimed at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah or the trial attorney assigned to defend Mercer's plea bargain." The Tribune adds, "Assistant Attorney General Eileen J. O'Connor said Thursday that the tax division adheres to 'principles of federal prosecution, including DOJ policies concerning sentencing.'"

DOJ Accuses California Accountant Of Misrepresentation. The North Platte (NE) Telegraph (2/10, Lindenberger) reports, "Lowell Baisden, the California accountant currently under investigation for tax fraud, is being accused of misrepresenting facts in his opposition to a preliminary injunction from the U.S. Department of Justice." The Telegraph continues, "Court documents filed by Baisden's attorneys in December indicated that IRS attorney Kathryn Meyer had verified the legality of Baisden's actions and that she informed IRS agents Baisden had done nothing illegal. … However, Meyer's official declaration, which was filed Feb. 2 by Justice Department attorney Jacqueline Brown, indicate Meyer never made any statement or suggestion that Baisden's scheme was legal. … 'To the contrary ... I determined that Mr. Baisden's scheme is without merit, results in a substantial understatement of his clients' federal income tax liabilities, and that an injunction against Mr. Baisden's continued use of this scheme is essential,' Meyer stated in her declaration." The Telegraph adds, "Thomas Cheung, the IRS agent assigned to investigate Baisden, also stated in an official declaration filed last week that he never told Baisden his tax methods were correct. Yet, Baisden has allegedly hindered the IRS investigation by telling others that Cheung and Meyer had agreed Baisden's methods were proper. … In a reply to Baisden's opposition to the preliminary injunction, Brown said Baisden has admitted to the IRS in prior interviews that he has never requested a formal determination as to the validity of his tax plan. Furthermore, Brown said the IRS has notified Baisden on several occasions that his methods are inaccurate."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

GOP Upset By Waxman's Schedule Of Oversight Hearings. The Washington Times (2/10, Miller, 88K) reports Rep. Henry Waxman's Committee on Oversight and Government Reform "spent the week delving into government waste that ranged from spending in Iraq to federal drug program pricing -- inquests Republicans say mainly provided entertainment but no legislative action. Some of the hearings…were strictly 'a show,' said Rep. Darrell Issa," who "cited the hearing Wednesday with tearful testimony by family members of three civilian security workers killed and mutilated by a Fallujah mob in a widely televised attack in March 2004." Issa "said he hoped the committee would move beyond these hearings and make proposals to curb wasteful government spending, such as rewriting contracting and procurement rules. But the initial hearings -- including one focusing on criticism of how U.S. officials accounted for Iraqi money spent after the fall of dictator Saddam Hussein -- rankled Republicans."

Rangel Reportedly Signs Off On Small Business Tax Cuts. The Hill (2/9, Marre) reports House Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel and ranking member Jim McCrery "said Friday they have reached a deal on a package of tax cuts for small businesses that could smooth the path of a federal minimum wage increase to $7.25. 'This bill strengthens opportunities for small businesses and serves as a symbol of what can happen when Democrats and Republicans work together,' Rangel said in a joint statement."

Bill Would Raise Capital Gains Rate On Children Of Wealthy. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B5, Lueck, 2.04M) reports, "To help fund legislation giving small businesses more than $1 billion in tax breaks, House tax writers propose blocking wealthy people from shifting income to their children." The bill would deny "the dependent children of wealthy people the lowest capital-gains and dividend rates, 5% this year and falling to zero next year. The low rates, available to people in the 10% and 15% tax brackets, 'presumably' were meant to benefit low-income people, according to a House Ways and Means summary. But because they also are available to children of wealthy people, those parents can reduce their own taxes by shifting assets to their children."

House GOP Leadership To Produce Weekly Radio Message. The Hill (2/9, Jacobs) reports on its Web site that House GOP leaders "officially announced Friday that House Republicans will be taping an address this week that will be distributed to hundreds of local and national radio stations across the country. … GOP leaders will use the radio address to outline House Republican positions and respond to the Democratic agenda. Each week, a member of the Republican leadership will tackle a different issue facing Americans."

Pelosi Plane Controversy Caught Eye Of "Muzzled" Republicans. The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Superville) reports on its front House Speaker Nancy Pelosi "went before the House Science Committee [Thursday] morning to champion her commitment to do something about global warming, a rare appearance for a leader of the House. She did so as reports swirled on Capitol Hill that she had requested a bigger, swankier government airplane than her Republican predecessor had used." For Republicans, "feeling muzzled and still down over losing control of the House, the irony was too good to ignore."

Miller Defends Himself Against Allegations Of Tax Fraud. The Washington Post (2/10, A5, Geis, 690K) reports Rep. Gary Miller "defended his reputation this week, as FBI investigators look into charges that he improperly delayed paying taxes on several lucrative land deals." Miller "told fellow House Republicans behind closed doors Tuesday that he 'has done nothing wrong, his business dealings have all been above-board and that these allegations are baseless and have no merit,' his spokesman Scott Toussaint said. The FBI investigation follows an article in the Los Angeles Times and a complaint from the nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics alleging that Miller, a wealthy real estate developer, unlawfully avoided paying taxes on a land deal. … Miller has not been contacted by the IRS or the FBI, Toussaint said. Miller voluntarily turned over documents related to his business to the House ethics committee and to Minority Leader John A. Boehner."

New Congressional Ethics Rules Seen As Unlikely To Be Effective. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/10, A15, 1.16M) Randy Evans, outside counsel to former House Speakers Newt Gingrich and Dennis Hastert, writes, "The Democratic majority in Congress has made ethics reform a centerpiece of its agenda -- and not a moment too soon. … Unfortunately, the latest reforms (some adopted in the House by rule and others proposed by the Senate in legislation) tighten restrictions without actually addressing the real reasons that Congressional ethics rules have been ineffective in the past. The result is tougher rules that will rarely, if ever, be enforced. Here's why. First, regardless of what anyone might claim, there remains no mechanism for policing those at the heart of Congress's ethics problems: lobbyists willing to violate the rules. … Second, even with the new rules, only members of Congress or someone with a member's permission can file a complaint with the House ethics committee. But limiting who can file a complaint effectively precludes any meaningful enforcement."

Marines Ground V-22. The Washington Post (2/10, Merle, 690K) reports, "The Marine Corps said yesterday it was temporarily grounding its fleet of V-22 Osprey tilt rotors after discovering a glitch in a computer chip that could cause the aircraft to lose control. ... It was an unexpected setback for the program; the military last grounded the fleet in 2000 after two fatal crashes that killed 23 Marines."

USAF Academy Investigates Alleged Cadet Cheating. The Washington Post (2/10, A3, Cooperman, 690K) reports, "The Air Force Academy is investigating allegations of cheating by 28 freshmen and has restricted all 4,300 cadets to campus over the weekend, asking them to meet in small groups to consider 'their self-image and the image of the institution,' Air Force officials said yesterday." Cadets said "that the cheating took place on a weekly test that typically includes questions about the chain of command and military jargon." The AP (2/9) says "some cadets admitted obtaining answers to a test and forwarding them through an Internet social group and private computer messages."

NYTimes Criticizes Bush's Efforts On Social Security Reform. The New York Times (2/10, A14, 1.16M) editorializes, "In 2005, President Bush put his political capital where his mouth was, and lost. He went all-out to convince Congress and the American people that privatizing Social Security would be good and necessary. It's neither — and his plan was justifiably and soundly rejected. This year, with his political capital on empty, Mr. Bush is talking about a bipartisan effort to reform Social Security. But his actions suggest that he has no intention of making any serious compromises. In his new budget, Mr. Bush allocates $29.3 billion to establish private accounts in 2012, totaling $637 billion through 2017. That suggests that either Mr. Bush still hasn't figured out that private accounts are a political nonstarter, or he's hoping to use them as a bargaining chip in future negotiations. Either way, that attitude virtually ensures that Social Security reform will stall in this Congress, just as it did when the Republicans were in charge."

Bush's Health Insurance Proposal Said To "Not Go Far Enough." In an op-ed for the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) Henry Aaron of the Brookings Institution writes, "Healthcare analysts have long deplored the linkage between health insurance and employment. … But President Bush's proposed fix does not go far enough." Aaron adds, "So, what is right and what is wrong with the president's plan? What is right is that it would extend to individually purchased insurance a tax break similar to the one now available only on employer-financed coverage. It would do so in a way that would not add to the federal deficit measured over 10 years, although it would boost deficits initially. Unfortunately, the plan would continue the incentive of bigger tax breaks for high earners even though most of the uninsured are low earners. A better plan would be a tax credit that offered the same tax relief per dollar of insurance to people at all income levels. Better still would be offering larger credits to low-income households, which need help, rather than to high-income households, which don't. The bigger problem with the Bush plan is that it would not ensure that people would be able to find insurance at a reasonable price."

Volcker Claims Federal Judges Are Not Compensated Adequately. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A9, 2.04M) former Fed Chairman Paul Volcker writes, 'The simple fact is that judicial compensation has not kept pace with reasonable requirements. … Congress has simply refused to make good on its expressed goal, and has not even provided cost of living adjustments. It has now been 16 years since this last judicial pay raise took full effect. Since that time, average American workers' wages, when adjusted for inflation, have risen 18.5%. During that same period, federal judges' real, inflation-adjusted pay has declined 10.8%, while the pay of most other federal workers, when adjusted for inflation, has risen by 15.1%. The decline in real pay of district judges has dropped by 25% since the earlier 1969 review."

LATimes Pleased By ABA's Decision On Judicial Ethics. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) reports the American Bar Association "is having some sound second thoughts about weakening a key provision of its Model Code of Judicial Conduct, which traditionally has served as a guide to state court systems in setting their own ethics rules. An ABA drafting panel had been criticized — including by this editorial page — for proposing changes that would have diluted a provision saying that judges should avoid even the 'appearance of impropriety.' But now the panel is expected next week to accept a 'friendly amendment' to its own proposal at an ABA meeting in Miami, one that would undo the damage. … Avoiding the appearance of impropriety should remain a commandment for judges, not be demoted to a mere suggestion. The ABA should make clear next week that it has gotten that message."

OTHER NEWS:

Stock Markets Declined Friday. NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 6, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Stocks ended the week on a down note. The Dow was down almost 57 points, Nasdaq was down just under 29. For the week as a whole, the Dow lost nearly 73 points, Nasdaq was down 16 points." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, B1, Browning, 2.04M) says the Dow "pulled back 72.66 points, or 0.57%, to 12580.83 in the week that just ended, including a decline of 56.80 points, or 0.45%, Friday" The S&P 500 "fell 0.71%, or 10.25 points, to 1438.06, still up 1.4% this year," while the Nasdaq "declined 1.16% Friday, or 28.85 points, to 2459.82, ahead 1.8% in 2007."

Fed Could Still Raise Interest Rates. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A4, Derby, 2.04M) reports, "Inflation pressures have clearly not moderated enough to quell Federal Reserve officials' repeated warnings they may yet have to raise rates again. Several policy makers said Friday that while they are optimistic inflationary pressures will wane this year, they nonetheless stand ready to cure too-high price pressures with rate increases, if needed."

Bies Leaving Fed. The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A4, Ives-Halperin, 2.04M) reports Federal Reserve Governor Susan Bies announced she will leave her post at the end of March. She will not attend the March 20-21 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee.

Imam Rises To Prominence Along With Ellison. The New York Times (2/10, B6, Freedman, 1.16M) reports, "On the evening after Minnesota's Democratic primary last September, Makram El-Amin picked up his ringing cellphone to hear the raspy, exhausted voice of Keith Ellison. The men had known each other for a decade, long enough for Mr. El-Amin to become the imam of a mosque in their North Minneapolis neighborhood and Mr. Ellison to win a seat as the area's state representative. … Two months later, Mr. Ellison won election, becoming the first Muslim member of Congress, and doing so in an overwhelmingly non-Muslim district. As for Mr. El-Amin, he was transformed into a congressman's imam, putting an Islamic imprint on the role of spiritual adviser played by such figures as the Rev. Billy Graham for Richard M. Nixon and the Rev. Jesse Jackson for Bill Clinton."

Candidates Opt For Big Events Over Retail Politicking In New Hampshire. The Boston Globe (2/10, Milligan, 413K) writes that while New Hampshire "has long cherished its role as the place where presidential hopefuls test the political waters by campaigning in diners and living rooms," the 2008 field is "choosing instead to go for the big splash." The "huge crowd that showed up to see" Sen. Barack Obama in December, "an event that helped mark Obama as a political phenomenon," may have "pressured other hopefuls to prove their own appeal by drawing standing-room-only crowds. Following big-extravaganza appearances last month" by John Edwards and Rudy Giuliani, Sen. Hillary Rodham "is scheduled to speak today at a gymnasium-sized 'town meeting' in Concord -- an event that filled up two days after it was announced and drew so much advance media attention that Democrats this week offered up interviews with people making signs for the event. Meanwhile, Obama's town meeting scheduled for Monday in Durham is at capacity, with 2,500 free tickets handed out in eight hours. About 850 standby tickets have been given to those hoping to take the place of no-shows."

Obama Expected To Formally Enter Presidential Race Today. Two broadcast networks ran long reports on Sen. Barack Obama on the eve of his formal entry into the presidential race, though print coverage this morning is comparatively light. The CBS Evening News (2/9, story 3, 3:10, Couric, 7.66M) reported Obama "has chosen an historic site to launch what he hopes will be a history-making campaign. Tomorrow, the senator from Illinois will officially announce his candidacy outside the old state Capitol in Springfield, where Abraham Lincoln once served as a legislator." CBS (Borger): "Obama's audacious presidential bid has jump-started Campaign 2008, and it's brought the issue of race front and center. In an exclusive interview with Steve Kroft for 60 Minutes, he confronts it head on." CBS (Kroft): "You think the country's ready for a black president?" Obama: "Yes." Kroft: "You don't think it's going to hold you back?" Obama: "No. You know, I think if I don't win this race, it will be because of other factors. It's going to be because I have not shown to the American people a vision for where the country needs to go that they can embrace."

NBC Nightly News (2/9, story 7, 2:40, Williams, 9.87M) said that while Obama "has never positioned himself as the black candidate," the "question of his race, of course, will continue to be much discussed and debated, especially among African-Americans." NBC (Allen) reported that in seeking black support, "Obama points to his work as a community organizer in poor Chicago neighborhoods like this one and legislation be pushed in the state senate to improve education, housing and end racial profiling. … Obama has said he has wrestled with race and identity much of his race and identity much of his life. No wonder those are issues for the nation and black America as well."

Like the two network pieces, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, Wallsten, 850K) focuses its report on the race issue, headlining a story, "Would Obama Be 'The Black President'?" The Times says "some of the questions arise from Obama's upbringing in Hawaii, remote from the urban struggles of Chicago's black neighborhoods, and from his heritage as the son of a white American mother and black Kenyan father." His "appeal to white voters leaves some black activists questioning the depth of his links to the black community," one scholar said. The AP (2/9, Cohen) says Obama is part of "a new generation of black political leaders -- a generation that never fought off Bull Connor's dogs, or desegregated lunch counters."

The Chicago Tribune (2/10, Pearson, Long, 617K) reports Obama, "using the home of Lincoln's famed 'House Divided' speech as a backdrop," is expected to today "make formal his historic entry into the 2008 presidential campaign, presenting himself as a symbol for a new generation of leadership and politics." To "counter complaints he lacks experience with only two years in the U.S. Senate, Obama planned to open his campaign not far from where he served for eight years in the Illinois General Assembly, where his tenure was notable for his comity and willingness to reach across the aisle." And "in a larger sense, Obama's formal announcement, scheduled for a chilly outdoor makeshift stage at the Old State Capitol on the weekend before Lincoln's birthday, was aimed at assimilating the greater imagery of Lincoln that looms over Springfield, of a man who sought to heal a nation at war with itself, its populace sharply divided." The AP (2/9) says it "will be the start of a long weekend of rallies and events" for Obama "that will take him from Springfield to Iowa and then on to Chicago before he wraps up Monday in New Hampshire." The Financial Times (2/10, Daniel) and BBC.com (2/10, Coomarasamy) also have items on today's campaign announcement.

Obama's "Free Ride" Could Be About To End. Mike Allen writes for The Politico (2/9) that Obama's "free ride is ending. The charismatic Illinois senator has enjoyed a lifetime of hagiography, starting with an 800-word story in The New York Times the day after his election as the first black president of the Harvard Law Review. Now, Obama's about to endure a going-over that would make a proctologist blush. Why has he sometimes said his first name is Arabic, and other times Swahili? Why did he make up names in his first book, as the introduction acknowledges? Why did he say two years ago that he would 'absolutely' serve out his Senate term, which ends in 2011, and that the idea of him running for president this cycle was 'silly' and hype 'that's been a little overblown'? In interviews, strategists in both parties pointed to four big vulnerabilities: Obama's inexperience, the thinness of his policy record, his frank liberalism in a time when the party needs centrist voters and the wealth of targets that are provided by the personal recollections in his first book, from past drug use to conversations that cannot be documented." Allen says "opponents' plans for undoing Obama" are likely to focus on his "inexperience," "anemic policy record," "liberalism," and "disclosures in his books."

Clinton Tied For First In Iowa, Takes Lead In New Hampshire, In Zogby Polls. A Zogby poll of 500 likely Iowa Democratic caucus participants (+/- 4.5%) shows Sen. Hillary Clinton gaining ground, and Tom Vilsack losing support, in the leadoff state. Clinton is backed by 24% of respondents, tied with John Edwards. Sen. Barack Obama is at 18%, Vilsack 9%, and Sen. Joseph Biden 4%. A month ago, Edwards was at 27%, Obama 17%, and Clinton and Vilsack tied at 16% each, with Biden at 3%. In New Hampshire, a Zogby Poll of 500 likely primary participants (+/- 4.5%) shows Clinton moving into the lead, backed by 27% of respondents. Obama is at 23%, Edwards 13%, and Gov. Bill Richardson 3%.

Clinton Says Her Iraq Vote Was "Not A Vote For A Pre-Emptive War." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, DiStaso) reports Sen. Hillary Clinton said in a Friday telephone interview that her "2002 vote for a resolution authorizing the invasion of Iraq was 'not a vote for a pre-emptive war,' but instead a show of support for further United Nations weapons inspections." Clinton, "who has been criticized by hard-line anti-war groups for not apologizing for the vote, emphasized that distinction." Clinton said, "I have taken responsibility for that vote. It was based on the best assessment that I could make at the time, and it was clearly intended to demonstrate support for going to the United Nations to put inspectors into Iraq." Clinton said that "when she explained her vote four years ago, 'I said that it was not a vote for pre-emptive war.'"

Clinton Will Compete In New Hampshire Primary "Whenever It's Held." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, DiStaso) reports Clinton said she "will ignore her own national party's rules and campaign in New Hampshire even if the first-in-the-nation primary is set for a date that does not comply the party's predetermined calendar." Clinton said, "I am going to compete in the New Hampshire primary whenever it's held. I'm excited about it. I want to be part of it. I want to do it the New Hampshire way."

Clinton To Visit South Caroline On February 19. The AP (2/9) reports Clinton "will make her first South Carolina presidential campaign stop on Feb. 19, state Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin said Friday. 'We don't have any of the specific places yet,' Erwin said." News of Clinton's visit comes as Sen. Barack Obama's "plans to come to South Carolina became public. Obama will make stops in Columbia and Orangeburg Feb. 16 and 17, said Anton Gunn, Obama's new state political director."

Edwards No Longer Has Lock On Trial Lawyers' Support. The Washington Post (2/10, A4, Mosk, 690K) writes that while in 2004, John Edwards "had the powerful support and deep pockets of the nation's trial lawyers behind him," this time he "no longer has a lock on the backing of the lawyers" and "will be battling it out with others in the Democratic field, who are seen as sympathetic to plaintiffs and their attorneys." Attorney Thomas Girardi, who was finance co-chairman of the 2004 Edwards campaign, said that then, Edwards "was a much better candidate for the issues we care deeply about." But in this cycle, Edwards and Sens. Joseph Biden, Hillary Clinton, and Barack Obama "all are very positive in terms of the philosophical view. So you have a different situation with respect to our support." But Edwards "continues to work hard to win over trial lawyers. 'He's getting good support from them,' campaign spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said. 'I wouldn't read too much into the leanings of any one person.'"

Vilsack Says He Will Win Iowa Caucuses. Tom Vilsack said on Fox News' Hannity and Colmes (2/9), "This is sort of like now we're going through the 'American Idol' stage of this primary process. There are rock stars and then there are rock-solid candidates. I put myself in the rock-solid category. The reality is the early polls mean absolutely nothing. Certainly, they don't mean much in Iowa. If that were the case, Joe Lieberman would have been nominated as a Democratic nominee. I'm very well positioned to win in Iowa. We have a great organization, seven field offices and over 1,000 people have signed cards saying they're going to caucus for me…and we're going to win."

The AP (2/9, Glover) says that in a conference call with reporters, Vilsack said, "This is a marathon. In essence you have to peak at the right time. … As of today, we are the only campaign in Iowa that has field offices operating."

Vilsack Says Congress Should Cut Off War Funding. In a Washington Post (2/10, 690K) op-ed, Vilsack writes, "Given the increased violence this year, America is on pace to lose more than 1,000 soldiers in Iraq. Over 23,000 American soldiers have been wounded since the war began, nearly 6,000 each year. It is time for us to clearly say that our troops must be brought home now. … Congress has the constitutional ability and the moral responsibility to pass legislation cutting off funding for the status quo."

Giuliani Said To Be Redefining Stance On Abortion. The New York Times (2/10, Rivera, 1.16M) reports on its front page that Rudy Giuliani's "belief in abortion rights" is seen by many as a possible impediment to his capturing of the Republican presidential nomination. But "in recent weeks, as he has courted voters in South Carolina and talked to conservative media outlets," Giuliani "has highlighted a different element of his thinking on the abortion debate. He has talked about how he would appoint 'strict constructionist' judges to the Supreme Court. … The effect has been to distance himself from a position favoring abortion rights that he espoused when he ran for mayor of New York City, where most voters favor abortion rights." For Giuliani, "a Brooklyn-born Roman Catholic who once considered entering the priesthood," the abortion issue "has been a source of discomfort throughout his political career."

Giuliani To Address California GOP Convention Today. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/10, Marinucci, Wildermuth, 384K) reports on its front page that Giuliani "has all the qualities of a Republican who could appeal to voters in blue-state California: He is pro-choice, pro-gay rights and a defender of stricter gun-control laws," but those "moderate positions on social issues rankle the GOP conservatives who represent the backbone of his party's activists" in the state. Giuliani will today address the California state GOP convention in Sacramento, "marking his first major address since he announced the establishment of an exploratory committee for president." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Finnegan, 850K) says for Giuliani, "California plays an increasingly large part in his calculus for winning the Republican nomination. It is one of several big states on the verge of advancing their 2008 presidential primaries to Feb. 5, a shift that enhances the election climate for Giuliani. Among other effects, the calendar change heightens the importance of celebrity, giving an edge to Giuliani" and Sen. John McCain.

McCain "Remains A Wealthy Man," FEC Disclosure Report Shows. The Washington Post (2/10, A6, Mosk, 690K) reports Sen. John McCain's latest financial disclosure report shows that while some land he owns "slipped in value last year," he "remains a wealthy man, largely because of investments and holdings controlled by his wife, Cindy." The required Federal Election Commission forms "allow him to report the value of holdings within broad ranges, making his net worth difficult to calculate with confidence. Previous reports have put it at roughly $15 million. Most of that money stems from his wife, the millionaire daughter of an Arizona beer magnate."

McCain Campaign Opens Michigan Headquarters. The Grand Rapids Press (2/10, Murray) reports "some of Michigan's best-known Republicans, including Attorney General Mike Cox and U.S. Rep. Fred Upton, threw their support" behind McCain at the opening of his state headquarters Friday.

Giuliani, McCain To Raise Funds In Virginia Next Week. The Richmond Times-Dispatch (2/10, Hardin) reports Rudy Giuliani and Sen. John McCain will each "be in Richmond next week seeking financial support for their campaigns." Former gubernatorial candidate Jerry Kilgore, who "is expected to lead Giuliani's campaign in Virginia," will host the Giuliani event.

Romney Addresses Alabama Republicans. The AP (2/9) reports Mitt Romney "brought his presidential campaign to Alabama Friday night, and he sought to dispel any concerns about his past views on social issues." He told Montgomery Republicans that he is opposed to same-sex marriage and said the "Roe versus Wade mentality cheapens the dignity of human life." Gov. Bob Riley "attended the event and called Romney the 'quintessential candidate.'"

Huckabee Says Current Conflict Is "World War III." The New Hampshire Union Leader (2/10, Whitson) reports Mike Huckabee "delivered a wide-ranging speech to about 40 people, many of them business leaders," at Daniel Webster College in Nashua Friday, and said the "next President has to recognize the war in Iraq's true gravity." Huckabee said, "We need to understand that this is, in fact, World War III." Ex-Rep. Charlie Bass was among the attendees, but "stopped well short of offering his endorsement. 'I'm remaining uncommitted at this point,' he said."

Huckabee Defends Traditional Definition Of Marriage. In an interview with the AP (2/9, Elliott) following the speech, Huckabee, "in response to questions about whether Vice President Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter should have the right to wed," said marriage "shouldn't be treated as an experiment." Huckabee said "heterosexual marriages face enough challenges without adding new configurations to the mix." He "declined to comment on Mary Cheney's decision" to have a child, saying, "I wouldn't get near specific cases."

Perry Consultant Says Texas Governor Has No National Ambitions. The Houston Chronicle (2/10, Elliott, 530K) reports Gov. Rick Perry's chief political consultant, Dave Carney, said Perry "has no interest in national politics and may seek re-election in 2010." Carney said "speculation that recent decisions by Perry, including his mandate that middle-school girls be inoculated against a sexually transmitted virus linked to cervical cancer, are designed to raise the governor's profile nationally is 'one of the most retarded things about the political observers in Texas.'"

WSJournal Considers "Wide-Open Republican Race." The Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M) editorializes, "Now is the season of Republican discontent, extending even to the party's Presidential candidates. For the first time in decades, no dominant candidate has emerged and GOP voters seem to be in a Missouri state of mind: Show us what you really believe. We know exactly how they feel. John McCain has been considered the front-runner," and "his fortitude on Iraq has been all the more impressive since the war has become unpopular and threatens the media adulation he has long enjoyed. Tenacity is a Presidential asset, especially in dangerous times. But among many Republicans, Mr. McCain is also paying a price for his years as a policy 'maverick.'" Mitt Romney "has shown he can win votes in a blue state, and he was successful both as a capitalist and as manager of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics," but he "is something of an empty policy slate." As for Rudy Giuliani, "a Northeasterner who favors gun control and abortion rights isn't supposed to have a Ralph Nader's chance in the GOP primaries. Yet today Mr. Giuliani leads in the national polls and is all but tied with Mr. McCain in New Hampshire. Some of this is no doubt due to name recognition after his 9/11 heroics. On the other hand, maybe cultural conservatives aren't the single-issue voters of media lore. Mr. Giuliani can point to the revival of the previously ungovernable New York, and his temerity and experience in a crisis are qualities that voters look for in a Commander-in-Chief. … All in all, this looks like the most wide-open Republican race in years. That may be a good thing if it forces the candidates to battle over ideas and revive the GOP reform agenda that got lost in the fog of the 109th Congress."

Harvard Chooses First Female President. The Washington Post (2/10, Strauss, Kinzie, 690K) reports on its front page that Harvard University "is about to name its first woman president since its founding in 1636, tapping a Civil War historian to succeed Lawrence Summers, whose tumultuous tenure was marked by controversial remarks about women and clashes with faculty members. Drew Gilpin Faust, 59, dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study and a leading historian on the American South, will be formally appointed president as early as this weekend, according to a source with knowledge of the decision." The New York Times (2/10, Rimer, Finder, 1.16M), also on the front page, says Summers "turned to Dr. Faust two years ago to help calm the furor over his remarks about women in math, engineering and science. He asked her to oversee two committees he created to come up with ways to recruit, retain and promote women in those fields at Harvard."

The Boston Globe (2/10, A1, Bombardieri, Sacchetti, 413K), Los Angeles Times (2/10, Paddock, Trounson, 850K), Financial Times (2/10, Knight), Philadelphia Inquirer (2/10, A1, Kerkstra, Matza, Woodall, 385K), and Wall Street Journal (2/10, A2, Hechinger, Golden, 2.04M) are among the major newspapers with prominent stories on the pick; ABC World News (2/9, story 4, Gibson, 8.78M) ran a brief item on the Faust choice.

Ex-President Bush Friends With Television Actress. The Washington Post (2/10, C3, 690K) "Names & Faces" column writes, "Eyebrows hit the roof earlier this week when Teri Hatcher, 42, and George H.W. Bush, 82, were spotted lunching together in Beverly Hills. Shots of the twosome chatting and kissing goodbye -- on the cheek, folks -- in the Los Angeles Country Club's parking lot have surfaced all over the Web." The two have been friends since they were seated together at a Las Vegas hotel opening several years ago, and Hatcher and her daughter "visited the Bush compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, last year, Bush spokeswoman Jean Becker told us yesterday." Becker said, "They enjoy each other's company. … It's not about politics -- they have a very personal and friendly relationship."

Schwarzenegger Initiatives Seen As Part Of Productive Devolution Of Power. In an op-ed for the New York Times (2/10, A15, 1.16M) Gar Alperovitz, professor of political economy at the University of Maryland, writes Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "seems to have grasped the essential truth that no nation — not even the United States — can be managed successfully from the center once it reaches a certain scale. Moreover, the bold proposals that Mr. Schwarzenegger is now making for everything from universal health care to global warming point to the kind of decentralization of power which, once started, could easily shake up America's fundamental political structure. … California's governor has also put his finger on a little discussed flaw in America's constitutional formula. The United States is almost certainly too big to be a meaningful democracy."

States' Chambers Of Commerce Accused Of Embracing Big Government. In the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M), Stephen Moore writes, "The Chamber of Commerce, long a supporter of limited government and low taxes, was part of the coalition backing the Reagan revolution in the 1980s. On the national level, the organization still follows a pro-growth agenda -- but thanks to an astonishing political transformation, many chambers of commerce on the state and local level have been abandoning these goals. They're becoming, in effect, lobbyists for big government. … In as many as half the states, state taxpayer organizations, free market think tanks and small business leaders now complain bitterly that, on a wide range of issues, chambers of commerce deploy their financial resources and lobbying clout to expand the taxing, spending and regulatory authorities of government . This behavior, they note, erodes the very pro-growth climate necessary for businesses -- at least those not connected at the hip with government -- to prosper."

North Korea Nuclear Deal Could Be Unveiled This Weekend. The New York Times (2/10, Yardley, Sanger, 1.16M) reports the US and North Korea "appeared on Friday to be inching closer to a deal that would establish a schedule for the North to shut down and seal its main nuclear facilities within two months, in return for shipments of fuel oil from South Korea and the beginning of talks over normalization of relations with Washington." However, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill "cautioned that the two sides remained stuck on 'one or two' small issues." The Times says the White House and the State Department "were preparing for a major announcement this weekend, and described the agreement as very different from the" 1994 Agreed Framework. An Administration source told the Times, "This is the Libya model."

AFP (2/10, Kwanwoo, Sato) reports comments by Hill that "a deal that would see North Korea take the first steps towards ending its nuclear weapons programme is close but hurdles remain." He "said envoys to the talks had agreed on a range of fundamental issues, after host China circulated a draft accord that outlined steps member nations would take to begin the process of North Korea disarming." But in more negative tones, the AP (2/10, Chang) headlines its coverage, "North Korea Nuclear Deal In Trouble," saying negotiators in Beijing "struggled Friday to find a compromise as differences emerged over a Chinese proposal on how to begin the disarmament process."

American Tapped As UN Political Affairs Head. The New York Times (2/10, Hoge, 1.16M) reports, "Stirred by criticism of the slow pace of senior appointments, Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, on Friday named four new cabinet members, including an American diplomat, while keeping a dozen other senior officials in place." Ambassador B. Lynn Pascoe "becomes under secretary general for political affairs, a delicate position in United Nations efforts to mediate disputes in international trouble spots. Mr. Pascoe, a Chinese speaker, has extensive experience in Asia." In addition, Japan's Kiyotaka Akasaka will become under secretary general for communications and public information. France's Jean-Marie Guéhenno will remain under secretary general for peacekeeping operations. On its front page, the Washington Times (2/10, A1, Pisik, 88K) says Pascoe's appointment was part of "a sweeping management shake-up that promises to boost the United States' voice in the organization's diplomacy and peace-making efforts." The moves were "part of a broad reorganization of top management by" Ban.

Palestinian Unity Government May Not Satisfy Aid Resumption Requirements. Continuing coverage of the Hamas-Fatah unity government agreement focuses today on domestic Palestinian and international reaction. Under the headline, "In Palestinian Peace Deal, Hope and a Political Snare," the New York Times (2/10, Erlanger, 1.16M) says the deal "was greeted with relief by many Palestinians on Friday as their best hope for an end" months of fighting. However, "it poses a challenge for the Bush administration" because of the three Quartet-endorsed benchmarks. "Without the three -- and the Mecca accord does not accept them -- an international boycott on the Palestinians would continue."

In a front-page piece on the impact of the deal on Israel, the Washington Times (2/10, Mitnick, 88K) reports, "Officials from Hamas and Israel dashed hopes yesterday that a Palestinian unity deal reached in the Saudi holy city of Mecca would end a crippling economic embargo or lead to a resumption of Palestinian-Israeli peace talks." A key Hamas leader "urged militant groups to resume attacks on Israel and denied that Hamas would respect past peace deals with the Jewish state -- a central element of the accord." Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni "told a security conference in Munich that Hamas remained dedicated to Israel's destruction," and "a top lawmaker in the ruling Kadima party said the accord falls short of conditions set by the international community to lift an economic embargo against the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority."

The Washington Post (2/10, A13, Kessler, 690K) says the Administration is "wary" of the deal because it "could divide Washington and its allies" and "affect" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's upcoming trip to the region. The accord, to which the Administration "reacted cautiously," "threatens to expose divisions between the United States and its European allies while complicating" Rice's "peace mission later this month." Rice "is preparing for a major plunge in Middle East peacemaking, meeting with Abbas and [Olmert] to begin sketching the contours of a Palestinian state. This week, Rice met with Israeli, Egyptian and Palestinian envoys in preparation for the summit, and U.S. officials said yesterday that she remains committed to her plans."

The AP (2/10, Gearan) titles its coverage, "U.S. Cautious On Palestinian Accord." Washington "and other world powers avoided endorsing a planned political bargain between warring Palestinian factions Friday, saying it was too soon to say if the new government will meet international conditions for legitimacy and financial aid. " Administration officials "said little in public beyond careful praise for Saudi Arabia's role in bringing the two factions together. Behind the scenes, officials did not sound optimistic that the deal can end Palestinian violence or a year-old international boycott." AFP (2/10) focuses its report on continued Quartet insistence that any Palestinian government recognize Israel.

WPost Assails US "Ineptitude," Ineffective Policy. In an editorial today, the Washington Post (2/10, A16, 690K) says the accord could "prevent the eruption of another civil war in the Middle East. Saudi Arabia, which hosted the talks, can also hope that its diplomacy -- and the reported promise of $1 billion in aid to the new government -- will begin to draw the Sunni Hamas movement away from its alliance with Shiite Iran. All that would be decidedly to the good." However, it is "considerably more uncertain" whether the deal with foster Israeli-Palestinian cooperation. The "accord has confounded an already confused U.S. policy in the Middle East." Saudi leaders have "stepped into the diplomatic vacuum created by American policy and brokered a deal across a divide that only the Bush administration and Israel perceived; as the Saudis see it, the dividing line in the region is sectarian, not ideological. Unable to embrace the Palestinian accord but reluctant to offend a Saudi ally it has been counting on for help against Iran, the Bush administration adopted an awkward wait-and-see position. As events unfold in the coming days, it will watch from the sidelines, to which it has been relegated by its own ineptitude."

Israeli Renovation Project Sparks Rioting In Jerusalem. ABC World News (2/9, story 4, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "In the Middle East, Jerusalem, fierce clashes between Israeli police and Palestinians on the area known to Jews as the Temple Mount and to Muslims as the A Haram al Sharif, where they believe Muhammad began his journey to heaven." The New York Times (2/10, A8, Myre, 1.16M) reports, "Israeli troops charged onto the grounds of Jerusalem's most contentious religious site on Friday and fired tear gas and stun grenades at stone-throwing Palestinians who were protesting Israeli excavation work taking place nearby. The confrontation…marked the fourth straight day of Palestinian protests against Israel's renovation of a 50-yard walkway leading up to the compound, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount."

The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Wilson, 690K) notes, "Palestinians clashed with Israeli police Friday at one of this city's holiest sites and demonstrated across the West Bank to protest a construction project Israel has begun near a pair of venerated mosques." Notably, "the foreign minister of Indonesia, the world's most populous Islamic nation, demanded that Israel immediately halt the work near the al-Aqsa mosque and Dome of the Rock, where Muslims believe the prophet Muhammad ascended to Heaven, the third-holiest site in Islam." The Washington Times/AP (2/10, Hadid) adds, "Protests spread across the Arab world, with demonstrators accusing Israel of plotting to harm Islamic shrines. Israeli officials accused Palestinians of distorting the project to rally their fractious population against the Jewish state. They insist that the replacement of the ramp, which was damaged in a 2004 snowstorm, would not harm the holy site about 200 feet away."

Hezbollah Demands Return Of Weapons Seized By Lebanese Government. The New York Times (2/10, A8, 1.16M) reports Hezbollah "acknowledged Friday that it owned a truckload of arms seized Thursday by Lebanese customs authorities in an East Beirut suburb and demanded their return." The group's leaders "insisted that the movement of the arms did not violate the militants' accord with the government." However, Defense Minister Elias Murr "said the Lebanese Army intended to keep the weapons and pledged to use them against Israel if needed. Lebanese and Israeli soldiers exchanged fire across the border on Wednesday for the first time in decades."

Russia Criticizes US Missile Defense Plans. The New York Times (2/10, A7, Shanker, 1.16M) reports, "Russia's defense minister chose a NATO session here on Friday for a pre-emptive verbal assault on American plans to base elements of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe." Sergei Ivanov "argued that there was no rationale for basing American antimissile radars and interceptors in former Soviet satellite states that have now joined the NATO alliance." He "warned that Russia could easily overwhelm the small defensive system under consideration." The Financial Times (2/10, Dombey, Sevastopulo, Buckley) reports, "Ivanov's comments came after Russia's army chief of staff warned that expansion of the US military presence in Russia's traditional zones of influence was a serious security threat. ... Earlier this week, Mr Ivanov announced a big increase in military spending to fund a new generation of intercontinental ballistic missiles, nuclear submarines and aircraft carriers."

The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Spiegel, 850K) reports that Ivanov said "the plan to base interceptor rockets and radars in Poland and the Czech Republic appeared to be aimed at shooting down Russian weapons." He countered "U.S. arguments that the Europe-based system was needed to destroy North Korean missiles, adding that American claims Iran posed a threat to Europe were equally specious."

Litvinenko's Allies Believe KGB-Successor Assassinated Him. The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Murphy, Rotella, 850K) carries claims by friends of Alexander Litvinenko who "have pieced together their own picture of how the former agent died. … Based on their conversations with Litvinenko as he lay dying, their own contacts in the world of former KGB agents, and their meetings as witnesses with police investigators, these Russians believe Litvinenko's slaying was…a punishment for betrayal from an organization that forgets nothing." Litvinenko's colleagues in London "believe that the true killer may have been a tall, elusive Russian man known only as Vladislav who shows up on airport surveillance videos and was briefly present during Litvinenko's fatal lunch, then disappeared without a trace."

Polish Town Seeks Reagan Statue To Replace Communist Monument. AFP (2/9) reports, "Opponents of Poland's former communist regime reportedly want to pay a posthumous homage" to President Reagan by "erecting his statue in the place of a Soviet-era monument." A group of activists once opposed to the communist-era government said in a letter to the mayor of Katowice "that the staunchly anti-communist Reagan had been a 'symbol of liberty'" and therefore deserves "to become the centrepiece of the city's Freedom Square, replacing a monument to the Soviet troops who drove out the occupying Nazis in 1945."

profiles French Socialist presidential candidate Segolene Royal. "Many senior members of her Socialist Party aren't sure whether to call Ms. Royal's campaign a bold or amateurish foray into the hallowed halls of French presidential politics." Over the past two years, her "crowd-pleasing proposals and glamorous looks have transformed her from a back-bench Socialist politician into one of the two front-runners for France's highest office." That "rapid rise speaks to the growing disconnect in France, and throughout much of Europe, between an aging generation of leaders and voters who feel their economic and social concerns are going unheard." Royal "has come this far by tossing ideology out the window and by selling her personality instead of her beliefs, a phenomenon rarely seen in continental Europe."

UN Peacekeepers Seize Haitian Slum, Fail To Capture Key Gang Leader. On its front page today, the New York Times (2/10, Lacey, 1.16M) details recent efforts by Haitian President Rene Preval and UN peacekeepers to combat street gangs in Port-au-Prince. "With a disbanded army and a corrupted wreck of a police force, successive presidents have either used the gangs against political rivals or just bought them off. Recently, something extraordinary has occurred. [Preval] decided to take on the gangs and set the 8,000 United Nations peacekeepers loose on them, a risky move that will determine the security of the country and the success of his young government." Preval "has grown increasingly impatient with the gangs as they resisted surrendering their guns and continued wreaking havoc on" the capital.

The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Roig-Franzia, 690K) notes, "U.N. troops fought a block-by-block gun battle with gangs in one of this capital's notorious slums Friday, in the force's largest offensive since being deployed here in 2004." Two peacekeepers and several gang members "were injured in heavy fighting that sent the loud clap of automatic weapons fire into the air above Cite Soleil, where poverty is rampant and canals serve as open sewers." While Haiti "has a notoriously corrupt and dysfunctional justice system," officials claim "a special team of prosecutors and judges has been identified by" Preval "to handle high-profile cases." BBC.com (2/10) titles its coverage, "UN Troops Flood Into Haiti Slum."

LATimes Sees "Faint Pulse" Of Venezuelan Democracy Despite Chavez. In an editorial, the Los Angeles Times (2/10, 850K) says Venezuela today is "a place where democracy is a little more nonbinding than elsewhere." The recent move by National Assembly members to vote "themselves into irrelevance" eliminated Chavez's "need to even use [their] rubber stamp" to pass legislation. He "is expected to use his powers to, among other frightening things, do away with presidential term limits so he can remain in office indefinitely." Noting opposition comparisons of Chavez's action to Hitler's in the early 1930s, the Times says "democracy still has a faint pulse in Venezuela," because "any Chavez decree can theoretically be overturned by public referendum, as long as opponents gather signatures from 5% of the electorate." Chavez, "destructive as his economic policies will eventually be to Venezuela, is no Hitler. Now Mussolini, on the other hand …"

Indian Economic Leaders Work To Stave Off "Inflationary Spiral." Under the headline, "India Finds Its Economy On The Verge Of Overheating," the New York Times (2/10, C1, Bradsher, 1.16M) reports, "With breakneck growth, an outsourcing industry that leads the world and hundreds of millions of consumers demanding more class and comfort, India has an economy many countries would envy." However, "signs of a potentially dangerous inflationary spiral are beginning to emerge. Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and his closest economic advisors gathered just last weekend over fears that India's extraordinary economic expansion was starting to overheat, an issue they labeled as a 'key short-term priority.'" The Times says Singh "may have waited too long." While "inflation in India remains much lower than" elsewhere, "prices are rising more than twice as fast as in China, India's archrival for foreign investment and economic leadership among emerging markets. Prices are also increasing considerably faster than in industrialized countries."

Expanding Economy Having Little Effect On Child Malnutrition. A separate New York Times (2/10, A7, Sengupta, 1.16M) piece notes, "Even after India's years of sustained economic growth, child malnutrition rates are comparable to some of the poorest countries, and at times worse." A government report released yesterday claims that "nearly half" of all children under three years of age "are clinically underweight, the most reliable measure of malnutrition. Additionally troubling, the incidence of child malnutrition declined only one percentage point, to 46 percent, in seven years" despite annual economic growth rates of six to eight percent.

WSJournal Pans Thai Actions On Pharmaceuticals. In an editorial today entitled, "Theft In Thailand," the Wall Street Journal (2/10, A8, 2.04M) assails the Thai government's IPR policies. "By seizing patents for HIV/AIDS treatments and heart disease, Thailand has asserted that governments have the right to take intellectual property whenever they please." Recent actions to produce local generics "may be technically legal. The WTO language on compulsory licensing is regrettably vague, and doesn't list specific causes for which governments can seize private patents." However, Thailand "did not bother to consult prior to issuing the compulsory licenses, and the drug companies woke up to read about it in the papers. So it clearly breached the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 31." It is "anyone's guess" how the Thai government will provide more value for drug consumers.

China's Hu Encounters Some Opposition During Africa Tour. An analysis piece in the New York Times (2/10, A3, Wines, 1.16M) examines the "resistance" met by Chinese President Hu Jintao during the Africa trip he completed yesterday. Calling the "reality" of the Chinese global "juggernaut" "more nuanced" than previously thought, the Times says the "visit tested a basic tenet of China's economic relations: that business is business, and what a partner nation's people think about it is not China's — or the world's — preoccupation." While Hu "met his share of flag-waving supporters, of course, and the official parts of his trip — the meetings and agreement-signings with heads of state — were a diplomatic and commercial success," the Times says "an undercurrent of disquiet accompanied Mr. Hu's barnstorming. Mostly, it came not from heads of state, but from the people they rule, some of whom resent China's growing influence [across the continent] — for economic, racial and ideological reasons."

South Africa's Mbeke Acknowledges Growing Concern About Crime. The Washington Post (2/10, A12, Timberg, 690K) notes South African President Thabo Mbeki "sought to reassure worried South Africans that his government is stepping up its fight against crime but offered little new detail on how it can curb levels of rape, robbery and murder that are among the highest in the world." The Post cites "weeks of rising political pressure amid a string of high-profile attacks," and says his remarks yesterday "went further than he had before in acknowledging that levels of violent crime terrify many South Africans. He avoided quibbling over whether rates are rising or falling, or by how much -- an approach that provoked a sharp backlash after an interview last month." The Los Angeles Times (2/10, Dixon, 850K) says Mbeki has been "engulfed by a tide of public anger over violent crime." His remarks "acknowledged … that the government needed to work harder to eradicate what he called an 'ugly and repulsive' scourge."

Branson, Gore Join On $25 Million Global Warming Challenge. Major media report businessman Richard Branson's offer of "a $25 million prize Friday to anyone who can come up with a way to blunt global climate change by removing at least a billion tons of carbon dioxide a year from the Earth's atmosphere," as the Washington Post (2/10, A13, Sullivan, 690K) described it. Branson "said the prize was similar to cash inducements that led to some of history's most notable achievements in navigation, exploration and industry," and further "pledged to invest $3 billion in profits from his transportation companies … to fighting global warming." He appeared with former Vice President Al Gore, who "will serve as a judge in the contest, known as the Virgin Earth Challenge." Gore "said he hoped the contest would spur scientific innovation without distracting from more practical steps people can take to battle global warming, from using energy-efficient light bulbs to pressuring politicians to confront 'the crisis of our time.'" The New York Times (2/10, C3, Kanter, 1.16M) says Branson "urged governments to match the prize money he offered. He spoke of past efforts to encourage leaps forward in technologies," while Gore "said the prize was intended for a project that would be different from technologies currently under development that capture and store large amounts of carbon dioxide from heavy emitters like coal-fired electric plants."

TERRORISM NEWS:

5 Held In Plot To Kill British Soldier (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 9 — With sirens wailing and streets blocked off to permit its passage, a convoy of police vehicles sped across Britain and wound through central London on Friday to bring five terrorism suspects to court here from Birmingham.

A sixth suspect, who was identified by [a news organization] as Basiru Gassama, 29, was charged with a terrorism offense in Birmingham on Friday evening, the police said.

The six were among nine Muslims seized nine days ago in a roundup of suspects in Birmingham linked to an alleged conspiracy to capture a Muslim British soldier and show images of his killing on the Internet. The three other suspects have been released without charge.

Of the five who faced terrorism charges in court on Friday, only one, Parviz Khan, 36, was specifically charged with engaging "in conduct to give effect to his intention to kidnap and kill a member of the British armed forces." The charge made no direct reference to the Internet.

The four others — Amjad Mahmood, 31, Mohammed Irfan, 30, Zahoor Iqbal, 29, and Hamid Elasmar, 43 — were charged along with Mr. Khan with planning to supply equipment and money in the knowledge that it might be used for an act of terrorism.

Mr. Mahmood was also charged with failing to disclose information that might have helped prevent an act of terrorism.

The charges were brought under British antiterrorism laws enacted in 2000 and 2006.

The arrest of the nine suspects in Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, stirred worries and anger among many Muslims, who said they believed that the police action and extensive coverage by television and newspapers had further stigmatized Islam. One of the three men released after the arrests said Britain had become a police state for Muslims.

Some Islamic leaders in Birmingham sought on Friday to calm passions by appealing to Muslims to "remain dignified and have a calm attitude," in the words of Mohammad Naseem, the chairman of Birmingham's Central Mosque. But others said the city's Muslims, about 15 percent of the population of one million, were still cautiously waiting to see the outcome of the whole affair.

The Birmingham police said their inquiry had made great strides. "Nine days ago I told you that we were in the foothills of a major investigation," David Shaw, the assistant chief constable in charge of the Birmingham investigation, told reporters. "We have made extraordinary progress in that time, but it would be wrong of me to leave you thinking that this is any sense a completed inquiry."

Mr. Shaw said Muslims in Birmingham "have fed back to us the frustration and damage experienced by the way some of the media have labeled them through their reporting."

By contrast, he said, local people had given "fantastic support" to police officers.

"Contrary to much of the reporting about the area, we have seen real leadership from all sections of the community, who have not only supported us but have also publicly supported our search for the truth," he said.

The five suspects who appeared in court on Friday were ordered to be held until a hearing on Feb. 23. The police in Birmingham said the case had been referred to a London court under protocols covering terrorism cases.

In a separate hearing, Abu Izzadeen, an outspoken convert to Islam who was arrested Thursday, was released on bail on Friday after being charged with encouraging terrorism in a speech last year.

6 Charged In Alleged Terror Plot In Britain (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

DOJ_NMG_0130809

LONDON, Feb. 9 -- British police charged six men arrested in Birmingham last week with terrorism-related offenses Friday, officially alleging for the first time that the suspects were plotting to kidnap and kill a British soldier.

Parviz Khan, 36, is accused of leading the plot with help from four other men arrested in pre-dawn raids last week and charged with providing equipment and funding for the plan: Mohammed Irfan, 30; Zahoor Iqbal, 29; Hamid Elasmar, 43; and Amjad Mahmood, 31. All five appeared in a London courtroom Friday and were ordered held until a Feb. 23 hearing.

The sixth suspect, Basiru Gassama, 29, was charged with failing to inform authorities about the plot, which is a crime under Britain's Terrorism Act. He is due to appear in a London court Saturday.

David Shaw, spokesman for the West Midlands police, said police had recovered 4,500 pieces of evidence, including computers and mobile phones, that point to "the stark reality of what was being planned in our midst."

The plot, reportedly involving the kidnap, torture and murder of a Muslim soldier in the British army, is widely seen as a new kind of extremist threat in Britain. Since bomb attacks on the London public transit system that killed 52 passengers and four bombers in July 2005, police have repeatedly broken up alleged plots to commit large-scale attacks, including an alleged plan last summer to blow up commercial jetliners traveling from Britain to the United States.

For many Britons, the plot to kill a soldier -- and, according to the media, post video of the execution on the Internet -- has had worrisome echoes of violence that until now had been common in Iraq but unheard-of in Europe or the United States.

Police arrested nine people last week, including three who were released without charge. British police may hold terrorism suspects for up to 28 days without charge with a judge's approval.

One of the men, Abu Bakr, told reporters after he was released that Britain had become a "police state for Muslims."

"It's not a police state for everybody else because these terror laws are designed specifically for Muslims, and that's quite an open fact," said Bakr, a university student who works in an Islamic bookstore that was raided by police. He said his week-long detention was "going to affect me for the rest of my life."

Bakr's comments mirror a widespread feeling among Britain's nearly 2 million Muslims that they are being unfairly targeted by police and government policies. Many believe that the actions of some religious extremists have cast unwarranted suspicion on the wider Muslim community, pointing to last year's arrest of two brothers in the Forest Gate section of London in a suspected chemical weapons plot. After a high-profile police raid, in which one of the brothers was shot by police, the men were released without charge.

Prime Minister Tony Blair called the description of Britain as a police state "categorically wrong."

"We live in a democracy, and what we are sadly having to fight at the moment is people who seek to destroy the very basis of our democracy," Straw said in Parliament this week.

Also Friday, government officials announced that they had ordered the closure of an Islamic school in Sussex, southeast of London, that was raided in September as part of an anti-terrorism operation. Government education officials said the Jameah Islameah school had been closed for failure to meet government standards for independent schools.

The school, set in the countryside on 54 acres of land, was searched by scores of police in an operation in which 14 people were arrested in London. Media reports at the time said the school might have been used by radicals trying to recruit and train violent extremists. Police on Friday said 12 of those arrested were charged with terror-related offenses and are awaiting trial. Two were released without charge.

Padilla Is Competent to Face Terror Trial, Prosecutors Say

MIAMI -- An evaluation of suspected al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons has found him competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, government attorneys said in court documents filed Friday.

Padilla 36, can understand the court proceedings and communicate with his attorneys, according to prosecutors' description of the report's conclusions.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, contends that he was tortured in custody. His attorneys say he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, which raises questions about his competence for trial, allegations that federal officials reject.

A competency hearing is set for next Friday.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Homeland Budget Called Inadequate (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

The chairman of a House committee yesterday challenged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to explain how his agency's budget was adequate to guard against a terrorist attack or another Katrinalike disaster, saying "we cannot continue to protect the homeland on the cheap."

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said President Bush's proposed $35 billion Homeland Security budget does not address necessary funding for key programs and leaves the nation vulnerable to terrorists and natural disasters.

"Millions of lives are at stake," Mr. Thompson said.

Rep. Peter T. King of New York, the committee's ranking Republican, also questioned whether the department's budgeting process needed revamping, saying agency officials were basing spending increases on a 2003 budget "guesstimate" when the agency was formed.

"Should we, rather than work within the box, create a larger box?" Mr. King asked, noting that White House spokesman Tony Snow said on Thursday the administration was trying to do the best it could with scarce resources.

"If we're at war with Islamic terrorism, the resources for Homeland Security should not be scarce," he said. "It should not be just another Cabinet department. ... With a $2.9 trillion budget, we should be able to find a few billion more for homeland security. Either we're at war with Islamic terrorism or we're not."

Both lawmakers also expressed concern over what they called a delay in implementing a $1 billion communications system for emergency workers. They described the program as "critical" to the nation's first responders in the event of a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

"The inability to communicate hampers the ability to respond to an event and creates further confusion," Mr. King said. "I'm equally concerned by the delay in getting the administration of this grant program up and running."

In his second appearance before Congress in two days to defend the budget, Mr. Chertoff noted it represented an 8 percent increase over last year and again described the 2008 budget proposal as "sound, simple and ample."

"It reflects the president's very strong commitment ... to continuing to make sure we have the tools and resources that we need to enhance our security but in a way that balances our freedom and our prosperity," Mr. Chertoff said.

But Mr. Thompson said that while Mr. Chertoff thinks the 2008 budget proposal protects the nation's people and critical infrastructure, improves emergency preparedness and response, and improves the operation and management of the department, he was not convinced.

He noted that last year, the entire nation "was disgusted with the atrocious response to Hurricane Katrina" and confidence in the department was at an all-time low. He said it was "evident" the department was not prepared to handle another catastrophic terrorist attack or natural disaster.

"This may be a new year, but in some instances, Mr. Secretary, it feels like deja vu," Mr. Thompson said. "I do recognize some significant increases in the areas such as cyber and border security; unfortunately, I fear that behind the increases lurks some problems rather than answers."

He said the budget eliminates funding for local law-enforcement terrorism-prevention programs, proposes significant cuts in grants to first responders in all 50 states and U.S. territories, and would zero out funding for grants to metropolitan medical systems that he said would be needed to prepare for the mass casualties in the event of a disaster.

Mr. Thompson also said he was concerned whether the budget adequately addresses why the department ranked at the bottom for the second time in nearly every category of the Office of Personnel Management Employee Satisfaction Survey.

Proposed Federal Protective Service Cuts Hit (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

President Bush's new budget proposes cuts to the Federal Protective Service, police that guard U.S. government buildings, a move labor unions say will be "the last nail in the coffin" of the agency that is being replaced by private contractors.

Administration officials say changes to the agency in the Department of Homeland Security improve efficiency without sacrificing security, and that private security firms already guard the vast majority of federal buildings.

A memo to staff from the service's acting Director Paul Durette Monday said it would be "realigned" as a "standards-setting and compliance-centered operation" with 950 employees, from the current 1,250 or so.

The changes mean the service "work force will be primarily composed of inspectors," with "patrol functions ... limited only to the highest risk major metropolitan areas, or in locations where special security arrangements require" them.

The service will maintain its inspectors, and "a core group of criminal investigators dedicated to intelligence and investigative activities related to federal facilities," but "the remaining uniformed cadre of police officers [in the agency] will be absorbed into other law enforcement functions" within homeland security, or encouraged to take early retirement, states the memo.

The move will complete the service's transformation from a police force that actually guards U.S. government buildings across the country, including federal courthouses, to one that largely sets and enforces standards on private firms hired by other agencies to provide security at 880 or so facilities.

"This will be the last nail in the coffin," said David Wright, president of the service's union, American Federation of Government Employees Local 918. "It will break morale, it will break the service."

Mr. Wright said Mr. Durette's proposal was "a rehash of failed initiatives they have tried before."

"The administration is proposing to walk away from its basic responsibility" to protect federal buildings across the country, said American Federation of Government Employees National President John Gage in a statement vowing to oppose the cuts.

A Homeland Security official said the department was reviewing the service's role "looking at areas where its responsibilities might duplicate those of other agencies."

The result would be "a higher standard of service for our customers," the federal agencies who own and operate the buildings protected by the service.

Mr. Wright said the plan was a response to a huge budget deficit the agency had -- up to $65 million -- blaming the departmental leadership at Homeland Security for their "reluctance ... to go back to Congress to help solve this problem."

The service's management "is not being forthcoming about where the deficit comes from," Mr. Wright said, adding that lawmakers he had spoken to this week were demanding a government audit of the service's finances.

The Federal Protective Service is managed as part of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, a part of the Department of Homeland Security.

Will Bush Library Be A Target? (DMN)

By Kristen Holland

The Dallas Morning News, February 10, 2007

Terrorists will destroy the Bush library and take out most of the Park Cities at the same time. The question isn't if but when, says Sam Boyd, a Park Cities lawyer.

Mr. Boyd isn't alone.

A number of Park Cities residents say they fear that building the presidential library in University Park would be like painting a big, red target on their community.

Security and terrorism experts have mixed sentiments. Although some say presidential libraries are unlikely targets, others say Bush's library may change that because the president is such a polarizing figure worldwide.

DOJ_NMG_0130812

"It's just kind of a realization," Mr. Boyd said about the terrorist threat. "I'm not willing it. I don't want it. But if they build the target, somebody's going to shoot at it."

Mr. Boyd, who was a Green Beret in Vietnam, was one of dozens of residents who squeezed into University Park's City Council chambers this week to comment on whether the city should sell to Southern Methodist University a small park that the private university may need for the Bush library. SMU learned in December that it was the lone finalist to host the facility.

Also Online

Presidential Bookmarks : A guide to presidential libraries across the U.S.

Though the library has drawn sharp criticism in recent months – from SMU faculty members and Methodist clergy – the terrorism concerns raised by several residents at the public hearing represent a new front against the facility.

University officials say they are concerned about security but not enough to abandon their bid for the library.

"We take security very seriously," said Patti LaSalle, SMU's associate vice president and executive director of public affairs. "But in this post-9/11 world, we also feel that we're not going to retreat into fearful existence. We're not going to stop taking advantage of opportunities."

If SMU is awarded the library, the National Archives and Records Administration, which oversees the presidential library system, will provide security. The university has a director of emergency preparedness and an emergency operations center. Both were created after 9/11.

Danny Defenbaugh, former head of the FBI's Dallas office, understands the residents' concerns. He said presidential libraries could be targeted because they're icons.

"Not the type of national icon like the Washington monument or the Capitol would be," Mr. Defenbaugh said. "However, it is. Appropriate security concerns need to be applied."

William Harris, director of physical infrastructure and collection support for the National Archives' Office of Presidential Libraries, said security goes beyond armed guards and metal detectors at the nation's presidential libraries. Security measures are incorporated into the architectural and design standards for the libraries.

Mr. Harris couldn't provide many specifics, but one basic requirement is for a 100-foot setback from major highways or thoroughfares. He also said all the libraries have round-the-clock security details. Cameras monitor all buildings and grounds.

But that security won't be enough, says Avi, a terrorism expert with Mayday International, a security firm that provides counterterrorism training.

Avi, who spoke on condition that his last name not be used because of the sensitivity of his profession, said SMU and law enforcement officials would not be able to stop terrorists from targeting the Bush library.

"George Bush is not accepted by so many cultures in the world, especially the Islamic world," Avi said. "Wherever you carry the word 'Bush' might be potential for attack."

He said he doubts a group like al-Qaeda would take the time to plan such an attack. With students coming to and from SMU, it would be much easier for a small group of fanatics – such as young supporters of Hezbollah – to hide among students and do the job.

University Park Police Chief Gary Adams said residents concerned about a terrorist attack are raising good points. He said any public facility is a possible terrorist target.

The department has listed SMU as a potential target because it has a large number of people in a relatively small area.

"If they plan an attack in University Park, we've always thought it would be Ford Stadium during a game," Chief Adams said. "The library certainly could be a potential target."

Highland Park DPS Chief Darrell Fant said the risk of a terrorist attack at the library is remote. He said he'd be more concerned about President Bush moving to town. The president and first lady Laura Bush have indicated they will return to Dallas at least part time after Mr. Bush leaves office.

"Any time you have a past president – and we've had past governors and I've had sons and daughters of foreign diplomats – it demands a different type of response plan," Chief Fant said. "It certainly creates a greater potential and a greater threat level."

While anything can be a target, Andrew Teekell said terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda probably wouldn't waste their time attacking a presidential library, even with Bush's name on it.

"Certainly there would be some symbolic value there," said Mr. Teekell, a counterterrorism and security analyst at Stratfor, a private security-consulting firm in Austin. "But you probably wouldn't generate a lot of casualties. If that's the best al-Qaeda can do, I'm frankly not impressed."

He said they would gain some points for staging an attack on American soil, but not much.

"Once again, I don't think it would occur to them," he said. "However, that's not to say that a target like that wouldn't be attractive to domestic terrorists."

Although it's possible the Bush library could be targeted, terrorism expert Jennifer Holmes said the threat is minimal.

"If people want to live in a bunker, they're less likely to have problems," said Dr. Holmes, associate professor of political economy and political science at the University of Texas at Dallas. "The issue is the relative risk compared to anywhere else in Dallas. Dallas is a target-rich environment anyway. One more really doesn't make a difference."

"They're all more likely to die on [U.S. Highway] 75 or LBJ anyway," Dr. Holmes added.

Tom Sheehan, the former police chief at D/FW International Airport, said water-storage facilities, power plants or nuclear facilities would be a more likely target than a presidential library because their destruction would affect day-to-day life.

"You could make a bigger splash hitting a grade school," he added.

That's not much comfort to University Park resident Irene Mitchell, who worries that the Bush library would subject residents to threats by religious extremists, intent on punishing the White House for its international policies.

"We haven't a clue," Ms. Mitchell said. "We're like ostriches hiding our heads in the sand if we don't think it'll come here, because it will."

Katrina Suits Put U.S. Judge In Eye Of Storm (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven, Paulo Prada

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Lyonel Thomas Senter Jr.'s roots run deep in northern Mississippi, amid magnolia-lined streets and antebellum mansions. He learned to play trumpet there and high-school football and became a federal judge.

Now, at 73 years old, Judge Senter has become a defining figure in the coastal south of the state, presiding over a deluge of legal cases that grew out of Hurricane Katrina. The storm triggered more than 1.2 million claims from homeowners for $17.6 billion in damage, says the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Most claims have been resolved, but thousands of homeowners in the Gulf region are still suing their insurers, and billions are still at stake.

At issue in many of these cases is a messy question. Were homes destroyed by the ferocious winds of the storm or the surging Gulf waters that came with them? Insurers typically cover wind damage but exclude water damage, because it's covered under the federal government's flood insurance program. Yet who knows what's behind the damage when a house has been wiped off the map?

Judge Senter has been at the core of several recent critical turns in cases in Mississippi -- which have generally moved faster than in Louisiana -- in part because he's one of the few federal judges there whose own home wasn't damaged by the storm. At least two other judges have sued their insurers. He owns a condo in nearby New Orleans that was unharmed and stays in a hotel when in Mississippi.

Judge Senter, who has declined interviews, has ruled against the insurance industry in some important ways. In late January, he ruled against State Farm Insurance Cos., the nation's largest home insurer, in one case involving one Mississippi couple, setting the stage for a $1 million punitive damage award against the company.

A few days later, he tossed aside a proposed settlement that would have had State Farm pay at least $50 million to thousands of Mississippi homeowners, helping it clean the slate of Katrina-related conflicts in the area. He said he needed more information.

He'll be holding a hearing on the settlement -- important to residents desperate for rebuilding funds -- on Feb. 28.

"I would like nothing more than to approve a settlement procedure that is fair, balanced and reasonable," he wrote in an order Thursday that set that coming hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0130814

He's handed the insurance industry some important victories. Last March, he upheld a standard provision in many policies that frees them from the responsibility of covering damage caused by floods. The industry considers the "flood exclusion" sacred.

But beyond upholding flood exclusions, his rulings have put the onus on insurers -- not homeowners -- to prove which damage was caused by wind and to pay for it, or risk costly penalties.

"Judge Senter has laid out a framework that is likely to be followed by most courts" in future hurricane-related cases, says John Ellison, an attorney with New York-based Anderson, Kill & Olick PC, who is representing Louisiana plaintiffs in other Katrina-related cases.

Judge Senter is not the first to address the wind vs. water issue. But this is "the first time we're seeing it on a massive scale," says Tom Baker, director of the Insurance Law Center at the University of Connecticut Law School.

Judge Senter himself is a relative newcomer to the Gulf Coast, having grown up in Aberdeen in the north. It is a once-prosperous town on the Tombigbee River, where the movie house on Commerce Street still sells popcorn for $1. He was a sure-footed high-school quarterback until he was stricken with polio, which later forced him to walk with a leg brace and crutches. He now uses a wheelchair.

After working as an attorney and serving as a state judge, he was nominated to the federal bench by President Carter in 1979. He later became chief of the Northern District, sitting in Aberdeen, where he garnered a reputation as a thoughtful, fair and even-tempered jurist who combines small-town practicality with a scholarly interpretation of the law.

"This is a guy that sees both sides to everything," says Danny McKittrick, a probation officer at the district court. "He never claims to know it all and works hard to get the information necessary to understand what he's hearing."

The judge, who sometimes introduces himself as "Tommy" outside the courtroom, played trumpet with a jazz band in college. He once used the trumpet to ease tensions in a case, recalls Ron Welch, a Mississippi lawyer. Mr. Welch and another attorney were in chambers strenuously arguing a point when Judge Senter began asking about their personal interests and then steered the conversation to music. He then suggested they take a break, and they wound up at Judge Senter's house, where he pulled out his trumpet and played "Summertime," the lullaby from "Porgy and Bess."

"We ended up settling that point," says Mr. Welch.

In 1998, Judge Senter became a senior judge, and he relocated to the Southern District of Mississippi in 2002. When Katrina hit, Judge Senter rode out the storm with friends in Pensacola, Fla., and took over Katrina-related cases afterward.

Some of the judge's recent rulings could have added import as Katrina cases work their way through the system in the Gulf. Among those rulings was his call on how insurers should proceed when both wind and water cause damage to a home. The insurer -- not the policyholder -- bears the burden of proving which part should be excluded.

That came into play last month in the case brought against State Farm by Norman and Genevieve Broussard, of Biloxi, Miss. Their home was wiped away. State Farm denied the claim. "State Farm attempted to shift its burden of proof to the plaintiffs to establish the portion of their losses that were caused by wind," Judge Senter said in his ruling. He ordered the insurer to pay to the limits of the policy, $211,222 for the home and its contents.

A jury then awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages, which Judge Senter later reduced to $1 million.

"If that's the law, then that will have a huge impact on how future cases are handled," says Randy Maniloff, an attorney for insurance companies at White & Williams LLC in Philadelphia who has written about Judge Senter's rulings.

State Farm, which is based in Bloomington, Ill., says it is likely to appeal the entire case, and adds that the company is working on answering the judge's questions about the proposed settlement.

WAR NEWS:

Pre-war Intelligence Gathering Under Fire (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats assailed Pentagon officials today for insisting to the White House in the months before the Iraq war that Saddam Hussein had direct links to Al Qaeda — despite doubts within the U.S. intelligence community.

DOJ_NMG_0130815

Defense Department Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the lawmakers that he questioned Douglas J. Feith, the influential former undersecretary, about the incident.

Feith was a prime architect of Bush administration policies and presented policymakers with allegations of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda that did not accurately reflect the views of U.S. intelligence agencies.

"He said it was left out because it was critical of the intelligence community," Gimble said.

"It's damn suspicious to me," said Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.). "You're telling the CIA — you're giving them an assessment that disagrees in a number of respects with theirs, but leave out a slide that says that you have fundamental problems with how the intelligence community is assessing information…. You remove it when you're talking to the CIA and then you reinsert it when you present this same assessment to the White House. That's mighty bloody suspicious."

Republicans defended the Pentagon's intelligence gathering operation under former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld during the months leading up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. Sen. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) said Feith's group at the Pentagon asked "probing questions" that improved the intelligence process.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman denied that the policy shop produced its own intelligence, saying they were looking at the intelligence community's work "with a critical eye."

The testimony follows a critical report released by the inspector general's office.

Its findings lend credence to charges by White House critics that Feith, who has since left the department, was out of line when he sought to discredit analyses by CIA intelligence officials that discounted alleged ties between Al Qaeda and then-Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Feith, in responding to the investigation, defended his actions and said he was pleased that the report found he had done nothing illegal.

The report says that Feith's office "developed, produced and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and Al Qaeda relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community."

Levin, in a statement released Thursday, said the report found that Feith acted inappropriately, taking on a role that should have been reserved for the intelligence analysts.

The report is sure to add fuel to the controversy over President Bush's main justifications for overthrowing Hussein.

Before the invasion, Bush and other administration officials warned that Hussein had stockpiles of banned biological and chemical weapons and had ties to Al Qaeda terrorists.

The alleged caches of weapons have not been found and the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Hussein and Al Qaeda.

Levin has been highly critical of Feith in the past, saying he played a key role in helping Bush make a misleading case for war. In 2005, Levin requested the probe into Feith's activities.

In his statement, Levin called the inspector general's report "devastating," and said he was going to push for the full, classified version of the investigation to be made public.

In a statement, Feith said it "is good but not surprising" that the report found that his office's activities "were all legal and authorized" and that he and his aides "did not mislead Congress." But he took issue with the conclusion that his actions were inappropriate.

"I disagree with the inspector general's opinions here mainly because, if heeded, they would discourage policy officials from asking tough questions about the quality of CIA work," he said.

At the Pentagon, Feith created the Office of Special Plans, an organization that drafted plans for the war in Iraq. Feith has long rejected claims by critics that the office generated misleading intelligence.

Analysts in the Office of Special Plans believed that the CIA was ignoring links between Al Qaeda operatives and Iraq.

Feith resigned from the Pentagon in 2005 and teaches at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a statement Thursday that his panel had never been informed about the activities of Feith's office.

DOJ_NMG_0130816

"Individuals in that office produced and disseminated intelligence products outside of the regular intelligence channels," Rockefeller said. "These intelligence products were inconsistent with the consensus judgments of the intelligence community and as a result policymakers received distorted intelligence."

CIA Doubts Didn't Deter Feith's Team (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the Bush administration began assembling its case for war, analysts across the U.S. intelligence community were disturbed by the report of a secretive Pentagon team that concluded Iraq had significant ties to Al Qaeda.

Analysts from the CIA and other agencies "disagreed with more than 50%" of 26 findings the Pentagon team laid out in a controversial paper, according to testimony Friday from Thomas F. Gimble, acting inspector general of the Pentagon.

The dueling groups sat down at CIA headquarters in late August 2002 to try to work out their differences. But while the CIA agreed to minor modifications in some of its own reports, Gimble said, the Pentagon unit was utterly unbowed.

"They didn't make the changes that were talked about in that August 20th meeting," Gimble said, and instead went on to present their deeply flawed findings to senior officials at the White House.

The work of that special Pentagon unit — which was run by former Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith — is one of the lingering symbols of the intelligence failures leading up to the war in Iraq.

The Bush administration's primary justification for invading Iraq was always its assertion that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction. But Iraq's supposed ties to Al Qaeda — and therefore its connection to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — were an important secondary argument, and one that resonated with many Americans in the lead-up to the war with Iraq.

The CIA and many other intelligence agencies were wrong in their assessments of Iraq's weapons programs. But the agency was always deeply skeptical about the ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Most of the evidence that Feith's Office of Special Plans cited in making its case for significant collaboration between Baghdad and Al Qaeda has crumbled under postwar scrutiny. The Senate Intelligence Committee has concluded that Saddam Hussein was so wary of the terrorist network that he barred anyone in his government from dealing with Al Qaeda.

Although the Pentagon Inspector General's report released Friday did not address the accuracy of such assessments, it documented the unusual efforts by Defense Department policymakers to bypass regular intelligence channels and influence officials at the highest level of government.

Feith's work was of critical importance to Vice President Dick Cheney, who once referred to the Pentagon team's conclusions as the "best source" for understanding the relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

The activities of Feith's group weren't illegal, Gimble concluded. But they were, "in our opinion, inappropriate, given that the intelligence assessments were [presented as] intelligence products and did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community."

The Pentagon team touted a series of claims that have not survived postwar review. Among them was the allegation that Mohammed Atta, the presumed ringleader of the Sept. 11 hijackers, had met with an Iraqi agent in Prague before the attacks.

A critical question raised by the inspector general's report is whether Feith and his office were just critiquing CIA analysis, or were creating their own intelligence assessment, a role that is supposed to be left to the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) noted Friday that Cheney has referred to Feith's work as an "assessment," suggesting it was a formal intelligence document. But Feith maintained in interviews he was not creating an intelligence "product," but was just checking the work of the CIA.

Laurence H. Silberman, a semiretired U.S. appeals court judge and co-chairman of a presidential commission on Iraq's weapons, said it is appropriate to question intelligence.

"Policymakers, whether they are in Defense, State, the White House or Congress, are absolutely entitled to question the intelligence community, look over the material and come up with their own views," he said.

Feith's work had the blessing of his boss, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The operation was set up at the behest of then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz with approval from Rumsfeld, Gimble noted. By most accounts, those three officials had distrust, if not disdain, for the work of the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

But Robert M. Gates, the new secretary of Defense and former CIA director, said that groups outside the CIA and other chartered intelligence agencies should not be involved in freelance analysis.

"Based on my whole career, I believe all intelligence activities need to be carried on by the established institutions, where there is appropriate oversight," he told reporters traveling with him in Europe for meetings on security.

Gimble provided new details on the chain of events leading from the creation of the Feith team, through a series of briefings it made for senior officials and culminating in a presentation before deputies in the National Security Council at the White House.

The initial instruction to search for links between Iraq and Al Qaeda came from Wolfowitz in January 2002, Gimble said.

By that July, Feith had assembled a group of analysts detailed from other agencies to draft a document outlining evidence that the officials thought other agencies had ignored.

The team presented its findings to Rumsfeld on Aug. 8. Rumsfeld found it so compelling that he urged Feith to arrange a briefing for then-CIA Director George J. Tenet at the CIA. In the meantime, the team's paper began to circulate among analysts at other agencies who took issue with more than half of its contents.

"There were like 26 points," in the Feith team's paper, Gimble said. "And essentially [experts at other agencies] disagreed with more than 50% of it, and either agreed or partially agreed with the remainder."

When the team briefed Tenet and other senior CIA officials on Aug. 15, the audience was polite but unimpressed. Tenet described the meeting as "useful," Gimble said, but "in our interviews with him he later said that he only said that it was 'useful' because he didn't agree with it and he was just trying to, you know, nicely end the meeting."

That encounter led to the "roundtable" meeting at the agency five days later where CIA experts urged the Pentagon unit to at least include footnotes acknowledging the long list of disagreements.

Nevertheless, the Pentagon team pressed on.

P.J. Crowley, a retired Air Force colonel and a senior fellow at the Center of American Progress, said that the intelligence peddled by Feith tainted the public dialogue.

"They weren't creating intelligence, but they were assembling the pieces to create a rationale for war," Crowley said. "Their production was discredited, but they had the desired effect. The little pieces ended up infecting the process."

Pentagon Office "misled" On Iraq War (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

A special Pentagon office created in the run-up to the Iraq war engaged in “inappropriate” activities by providing misleading intelligence to policymakers, according to the US Department of Defense.

The Pentagon inspector-general on Friday said the Office of Special Plans set up by Douglas Feith, then undersecretary of defence for policy, provided senior policymakers with “alternative intelligence assessments” on alleged links between al-Qaeda and Iraq that were “inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community”.

Senator Carl Levin, the Democratic chairman of the armed services committee and senior member of the intelligence committee, said the report was a “devastating condemnation” of senior Pentagon officials.

“The bottom line is that intelligence relating to the Iraq/al-Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration’s decision to invade Iraq when the intelligence assessments of the professional analysts of the intelligence community did not provide the desired compelling case,” said Mr Levin.

The report comes at a critical time for the White House as President George W. Bush struggles to keep Republican support for the war in Iraq.

Democrats have long argued that Mr Feith was engaged in helping Dick Cheney, vice-president, build the case for war based on inaccurate, or misleading, intelligence.

Before the 2003 invasion, Mr Cheney often referred to the alleged links between al-Qaeda and Saddam Hussein, which subsequent investigations confirmed never existed.

While the report said the actions of Mr Feith's office were not "illegal or unauthorised", it concluded that they were "inappropriate" because they "did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community".

Mr Feith, who now teaches at Georgetown University, told Associated Press that the allegations of inappropriate activity were "bizarre".

"The policy office has been smeared for years by allegations that its pre-Iraq-war work was somehow 'un-lawful' or 'unauthorised' and that some information it gave to congressional committees was deceptive or misleading," AP cited Mr Feith as saying.

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, in Seville for Nato meetings yesterday, said he had not read the report, which referred to activities that occurred under his predecessor, Donald Rumsfeld.

But the former Central Intelligence Agency director said: "Based on my whole career, all intelligence -activities need to be carried out through established institutions where there is oversight."

Separately, yesterday, Mr Gates said the US had "pretty good" evidence that Iran was providing groups in Iraq with sophisticated explosive devices called "explosively formed projectiles" [EFPs].

He said the evidence included serial numbers and markings on fragments of exploded devices. But Mr Gates again dismissed suggestions that the recent increase in anti- Iranian rhetoric in Washington was a prelude to war. After the Iranian supreme leader threatened on Thursday to respond to any US attack on Iran, Mr Gates responded that it was "just another day in the Persian Gulf".

Asked yesterday whether that response was aimed at ratcheting down the US rhetoric, he replied: "In the last few weeks there's been an effort in Washington actually to tone down everybody else.

"I don't know how many times the president, Secretary [Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran, that the second carrier group [recently dispatched to the Gulf] is there to -reassure our allies, as well as to send a signal that we've been in the Persian Gulf for decades and we intend to stay there. And I think these are fairly modest statements."

Senators Debate Significance Of Pentagon Report On Intelligence (WP)

By Walter Pincus, Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans disagreed yesterday over the meaning and importance of a Defense Department inspector general's conclusion that a Pentagon policy office produced and gave senior policymakers "alternative intelligence assessments on Iraq and Al Qaida relations" that were "inconsistent" with the intelligence community's consensus view in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Acting Defense Department Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he had no evidence that the Pentagon activities were illegal and said they were authorized by then-Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz.

But, he said, "the actions, in our opinion, were inappropriate."

The office's assessments, according to an unclassified summary of Gimble's report released yesterday, "evolved from policy to intelligence products, which were then disseminated." The summary said the intelligence community's consensus view and "available intelligence" at the time, late in the summer of 2002, did not support the policy office's conclusion that a "mature symbiotic relationship" existed between Iraq and al-Qaeda.

An article in yesterday's Washington Post misattributed to the inspector general's report critical comments about the Pentagon operation made by committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). In a statement he released Thursday, Levin, not the inspector general, said the Pentagon effort used intelligence reporting of "dubious quality or reliability." [See correction, A2.]

Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of defense for policy, sharply disputed the inspector general's conclusions in a series of interviews yesterday. "My office was trying to prevent an intelligence failure," Feith told National Public Radio. "We had people in the Pentagon who thought that the CIA's speculative assessments were not of top quality; they were not raising all the questions they should raise and considering all the information they should consider."

His office "did not present an alternative intelligence analysis," Feith said, it "presented a criticism."

After weeks of discussion over President Bush's strategy for ongoing involvement in Iraq, yesterday's hearing once again plunged the Senate into discord over how the United States got there in the first place.

Levin, who has long questioned Feith's prewar intelligence operation, was harshly critical. "Senior administration officials used the twisted intelligence produced by the Feith office in making the case for the Iraq war," Levin said. Calling the inspector general's report a "devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities," he said he would hold further hearings on the subject.

"I don't think in any way that his report could be interpreted as a devastating condemnation," Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) quickly countered. Feith's office, he said, "actually provided a service" by bringing intelligence community failures to the attention of policymakers. Inhofe described the disagreements outlined in the inspector general's report as a simple "turf battle" between government departments.

Democratic senators used Gimble's report and testimony to bolster their contention that the administration misused intelligence to promote the urgency of invading Iraq. Republicans implied that the intelligence community had soft-pedaled crucial reports of a close al-Qaeda relationship with Saddam Hussein and that Feith's office had put them in the proper perspective.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence is in the process of producing a "Phase II" of its investigation of the lead-up to the war, dealing with allegations that the administration emphasized unproven intelligence that supported its charges against Hussein and played down information that undercut them. The committee has been awaiting the inspector general's report.

Gimble repeatedly emphasized yesterday that his report "was an investigation of a process" at the Pentagon and not of any individuals. That process was inappropriate, he said, because it purported to produce an "intelligence product" but its conclusions did not acknowledge alternative views within the intelligence community.

"The condition occurred because the role of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense Policy was expanded from the mission of doing defense policy to analyzing and disseminating alternative intelligence," Gimble said. "As a result, the office did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to the senior decision-makers."

"I don't know whether it was intentional or whether it was a good-faith judgment," Gimble said. "That's not my position, and I wouldn't have a thought on that. All I can tell you is at the end of the day, when those things went forward, there was two sets of facts out there; one of them got passed over, and it would happen to be the one that's in the very community that we look to to have this kind of information."

Focused on the question of Iraq ties to al-Qaeda, Gimble's report concentrated on findings that Feith's office presented in three briefings in August and September 2002 -- one to Rumsfeld and Wolfowitz, one to the CIA, and one at the White House to then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, then Vice President Cheney's chief of staff.

Laying out a chronology of events, Gimble said Wolfowitz asked Feith in January 2002 "to assess the links between al-Qaeda and Iraq." The following July, he told the committee, a group of Pentagon employees assigned to Feith's office "compiled a position paper that was later translated into a briefing."

The briefing, titled "Iraq and al-Qaeda: Making the Case," was given to Rumsfeld on Aug. 8. In a memo to Feith's office that day, Wolfowitz described it as "excellent."

"The secretary was very impressed," Wolfowitz wrote. "He asked us to think about some possible next steps to see if we can illuminate the differences between us and the CIA. The goal is not to produce a consensus product, but rather to scrub one another's arguments."

Rumsfeld then directed that the briefing be presented to then-CIA Director George J. Tenet.

Before an Aug. 15 briefing for Tenet, however, analysts from the Defense Intelligence Agency, the CIA and other agencies critiqued the briefing. In particular, they questioned Feith's conclusion that a "known contact" had taken place in Prague in April 2001 between a senior Iraqi intelligence agent and Mohamed Atta, the leader of the al-Qaeda attack on the World Trade Center in September of that year. "Essentially, they disagreed with more than 50 percent of it and either agreed or partially agreed with the remainder," Gimble said yesterday.

The CIA described the intelligence concerning the alleged contact with Atta as "contradictory at best," a Gimble aide testified at yesterday's hearing.

At the subsequent CIA briefing, Tenet called the presentation "useful," Gimble said. But Tenet remarked in an interview with the inspector general's office, Gimble said, that "he only said that it was 'useful' because he didn't agree with it and he was just trying to nicely end the meeting."

For the CIA briefing, Gimble said, Feith removed a slide concluding that there were "fundamental problems with the way the intelligence community was assessing the information." Gimble said that Feith told the inspector general's office he had taken it out "because it was critical of the intelligence community." The slide was reinserted for the later White House briefing.

After his session with Feith's group, Tenet arranged for a meeting between the group and intelligence community analysts to go over agreements and disagreements. As a result of that Aug. 20 session, Gimble said, the CIA agreed to make "some minor changes" in its analysis and to "footnote" its disagreements with the Pentagon presentation. Such footnotes are normally used in community intelligence documents to warn policymakers that there are other opinions.

Briefing Hadley and Libby, Gimble said, Feith's group did not mention that the intelligence community disagreed with more than half of its conclusions. Tenet, Gimble said, did not learn of the White House briefing until two years later.

Hadley, he said, declined to be interviewed by the inspector general's office, on the advice of the White House counsel. Libby was not asked for an interview, Gimble said. Levin said yesterday that he wants to question both.

Pentagon Probe Criticizes Ex-official's Iraq Intelligence (AFP)

By Marie Sanz

AFP, February 10, 2007

Former US defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld's top policy aide produced "inappropriate" intelligence reports linking Saddam Hussein and the Al-Qaeda terror network to bolster the case for war with Iraq, according to a Pentagon investigation.

The classified document, whose summary was made public Friday, is the result of an investigation by the Defense Department's acting inspector general, Thomas Gimble, of the Iraq intelligence work conducted by the office of former US defense under secretary Douglas Feith.

The probe was launched in November 2005 at the request of Congress to determine whether Feith's the so-called Office of Special Plans had conducted "unauthorized, unlawful or inappropriate intelligence activities" on Iraq between September 2002 and June 2003, the summary said.

The investigators concluded that the actions "were not illegal or unauthorized," having been approved by then-deputy defense secretary Paul Wolfowitz.

But, they said, "the actions were, in our opinion, inappropriate given that the intelligence assessments were intelligence products and did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community."

That condition occurred because of "an expanded role and mission from policy formulation to alternative intelligence analysis and dissemination."

As a result, it said, the office of Feith, a neoconservative supporter of the invasion of Iraq, did not provide "the most accurate analysis of intelligence" to senior decision-makers.

The White House reacted by pointing out that President George W. Bush "has long acknowledged that intelligence leading up to the war in Iraq was inaccurate" and that he had "taken dramatic actions in order to revamp the intel community ... so that those inaccuracies don't happen again."

The existence of links between the Al-Qaeda terror network and the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein was one of the main arguments of the Bush administration to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The Pentagon report is a "devastating condemnation" of the work done by Feith's office, said Democratic Senator Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"Indeed, Vice President Cheney said the principal Feith office assessment was the 'best source of information' on the alleged relationship between Iraq and Al-Qaeda," Levin said.

DOJ_NMG_0130821

Levin was hearing testimony of the Pentagon's Gimble Friday, who was scheduled to present the investigation's classified findings.

The Pentagon investigation focused on the Policy Counter-Terrorism Evaluation Group, created by then-deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz following the September 11, 2001, terror attacks in the United States to look for state sponsors of terrorism.

Feith, who resigned his Pentagon post in 2005 and now teaches at Georgetown University in Washington, lashed back at critics and said the report vindicates him.

"The policy office has been smeared for years by allegations that its pre-Iraq war work was somehow 'unlawful' or 'unauthorized' and that some information it gave to congressional committees was deceptive or misleading," he said in a statement.

"The inspector general's report has now thoroughly repudiated the smears."

However Senator Jay Rockefeller, the Democrat who heads the Senate Intelligence Committee, said that Feith may have violated the 1947 National Security Act by failing to keep Congress informed.

"The IG (Inspector General) has concluded that (Feith's) office was engaged in intelligence activities. The Senate Intelligence Committee was never informed of these activities," Rockefeller said in a statement.

"Whether these actions were authorized or not, it appears that they were not in compliance with the law," he said.

Eric Edelman, Feith's successor at the Pentagon and a former Cheney aide, said in a rebuttal to the report that Wolfowitz had asked Feith's analysts to ignore the intelligence community's belief that the radical Islamist Al-Qaeda and Saddam's secular dictatorship were unlikely allies.

Feith's unit was one of three offices that received intelligence on Iraq as the Bush administration made its case for ousting Saddam, Edelman said.

The office delivered three separate reports, none of which was an "assessment of any sort," according to Edelman's rebuttal.

Inquiry On Intelligence Gaps May Reach To White House (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Friday that he would ask current and former White House aides to testify about a report by the Pentagon's inspector general that criticizes the Pentagon for compiling "alternative intelligence" that made the case for invading Iraq.

The chairman, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, said that among those called to testify could be Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and I. Lewis Libby, a former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney. Both received a briefing from the defense secretary's policy office in 2002 on possible links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's government.

In its report on Thursday, the acting inspector general, Thomas F. Gimble, found that the work done by the Pentagon team, which was assembled by Douglas J. Feith, a former under secretary of defense for policy, was "not fully supported by the available intelligence."

It was not clear whether Mr. Hadley and Mr. Libby would testify. The White House normally resists having top aides testify before Congress.

The Senate Intelligence Committee may also seek to question the men. Tara Andringa, a spokeswoman for Mr. Levin, said Mr. Levin planned to consult with Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of that committee. Mr. Levin is on both committees.

The inspector general's report found that while the Feith team did not violate any laws or knowingly mislead Congress, it made dubious interpretations of intelligence reports and shared them with senior officials without making clear that its findings had already been discounted or discredited by the main intelligence agencies.

"The actions, in our opinion, were inappropriate, given that all the products did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intel community, and in some cases were shown as intel products," Mr. Gimble told the Armed Services Committee in a hearing on Friday.

That set off a two-hour partisan clash. Democrats argued that the report showed intelligence had been manipulated to justify an invasion of Iraq, and Republicans insisted that Mr. Feith's office did nothing wrong by reaching conclusions that differed from those of the main intelligence agencies and presenting them to higher-ups, who had asked for the re-examination in the first place.

Senator Levin, who has long been a leading critic of Mr. Feith's role, called the report "a devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities" by Mr. Feith. But Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma, responded, "I don't think in any way that his report can be interpreted as a devastating condemnation."

Mr. Gimble said formal intelligence findings did not corroborate some of the Pentagon's assertions: that Mr. Hussein's government and Al Qaeda had a "mature symbiotic relationship," that it involved a "shared interest and pursuit of" unconventional weapons and that there were "some indications" of coordination between Iraq and Al Qaeda on the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The briefers from Mr. Feith's office should have noted their departures from the formal consensus findings of intelligence agencies, Mr. Gimble said.

Representative Ike Skelton, a Democrat from Missouri and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said Mr. Feith's office exercised "extremely poor judgment for which our nation, and our service members in particular, are paying a terrible price."

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, noted that Mr. Feith's superiors at the Pentagon had asked him to re-examine intelligence on links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. Therefore, Mr. Sessions said, there was no need for the briefers to point out that their conclusions differed from those of the C.I.A., because the briefing was intended as a "critique" of the agencies' conclusions.

A similar argument has been made in a formal rebuttal to the inspector general that was prepared by Mr. Feith's successor at the Pentagon.

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Pentagon officials undercut the intelligence community in the run-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq by insisting in briefings to the White House that there was a clear relationship between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda, the Defense Department's inspector general said yesterday.

Acting Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the office headed by former Pentagon policy chief Douglas J. Feith took "inappropriate" actions in advancing conclusions on al Qaeda connections not backed up by the nation's intelligence agencies.

Mr. Gimble said that while the actions of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy "were not illegal or unauthorized," they "did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to senior decision makers" at a time when the White House was moving toward war with Iraq.

"I can't think of a more devastating commentary," said Armed Services Committee Chairman Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

He cited Mr. Gimble's findings that Mr. Feith's office was, despite doubts expressed by the intelligence community, pushing conclusions that September 11 hijacker Mohammed Atta had met an Iraqi intelligence officer in Prague five months before the attack, and that there were "multiple areas of cooperation" between Iraq and al Qaeda, including shared pursuit of weapons of mass destruction.

"That was the argument that was used to make the sale to the American people about the need to go to war," Mr. Levin said Thursday. He said the Pentagon's work, "which was wrong, which was distorted, which was inappropriate ... is something which is highly disturbing."

Republicans on the panel disagreed. Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, said the "probing questions" raised by Mr. Feith's policy group improved the intelligence process.

"I'm trying to figure out why we are here," said Sen. Saxby Chambliss, Georgia Republican, adding the office was doing its job of analyzing intelligence that the CIA and other intelligence agencies had gathered.

Mr. Gimble responded that at issue was that the information, supplied by Mr. Feith's office in briefings to the National Security Council and the office of Vice President Dick Cheney, was "provided without caveats" and that there were varying opinions on its reliability.

Mr. Gimble's report said Mr. Feith's office had made assertions "that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community."

At the White House, spokeswoman Dana Perino said President Bush has revamped the U.S. spy community to try avoiding a repeat of flawed intelligence affecting policy decisions by creating a director of national intelligence and making other changes.

"I think what he has said is that he took responsibility, and that the intel was wrong, and that we had to take measures to revamp the intel community to make sure that it never happened again," Mrs. Perino said.

Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman denied that the office was producing its own intelligence products, saying they were challenging what was coming in from intelligence-gathering professionals, "looking at it with a critical eye."

Levin: High-ranking DoD Officials Manipulated Iraq Intelligence (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

High-ranking Department of Defense officials "manipulated" intelligence to link al Qaeda and Iraq to bolster the case for an invasion, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) charged Friday, citing a new Pentagon report.

The DoD inspector general released the results of the investigation Friday, and an unclassified summary of the document shows that the "Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy [at the time being run by Douglas Feith] developed, produced, and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and al Qaeda relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community, to senior decision makers."

While the inspector general said these actions "were not illegal or unauthorized," they were "inappropriate."

Levin called the report a "devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities by the DoD policy office that helped take this nation to war."

Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), at the onset of a hearing on the issue, strongly opposed Levin's interpretation of the investigation.

"You can read the same report and come up with different conclusions, which is quite obvious and will be obvious," Inhofe said. "I don't think in any way that his report could be interpreted as a devastating condemnation."

Levin said he would seek a declassification of the entire report, which would make it available to the public.

Corrections (WP)

-- A Feb. 9 front-page article about a Pentagon inspector general's report regarding the office of former undersecretary of defense Douglas J. Feith incorrectly attributed quotations to that report. References to Feith's office producing "reporting of dubious quality or reliability" and that the office "was predisposed to finding a significant relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda" were from a report issued by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) in October 2004. Similarly, the quotes stating that Feith's office drew on "both reliable and unreliable reporting" to produce a link between al-Qaeda and Iraq "that was much stronger than that assessed by the IC [intelligence community] and more in accord with the policy views of senior officials in the Administration" were also from Levin's report. The article also stated that the intelligence provided by Feith's office supported the political views of senior administration officials, a conclusion that the inspector general's report did not draw.

The two reports employ similar language to characterize the activities of Feith's office: Levin's report refers to an "alternative intelligence assessment process" developed in that office, while an unclassified summary of the inspector general's report states that the office "developed, produced, and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and al Qaida relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the Intelligence Community, to senior decision-makers." The summary of the inspector general's report further states that Feith's briefing to the White House in 2002 "undercuts the Intelligence Community" and "did draw conclusions that were not fully supported by the available intelligence."

The Build-a-War Workshop (NYT)

It took far too long, but a report by the Pentagon inspector general has finally confirmed that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's do-it-yourself intelligence office cooked up a link between Iraq and Al Qaeda to help justify an unjustifiable war.

The report said the team headed by Douglas Feith, under secretary of defense for policy, developed "alternative" assessments of intelligence on Iraq that contradicted the intelligence community and drew conclusions "that were not supported by the available intelligence." Mr. Feith certainly knew the Central Intelligence Agency would cry foul, so he hid his findings from the C.I.A. Then Vice President Dick Cheney used them as proof of cloak-and-dagger meetings that never happened, long-term conspiracies between Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden that didn't exist, and — most unforgivable — "possible Iraqi coordination" on the 9/11 attacks, which no serious intelligence analyst believed.

The inspector general did not recommend criminal charges against Mr. Feith because Mr. Rumsfeld or his deputy, Paul Wolfowitz, approved their subordinate's "inappropriate" operations. The renegade intelligence buff said he was relieved.

We're sure he was. But there is no comfort in knowing that his dirty work was approved by his bosses. All that does is add to evidence that the Bush administration knowingly and repeatedly misled Americans about the intelligence on Iraq.

To understand this twisted tale, it is important to recall how Mr. Feith got into the creative writing business. Top administration officials, especially Mr. Cheney, had long been furious at the C.I.A. for refusing to confirm the delusion about a grand Iraqi terrorist conspiracy, something the Republican right had nursed for years. Their frustration only grew after 9/11 and the C.I.A. still refused to buy these theories.

Mr. Wolfowitz would feverishly sketch out charts showing how this Iraqi knew that Iraqi, who was connected through six more degrees of separation to terrorist attacks, all the way back to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

But the C.I.A. kept saying there was no reliable intelligence about an Iraq-Qaeda link. So Mr. Feith was sent to review the reports and come back with the answers Mr. Cheney wanted. The inspector general's report said Mr. Feith' s team gave a September 2002 briefing at the White House on the alleged Iraq-Qaeda connection that had not been vetted by the intelligence community (the director of central intelligence was pointedly not told it was happening) and "was not fully supported by the available intelligence."

The false information included a meeting in Prague in April 2001 between an Iraqi official and Mohamed Atta, one of the 9/11 pilots. It never happened. But Mr. Feith's report said it did, and Mr. Cheney will still not admit that the story is false.

In a statement released yesterday, Senator Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who has been dogged in pursuit of the truth about the Iraqi intelligence, noted that the cooked-up Feith briefing had been leaked to the conservative Weekly Standard magazine so Mr. Cheney could quote it as the "best source" of information about the supposed Iraq-Qaeda link.

The Pentagon report is one step in a long-delayed effort to figure out how the intelligence on Iraq was so badly twisted — and by whom. That work should have been finished before the 2004 elections, and it would have been if Pat Roberts, the obedient Republican who ran the Senate Intelligence Committee, had not helped the White House drag it out and load it in ways that would obscure the truth.

It is now up to Mr. Levin and Senator Jay Rockefeller, the current head of the intelligence panel, to give Americans the answers. Mr. Levin's desire to have the entire inspector general's report on the Feith scheme declassified is a good place to start. But it will be up to Mr. Rockefeller to finally determine how old, inconclusive, unsubstantiated and false intelligence was transformed into fresh, reliable and definitive reports — and then used by Mr. Bush and other top officials to drag the country into a disastrous and unnecessary war.

Evidence Links Iran, Insurgents (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday there is solid circumstantial evidence that Iran is supplying insurgents with explosives that are killing U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I think there's some serial numbers, there may be some markings on some of the projectiles fragments that we found" that trace back to Iran, he told reporters while traveling to Germany for a NATO conference.

The White House and the U.S. command in Baghdad are preparing a report making the case that the regime in Tehran is supporting like-minded Shi'ite insurgents in Iraq. The United States says the aid includes improvised explosive devices, which the Army reports cause 80 percent of all soldier casualties.

The report was put on hold after some White House officials determined the evidence was not strong enough to back up some of its assertions. But they have not backed off the general charge that Iran is indirectly fighting the United States via Iraqi insurgents.

President Bush announced Jan. 10 that the United States would begin targeting Iranian networks working inside Iraq. But officials repeatedly have said they will not strike Iran inside its borders.

Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, said in a radio interview that aired yesterday that his country has "no interest" in providing weapons to any insurgent group in Iraq.

"But the problem is that the United States has decided on a policy and is trying to find or fabricate evidence if it cannot find one -- and I believe it hasn't been able to find any evidence -- in order to substantiate and corroborate that policy," Mr. Zarif said on National Public Radio's "All Things Considered."

Meanwhile in Iraq, joint Iraqi and American forces continued the new offensive designed to finally quell violence in Baghdad and tip the balance of battle in the coalition's favor.

The operation calls for three Iraqi brigades and five American ones to join forces in the city during the coming weeks. To date, one Iraqi brigade, at about 60 percent strength, is in the capital city. The second is en route, and a third will deploy later this month.

The first American brigade -- the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team -- is now in the city. The second of the five is heading to Kuwait. The remaining three are in the United States preparing to deploy.

"So far so good," said Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, director of operations for the Pentagon's Joint Staff. "But we're in the very early days of what will be a very deliberate campaign that will unfold only over several months, and we should not expect quick, easy or dramatic results."

In previous offensives in Iraq, the Shi'ite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki never followed through on U.S. demands to target the Mahdi Army, a militia controlled by firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Gen. Lute said things are different this time.

"They said they were going to commit more troops to Baghdad. They have," he said. "They said they were going to have a no-holds-barred rules of engagement, set of rules of engagement, meaning that no geographic or political -- geographic location or political entity would be immune from law and order in Baghdad."

This week, he said, the al-Maliki government arrested a deputy health minister linked to death squads within the Mahdi Army. He said such action was unthinkable a few months ago.

Gen. Lute provided an update on the rash of American helicopter crashes in Iraq. Six helicopters -- four military and two civilian -- have gone down in less than three weeks.

The crashes have led to speculation that insurgents have perfected ways to locate and shoot down low-flying choppers, perhaps with shoulder-fired, heat-seeking missiles.

Gen. Lute said two aircraft were downed while in "close contact" with the enemy. Two others were also downed by groundfire, but not in battle. One crashed after hitting a wire, and the sixth had mechanical problems.

The general said investigations have not yet found a pattern of enemy activity that could explain the four that were shot down.

Deadliest Bomb In Iraq Is Made By Iran, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The most lethal weapon directed against American troops in Iraq is an explosive-packed cylinder that United States intelligence asserts is being supplied by Iran.

The assertion of an Iranian role in supplying the device to Shiite militias reflects broad agreement among American intelligence agencies, although officials acknowledge that the picture is not entirely complete.

In interviews, civilian and military officials from a broad range of government agencies provided specific details to support what until now has been a more generally worded claim, in a new National Intelligence Estimate, that Iran is providing "lethal support" to Shiite militants in Iraq.

The focus of American concern is known as an "explosively formed penetrator," a particularly deadly type of roadside bomb being used by Shiite groups in attacks on American troops in Iraq. Attacks using the device have doubled in the past year, and have prompted increasing concern among military officers. In the last three months of 2006, attacks using the weapons accounted for a significant portion of Americans killed and wounded in Iraq, though less than a quarter of the total, military officials say.

Because the weapon can be fired from roadsides and is favored by Shiite militias, it has become a serious threat in Baghdad. Only a small fraction of the roadside bombs used in Iraq are explosively formed penetrators. But the device produces more casualties per attack than other types of roadside bombs.

Any assertion of an Iranian contribution to attacks on Americans in Iraq is both politically and diplomatically volatile. The officials said they were willing to discuss the issue to respond to what they described as an increasingly worrisome threat to American forces in Iraq, and were not trying to lay the basis for an American attack on Iran.

The assessment was described in interviews over the past several weeks with American officials, including some whose agencies have previously been skeptical about the significance of Iran's role in Iraq. Administration officials said they recognized that intelligence failures related to prewar American claims about Iraq's weapons arsenal could make critics skeptical about the American claims.

The link that American intelligence has drawn to Iran is based on a number of factors, including an analysis of captured devices, examination of debris after attacks, and intelligence on training of Shiite militants in Iran and in Iraq by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and by Hezbollah militants believed to be working at the behest of Tehran.

The Bush administration is expected to make public this weekend some of what intelligence agencies regard as an increasing body of evidence pointing to an Iranian link, including information gleaned from Iranians and Iraqis captured in recent American raids on an Iranian office in Erbil and another site in Baghdad.

The information includes interrogation reports from the raids indicating that money and weapons components are being brought into Iraq from across the Iranian border in vehicles that travel at night. One of the detainees has identified an Iranian operative as having supplied two of the bombs. The border crossing at Mehran is identified as a major crossing point for the smuggling of money and weapons for Shiite militants, according to the intelligence.

According to American intelligence, Iran has excelled in developing this type of bomb, and has provided similar technology to Hezbollah militants in southern Lebanon. The manufacture of the key metal components required sophisticated machinery, raw material and expertise that American intelligence agencies do not believe can be found in Iraq. In addition, some components of the bombs have been found with Iranian factory markings from 2006.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates appeared to allude to this intelligence on Friday when he told reporters in Seville, Spain, that serial numbers and other markings on weapon fragments found in Iraq point to Iran as a source.

Some American intelligence experts believe that Hezbollah has provided some of the logistical support and training to Shiite militias in Iraq, but they assert that such steps would not be taken without Iran's blessing.

"All source reporting since 2004 indicates that Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Corps-Quds Force is providing professionally-built EFPs and components to Iraqi Shia militants," notes a still-classified American intelligence report that was prepared in 2006.

"Based on forensic analysis of materials recovered in Iraq," the report continues, "Iran is assessed as the producer of these items."

The United States, using the Swiss Embassy in Tehran as an intermediary, has privately warned the Iranian government to stop providing the military technology to Iraqi militants, a senior administration official said. The British government has issued similar warnings to Iran, according to Western officials. Officials said that the Iranians had not responded.

An American intelligence assessment described to The New York Times said that "as part of its strategy in Iraq, Iran is implementing a deliberate, calibrated policy — approved by Supreme Leader Khamenei and carried out by the Quds Force — to provide explosives support and training to select Iraqi Shia militant groups to conduct attacks against coalition targets." The reference was to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Iranian leader, and to an elite branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guards Command that is assigned the task of carrying out paramilitary operations abroad.

"The likely aim is to make a military presence in Iraq more costly for the U.S.," the assessment said.

Other officials believe Iran is using the attacks to send a warning to the United States that it can inflict casualties on American troops if the United States takes a more forceful posture toward it.

Iran has publicly denied the allegations that it is providing military support to Shiite militants in Iraq. Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, wrote in an Op-Ed article published on Thursday in The Times that the Bush administration was "trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq."

The explosively formed penetrator, detonated on the roadside as American vehicles pass by, is capable of blasting a metal projectile through the side of an armored Humvee with devastating consequences.

American military officers say that attacks using the weapon reached a high point in December, when it accounted for a significant portion of Americans killed and wounded in Iraq. For reasons that remain unclear, attacks using the device declined substantially in January, but the weapons remain one of the principal threats to American troops in and around Baghdad, where five additional brigades of American combat troops are to be deployed under the Bush administration's new plan.

"It is the most effective I.E.D out there," said Lt. Col. James Danna, who led the Second Battalion, Sixth Infantry Regiment in Baghdad last year, referring to improvised explosive devices, as the roadside bombs are known by the American military. "To me it is a political weapon. There are not a lot of them out there, but every time we crack down on the Shia militias that weapon comes out. They want to keep us on our bases, keep us out of their neighborhoods and prevent us from doing our main mission, which is protecting vulnerable portions of the population."

Adm. William Fallon, President Bush's choice to head the Central Command, alluded to the weapon's ability to punch through the side of armored Humvees in his testimony to Congress last month.

"Equipment that was, we thought, pretty effective in protecting our troops just a matter of months ago is now being challenged by some of the techniques and devices over there," Admiral Fallon said. "So I'm learning as we go in that this is a fast-moving ballgame."

Mr. Gates told reporters last week that he had heard there had been cases in which the weapon "can take out an Abrams tank."

The increasing use of the weapon is the latest twist in a lethal game of measure and countermeasure that has been carried out throughout the nearly four-year-old Iraq war. Using munitions from Iraq's vast and poorly guarded arsenal, insurgents developed an array of bombs to strike the more heavily armed and technologically superior American military.

In response, the United States military deployed armored Humvees, which in turn spawned the development of even more potent roadside bombs. American officials say that the first suspected use of the penetrator occurred in late 2003 and that attacks have risen steadily since then.

To make the weapon, a metal cylinder is filled with powerful explosives. A metal concave disk manufactured on a special press is fixed to the firing end.

Several of the cylinders are often grouped together in an array. The weapon is generally triggered when American vehicles drive by an infrared sensor, which operates on the same principle as a garage door opener. The sensor is impervious to the electronic jamming the American military uses to try to block other remote-control attacks.

When an American vehicle crosses the beam, the explosives in the cylinders are detonated, hurling their metal lids at targets at a tremendous speed. The metal changes shape in flight, forming into a slug that penetrate many types of armor.

In planning their attacks, Shiite militias have taken advantage of the tactics employed by American forces in Baghdad. To reduce the threat from suicide car bombs and minimize the risk of inadvertently killing Iraqi civilians, American patrols and convoys have been instructed to keep their distance from civilian traffic. But that has made it easier for the Shiite militias to attack American vehicles. When they see American vehicles approaching, they activate the infrared sensors.

According to American intelligence agencies, the Iranians are also believed to have provided Shiite militants with rocket-propelled grenades, shoulder-fired antiaircraft missiles, mortars, 122-millimeter rockets and TNT.

Among the intelligence that the United States is expected to make public this weekend is information indicating that some of these weapons said to have been made in Iran were carried into Iraq in recent years. Examples include a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile that was fired at a plane flying near the Baghdad airport in 2004 but which failed to launch properly; an Iranian rocket-propelled grenade made in 2006; and an Iranian 81-millimeter mortar made in 2006.

Assessments by American intelligence agencies say there is no indication that there is any kind of black-market trade in the Iranian-linked roadside bombs, and that shipments of the components are being directed to Shiite militants who have close links to Iran. The American military has developed classified techniques to try to counter the sophisticated weapon.

Marine officials say that weapons have not been found in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, adding to the view that the device is an Iranian-supplied and Shiite-employed weapon.

To try to cut off the supply, the American military has sought to focus on the cells of Iranian Revolutionary Guard operatives it asserts are in Iraq. American intelligence agencies are concerned that the Iranians may respond by increasing the supply of the weapons.

"We are working day and night to disassemble these networks that do everything from bring the explosives to the point of construction, to how they're put together, to who delivers them, to the mechanisms that are used to have them go off," Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said last week. "It is instructive that at least twice in the last month, that in going after the networks, we have picked up Iranians."

Gates: Bombs Tie Iran To Iraq Extremists (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, February 9, 2007

MUNICH, Germany — Serial numbers and other markings on bombs suggest that Iranians are linked to deadly explosives used by Iraqi militants, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday in some of the administration's first public assertions on evidence the military has collected.

While the Bush administration and military officials have repeatedly said Iranians have been tied to terrorist bombings in Iraq, they have said little about evidence to bolster such claims, including any documents and other items collected in recent raids in Iraq.

National security officials in Washington and Iraq have been working for weeks on a presentation intended to provide evidence for Bush administration claims of what they say are Iran's meddlesome and deadly activities.

The materials — which in their classified form include slides and some two inches of documents — provide evidence of Iran's role in supplying Iraqi militants with highly sophisticated and lethal improvised explosive devices and other weaponry. Among the weapons is a roadside bomb known as an "explosively formed penetrator," which can pierce the armor of Abrams tanks with nearly molten-hot charges. One intelligence official said the U.S. is "fairly comfortable" that it knows with some precision the origin of those Iranian-made explosives.

The Iran dossier also lays out alleged Iranian efforts to train Iraqis in military techniques.

Yet, government officials say there is some disagreement about how much to make public to support the administration's case. Intelligence officials worry the sources of their information could dry up.

Among the evidence the administration will present are weapons that were seized in U.S.-led raids on caches around Iraq, one military official in Washington said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Other evidence includes documents captured when U.S.-led forces raided an Iranian office Jan. 11 in Irbil in northern Iraq, the official said. Tehran said it was a government liaison office, but the U.S. military said five Iranians detained in the raid were connected to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that funds and arms insurgents in Iraq.

The assertions have been met with skepticism by some lawmakers still fuming over intelligence reports used by the administration to propel the country to war with Iraq in 2003. Gates' comments came as a new Pentagon inspector general's report criticized prewar Defense Department assertions of al-Qaeda connections to Iraq.

Speaking with reporters in Seville, Spain, on Friday before traveling to Munich, Gates told reporters that markings on explosives provide "pretty good" evidence that Iranians are supplying either weapons or technology for Iraqi extremists.

"I think there's some serial numbers, there may be some markings on some of the projectile fragments that we found" that point to Iran, he said.

Gates' remarks left unclear how the U.S. knows the serial numbers are traceable to Iran and whether such weapons would have been sent to Iraq by the Iranian government or by private arms dealers.

Explosives have been a leading killer of U.S. forces in Iraq, where more than 3,000 U.S. troops have died in the nearly four-year-old war.

In Iraq on Friday, the military reported three more American soldiers killed in combat, pushing the U.S. death toll to 33 in the first eight days of the month.

Separately, U.S. helicopters targeting insurgents mistakenly killed at least five allied Kurdish militiamen in the northern city of Mosul early Friday.

Last week, Gates said that U.S. military officers in Baghdad had been planning to brief reporters on what was known about Iranian involvement in Iraq but that he and other senior officials had delayed the briefing to assure the information was accurate.

On Friday, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said such information would come from U.S. officials in Iraq, though she did not say when.

"There has been discussion about how to detail out some of that evidence," she told reporters. "Decisions on that are being made out of Baghdad."

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Friday that officials hoping to publicly release the information face another problem as well.

He said, "Under the circumstances and given the attention that this has gotten, we want to make sure that we provide you the best information possible but do so in a way that doesn't compromise sources and methods, that doesn't make it harder for us to deal with the situation that's there."

Gates also told reporters that he was surprised that raids last month by coalition and Iraqi forces in Iraq swept up some Iranians.

"I don't think there was surprise that the Iranians were actually involved, I think there was surprise we actually picked up some," he said.

He and other U.S. officials have said for some time that Iranians, and possibly the government of Iran, have been providing weapons technology and perhaps some explosives to Iraqi fighters.

Gates, who attended his first NATO defense ministers meeting in Seville this week before flying to Munich for a security conference, said Iran is "very much involved in providing either the technology or the weapons themselves for these explosively formed projectiles."

He acknowledged the Iranian weapons are not a large percentage of the roadside bombs used in Iraq, but he said, "They're extremely lethal."

Gates said the recent raids combined with the movement of an additional U.S. aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf have created a stir, but he said the Bush administration had no intention of attacking Iran.

Asked about the Defense Department inspector general's report criticizing the Pentagon's use of prewar intelligence, Gates said he hadn't yet read it.

But, he added, "based on my whole career, I believe that all intelligence activities need to be carried on through established institutions, and where there is appropriate oversight. And if the intelligence isn't adequate, then changes need to be made in these institutions to improve the intelligence."

Al-Qaeda Suspects Color White House Debate Over Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Last week, the CIA sent an urgent report to President Bush's National Security Council: Iranian authorities had arrested two al-Qaeda operatives traveling through Iran on their way from Pakistan to Iraq. The suspects were caught along a well-worn, if little-noticed, route for militants determined to fight U.S. troops on Iraqi soil, according to a senior intelligence official.

The arrests were presented to Bush's senior policy advisers as evidence that Iran appears committed to stopping al-Qaeda foot traffic across its borders, the intelligence official said. That assessment comes at a time when the Bush administration, in an effort to push for further U.N. sanctions on the Islamic republic, is preparing to publicly accuse Tehran of cooperating with and harboring al-Qaeda suspects.

The strategy has sparked a growing debate within the administration and the intelligence community, according to U.S. intelligence and government officials. One faction is pressing for more economic embargoes against Iran, including asset freezes and travel bans for the country's top leaders. But several senior intelligence and counterterrorism officials worry that a public push regarding the al-Qaeda suspects held in Iran could jeopardize U.S. intelligence-gathering and prompt the Iranians to free some of the most wanted individuals.

"There was real debate about all this," said one counterterrorism official. "If we go public, the Iranians could turn them loose." The official added: "At this point, we know where these guys are and at least they are off the streets. We could lose them for years if we go down this path."

The administration's planned diplomatic offensive is part of an effort to pressure Tehran from multiple directions. Bush has given the U.S. military the authority to kill or capture Iranian government agents working with Shiite militias inside Iraq. Yesterday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said serial numbers and markings on some explosives used in Iraq indicate that the material came from Iran, but he offered no evidence.

With the aim of shaking Tehran's commitment to its nuclear program, Bush also approved last fall secret operations to target Iranian influence in southern Lebanon, in western Afghanistan, in the Palestinian territories and inside Iran. The new strategy, a senior administration official said, aims to portray Iran as a "terror-producing country, instead of an oil-producing country," with links to al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and death squads in Iraq.

U.S. officials have asserted for years that several dozen al-Qaeda fighters, including Osama bin Laden's son, slipped across the Afghan border into Iran as U.S. troops hunted for the perpetrators of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. U.S. and allied intelligence services, which have monitored the men's presence inside Iran, reported that Tehran was holding them under house arrest as bargaining chips for potential deals with Washington.

Last fall, Bush administration officials asked the CIA to compile a list of those suspects so the White House could publicize their presence. For years, the administration has not revealed their names, in part because it sought to protect its intelligence sources but also because at the time the U.S. government was concealing the identities of suspects it was holding in secret CIA custody.

But the names of some of the men in Iran have become public, including "high-value" targets such as al-Qaeda spokesman Sulaiman Abu Ghaith of Kuwait and Saif al-Adel of Egypt. U.S. intelligence officials said they are members of the "al-Qaeda operational management committee." U.S. intelligence officials said there are suspicions, but no proof, that one of them may have been involved from afar in planning an attack in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, in May 2003. Intelligence officials said bin Laden's son Saad is also being held with the other men in Iran.

Five administration officials were made available for interviews for this story on the condition that they not be identified. Other officials who spoke without permission -- including senior officials, career analysts and policymakers -- said their standing with the White House would be at risk if they were quoted by name.

The State Department, Pentagon and CIA referred all questions about the story to the National Security Council. In a written response to questions, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "Iran's sponsorship of terrorism is one of the reasons for the sanctions now against it. We note that U.N. Security Council resolutions already oblige all states to ensure that members of terrorist groups, including al-Qaeda, are brought to justice."

Since al-Qaeda fighters began streaming into Iran from Afghanistan in the winter of 2001, Tehran had turned over hundreds of people to U.S. allies and provided U.S. intelligence with the names, photographs and fingerprints of those it held in custody, according to senior U.S. intelligence and administration officials. In early 2003, it offered to hand over the remaining high-value targets directly to the United States if Washington would turn over a group of exiled Iranian militants hiding in Iraq.

Some of Bush's top advisers pushed for the trade, arguing that taking custody of bin Laden's son and the others would produce new leads on al-Qaeda. They were also willing to trade away the exiles -- members of a group on the State Department's terrorist list -- who had aligned with Saddam Hussein in an effort to overthrow the Iranian government.

Officials have said Bush ultimately rejected the exchange on the advice of Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued that any engagement would legitimize Iran and other state sponsors of terrorism. Bush's National Security Council agreed to accept information from Iran on al-Qaeda but offer nothing in return, officials said.

But no information has been forthcoming, intelligence officials said. One official said the CIA and the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency have disagreed over how effectively the Iranians are controlling al-Qaeda members and whether the Tehran government is aware of the extent of al-Qaeda movements through the country.

Nevertheless, administration officials said they are determined to press Iran on the matter.

"We are not convinced that the Iranians have been honest or open about the level or degree of al-Qaeda presence in their midst," said one Bush adviser who was instrumental in coming up with a more confrontational U.S. approach to Iran. "They have not made proper accounting with respect to U.N. resolutions, have not been clear about who is in detention and have not been clear as to what is happening to individuals who might be in custody."

Bush administration officials pointed to U.N. Security Council Resolutions 1267 and 1373, which state that harboring al-Qaeda members constitutes a threat to international peace and security, and authorize force to combat that threat. The resolutions compel nations to share any information on al-Qaeda suspects and give the United Nations authority to freeze the assets of suspects and those who provide them with safe haven.

Two U.S. officials said the administration plans to argue that Iran is violating those resolutions. A team of senior U.S. officials has been holding briefings for visiting European diplomats on the issue while administration lawyers prepare options for holding Iran in violation of U.N. resolutions.

"We've started a more aggressive and major attempt to try to convince other countries to use their influence on this issue," a senior U.S. diplomat said. "Until now, the Europeans have been focused on the nuclear issue and we want this high up on the agenda."

But another government official predicted that no European country would support a call on Iran to turn the al-Qaeda group over to U.S. military detention at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, a facility widely condemned by Washington's closest allies. In the past year, U.S. officials said they successfully pushed Egypt, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to seek extradition of their citizens held in Iran, but Tehran rebuffed the requests. Administration officials said they interpreted the refusal as evidence of cooperation between the Iranian government and the group.

"We'd be happy to see them face trial anywhere," a senior administration official said.

Target Iran: US Able To Strike In The Spring (GUARD)

By Ewen MacAskill

The Guardian, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130832

US preparations for an air strike against Iran are at an advanced stage, in spite of repeated public denials by the Bush administration, according to informed sources in Washington.

The present military build-up in the Gulf would allow the US to mount an attack by the spring. But the sources said that if there was an attack, it was more likely next year, just before Mr Bush leaves office.

Neo-conservatives, particularly at the Washington-based American Enterprise Institute, are urging Mr Bush to open a new front against Iran. So too is the vice-president, Dick Cheney. The state department and the Pentagon are opposed, as are Democratic congressmen and the overwhelming majority of Republicans. The sources said Mr Bush had not yet made a decision. The Bush administration insists the military build-up is not offensive but aimed at containing Iran and forcing it to make diplomatic concessions. The aim is to persuade Tehran to curb its suspect nuclear weapons programme and abandon ambitions for regional expansion.

Article continues

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, said yesterday: "I don't know how many times the president, secretary [of state Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran."

But Vincent Cannistraro, a Washington-based intelligence analyst, shared the sources' assessment that Pentagon planning was well under way. "Planning is going on, in spite of public disavowals by Gates. Targets have been selected. For a bombing campaign against nuclear sites, it is quite advanced. The military assets to carry this out are being put in place."

He added: "We are planning for war. It is incredibly dangerous."

Deployment

Mr Cannistraro, who worked for the CIA and the National Security Council, stressed that no decision had been made.

Last month Mr Bush ordered a second battle group led by the aircraft carrier USS John Stennis to the Gulf in support of the USS Eisenhower. The USS Stennis is due to arrive within the next 10 days. Extra US Patriot missiles have been sent to the region, as well as more minesweepers, in anticipation of Iranian retaliatory action.

In another sign that preparations are under way, Mr Bush has ordered oil reserves to be stockpiled.

The danger is that the build-up could spark an accidental war. Iranian officials said on Thursday that they had tested missiles capable of hitting warships in the Gulf.

Colonel Sam Gardiner, a former air force officer who has carried out war games with Iran as the target, supported the view that planning for an air strike was under way: "Gates said there is no planning for war. We know this is not true. He possibly meant there is no plan for an immediate strike. It was sloppy wording.

"All the moves being made over the last few weeks are consistent with what you would do if you were going to do an air strike. We have to throw away the notion the US could not do it because it is too tied up in Iraq. It is an air operation."

One of the main driving forces behind war, apart from the vice-president's office, is the AEI, headquarters of the neo-conservatives. A member of the AEI coined the slogan "axis of evil" that originally lumped Iran in with Iraq and North Korea. Its influence on the White House appeared to be in decline last year amid endless bad news from Iraq, for which it had been a cheerleader. But in the face of opposition from Congress, the Pentagon and state department, Mr Bush opted last month for an AEI plan to send more troops to Iraq. Will he support calls from within the AEI for a strike on Iran?

Josh Muravchik, a Middle East specialist at the AEI, is among its most vocal supporters of such a strike.

"I do not think anyone in the US is talking about invasion. We have been chastened by the experience of Iraq, even a hawk like myself." But an air strike was another matter. The danger of Iran having a nuclear weapon "is not just that it might use it out of the blue but as a shield to do all sorts of mischief. I do not believe there will be any way to stop this happening other than physical force."

Mr Bush is part of the American generation that refuses to forgive Iran for the 1979-81 hostage crisis. He leaves office in January 2009 and has said repeatedly that he does not want a legacy in which Iran has achieved superpower status in the region and come close to acquiring a nuclear weapon capability. The logic of this is that if diplomatic efforts fail to persuade Iran to stop uranium enrichment then the only alternative left is to turn to the military.

Mr Muravchik is intent on holding Mr Bush to his word: "The Bush administration have said they would not allow Iran nuclear weapons. That is either bullshit or they mean it as a clear code: we will do it if we have to. I would rather believe it is not hot air."

Other neo-cons elsewhere in Washington are opposed to an air strike but advocate a different form of military action, supporting Iranian armed groups, in particular the Mujahideen-e Khalq (MEK), even though the state department has branded it a terrorist organisation.

Raymond Tanter, founder of the Iran Policy Committee, which includes former officials from the White House, state department and intelligence services, is a leading advocate of support for the MEK. If it comes to an air strike, he favours bunker-busting bombs. "I believe the only way to get at the deeply buried sites at Natanz and Arak is probably to use bunker-buster bombs, some of which are nuclear tipped. I do not believe the US would do that but it has sold them to Israel."

Opposition support

Another neo-conservative, Meyrav Wurmser, director of the centre for Middle East policy at the Hudson Institute, also favours supporting Iranian opposition groups. She is disappointed with the response of the Bush administration so far to Iran and said that if the aim of US policy after 9/11 was to make the Middle East safer for the US, it was not working because the administration had stopped at Iraq. "There is not enough political will for a strike. There seems to be various notions of what the policy should be."

In spite of the president's veto on negotiation with Tehran, the state department has been involved since 2003 in back-channel approaches and meetings involving Iranian officials and members of the Bush administration or individuals close to it. But when last year the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, sent a letter as an overture, the state department dismissed it within hours of its arrival.

Support for negotiations comes from centrist and liberal thinktanks. Afshin Molavi, a fellow of the New America Foundation, said: "To argue diplomacy has not worked is false because it has not been tried. Post-90s and through to today, when Iran has been ready to dance, the US refused, and when the US has been ready to dance, Iran has refused. We are at a stage where Iran is ready to walk across the dance floor and the US is looking away."

He is worried about "a miscalculation that leads to an accidental war".

The catalyst could be Iraq. The Pentagon said yesterday that it had evidence - serial numbers of projectiles as well as explosives - of Iraqi militants' weapons that had come from Iran. In a further sign of the increased tension, Iran's main nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, cancelled a visit to Munich for what would have been the first formal meeting with his western counterparts since last year.

If it does come to war, Mr Muravchik said Iran would retaliate, but that on balance it would be worth it to stop a country that he said had "Death to America" as its official slogan.

"We have to gird our loins and prepare to absorb the counter-shock," he said.

World Atomic Agency Suspends 22 Programs Of Aid To Iran (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

The International Atomic Energy Agency said yesterday that it had suspended 22 of its 55 technical aid programs with Iran, giving Washington a modest victory in its efforts to isolate Tehran internationally in the hope of curbing its nuclear ambitions.

The agency, in a report to its board, said it had also suspended a number of lesser activities, including three fellowships, participation in a training course and procurement of 15 pieces of equipment.

Washington objected to the programs and projects as aiding Tehran's nuclear efforts, which like many around the world could have military as well as civilian uses.

The agency's action is one of the few cases in which reluctant allies have joined Washington's efforts to confront Iran. Recently, the United States had Iranians seized in Iraq, strengthened its armada in the Persian Gulf and sought to starve Iran of money it needs to revitalize its oil industry.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, based in Vienna, denounced the suspensions as "a very dangerous game" that would have no impact on its disputed nuclear program. Rather, he said in an interview, they will undermine the atomic energy agency's authority and many countries' desire to join it.

"This is a negative message to developing countries," Mr. Soltanieh said. "It will put in jeopardy their incentive to become members" of the agency and the treaty that seeks to halt the spread of nuclear weapons.

David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private group in Washington that tracks nuclear arms, called the suspensions mostly symbolic. "I don't think they'll do serious harm to Iran," he said.

The United States lobbied hard to have the nuclear agency cut roughly in half its 55 programs of technical aid to Iran, but it faced stiff opposition. Developing countries feared that the cuts would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own aid. And the agency, which routinely grants requests for technical assistance, resisted any political meddling with a worldwide effort on which it spends roughly $100 million a year.

"They've had a thankless task," a European diplomat, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of protocol, said Friday of the agency's rethinking of its cooperative efforts. The agency's officials, the diplomat added, "caved in to pressure."

An American official said Washington's position on the disputed projects was similar to that of Britain, France and Germany.

The agency, known as the world's nuclear policeman, has long enjoyed a mandate to promote the safe use of nuclear power and other nuclear technologies, through a complex system of technical aid programs with roughly a hundred countries. Although the aid is meant exclusively for civilian use, experts say that some of the knowledge involved can be useful in mastering the basic skills and technologies needed to make nuclear weapons.

Many experts say Iran is just years away from gaining the ability to make an atomic bomb, though Tehran insists that its nuclear program is strictly for generation of electricity and other peaceful ends.

In November, under pressure from the United States and its allies, the atomic agency denied an Iranian request for technical help in safely completing a heavy-water nuclear reactor. Tehran said it was to make isotopes for medical treatments. Critics said plutonium created by the reactor as a byproduct could fuel atomic bombs.

On Dec. 23, the United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran for refusing to stop its enrichment of uranium and called on the atomic agency, a United Nations body, to reconsider its aid to Tehran. The Council said such cooperation should center exclusively on projects related to food, agriculture, medicine, safety or other humanitarian purposes.

"No such technical cooperation," it said, "shall be provided that relates to the proliferation-sensitive nuclear activities."

On Friday, Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director, issued a report to its 35-nation board detailing the suspensions called for by the Security Council. It said Iran participated in 55 projects, including 15 individual and 40 regional and interregional endeavors.

It further said the agency's secretariat had determined that cooperation should continue for 33 projects but end for 22 others, including ones meant to aid Iran's development of nuclear power, its radiation processing of metals and plastics and its improvement of atomic management and strategic planning. The report added that the agency, on receiving Iranian requests for specific assistance, might grant exceptions for limited cooperation.

The report said, "The secretariat has evaluated, and established the necessary internal procedures to keep under review, all its technical assistance activities to ensure that none of them contribute to Iran's proliferation sensitive nuclear activities."

Mr. Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, said the suspensions would be likely to have large political repercussions and strengthen the hand of those Iranians who wanted to cut off all cooperation with the atomic agency.

"This will give ammunition to those who are putting pressure on the government," he said. "This whole thing is making a more poisonous environment."

U.N. Nuclear Agency Plans To Cancel Some Aid To Iran (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130835

TEHRAN — The U.N. nuclear agency signaled Friday that it was preparing to cancel technical aid on nearly half its nuclear cooperation projects with Iran, a significant step toward implementing sanctions aimed at halting the nation's controversial uranium enrichment program.

In a report to the International Atomic Energy Agency's board of governors in Vienna, the agency leadership recommended stopping all assistance on projects that could contribute to enrichment and reprocessing work prohibited under a sanctions resolution adopted by the U.N. Security Council in December.

The cuts, expected to be approved by the agency's board of directors in March, end all technical aid for "safe and reliable nuclear power generation," for strategic planning and for a nuclear technology center under development. But they leave intact assistance for medicine development, radioactive waste disposal, wastewater treatment and agriculture.

They do not affect the agency's assistance on preparation to operate the civilian nuclear power reactor under construction at Bushehr, which is exempted from the U.N. resolution.

"No technical assistance … can be provided to Iran that relates to the proliferation-sensitive nuclear activities specified in the resolution. Technical assistance, however, can be provided to Iran when, after a case-by-case screening, it is found to be in conformity with the provisions of the resolution," says the report, prepared by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

In Vienna, Iran's ambassador to the IAEA, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, was critical of the agency's decision.

"Our cooperation with the IAEA was in agriculture, medicine and peaceful affairs. So why was this halt imposed to our peaceful cooperation as well?" he told the Islamic Republic News Agency. He said the "technical and legal paradox" in the Security Council resolution "has prompted the IAEA to take this decision."

In all, the agency proposes to withdraw cooperation on as many as four of 15 national projects and as many as 14 of 34 regional projects, though a small number of those set for cancellation may be permitted after a case-by-case review.

Analysts said the IAEA action would probably not have a significant effect on Iran's nuclear program but would be likely to be perceived as a blow nonetheless. Iran is one of the largest recipients of U.N. nuclear technical cooperation.

"Iran will complain and say none of these projects are for enrichment or reprocessing, the sensitive technologies that were singled out in the resolution. But the agency is being careful to follow the letter of the Security Council resolution," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a nuclear specialist with the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London.

He said Iran, apparently caught by surprise by the Security Council's unanimous vote in favor of the sanctions resolution in December, has subsequently sought to downplay the measure's potential impact.

"They've been saying it wouldn't amount to anything. Well, here we have an indication that the IAEA says it does amount to something. Here's some projects that have to be stopped," he said. "It will contribute to the psychological discomfort of Iran."

David Albright, a former nuclear inspector who is president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security, said the action "will certainly irritate" Iran, in part because Tehran may not have the funds to proceed with all the projects without U.N. help.

Shortly after the report's release, official Iranian sources said chief nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani had fallen ill and would not attend a security conference this weekend when informal talks on a negotiated solution to the standoff were planned.

But Iranian television later said Larijani would attend the meeting.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is also scheduled to attend, but conference organizers said a direct meeting between the two men was unlikely.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is intended to develop nuclear energy, not weapons, is hoping to avoid a second, escalated round of sanctions, and analysts here say it might look favorably on ElBaradei's proposal for a three-month "time out" on uranium enrichment in exchange for a similar suspension of sanctions.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is supposed to make an announcement on the nuclear program during Sunday's planned street demonstrations in celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution. Many analysts believe he will announce some progress in setting up the first of 3,000 enrichment centrifuges Iran has said it is building at a major new underground facility in Natanz.

Once that milestone has been reached, there are signs some in Iran might advocate putting the centrifuge program on hold for a time. Abbas Maleki, a former deputy foreign minister, said the centrifuges could be placed on "warm standby," injected with warm air rather than uranium gas, until a decision was reached to use them for generating fuel.

"This would present a very strange case for the United States," he said in an interview. "The United States would then be in a corner. Because all of the maps and strategies in Washington have been designed for a defiant Iran. Not an Iran which is cooperating with the United Nations."

At the same time, he cautioned, Iran is still not prepared to make unilateral concessions.

"There are thousands of cameras watching what is going on with the nuclear program, and Iran is accepting," he said. "But at the same time, Iran wants to reach a face-saving solution. You cannot say to a government that they must say, 'I'm sorry, you are right.' Iran is not Libya."

IAEA Lifts More Nuclear Assistance (WT/AP)

By George Jahn

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- The U.N. nuclear watchdog agency yesterday suspended nearly half of the technical aid it now provides Iran, an action in line with sanctions imposed on the country for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) already suspended aid to Iran in five instances last month in line with Security Council sanctions calling for an end to assistance for programs that could be misused to make atomic weapons. Diplomats emphasized that the freeze was temporary and subject to review and approval by the 35-nation board of the IAEA next month.

Yesterday, the agency fully or partially suspended another 18 projects that it deemed could be misused. Those too were subject to review and approval by the board.

Iran gets IAEA technical aid for 15 projects and 40 more that involve other countries. The suspensions were across the board, but in the case of projects involving other countries affected only Iran.

A diplomat familiar with the issue said the United States -- along with key allies -- had been seeking to have up to half of the projects involving only Iran canceled, restricted or more closely monitored.

A U.S. official said Washington's position on which projects should be affected was "very similar" to that of the European powers Britain, France and Germany.

The officials all spoke on the condition of anonymity in return for divulging confidential information.

Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, was expected to attend a security conference in Munich this weekend, organizers said -- reversing an earlier announcement that he had pulled out.

Klaus Treude, a spokesman for the Munich Conference on Security Policy, did not give reasons for Mr. Larijani's decision to go ahead with his appearance. Earlier yesterday, conference officials said he had canceled because of sickness.

The United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany all want Iran to suspend its enrichment program and have acted as a group in trying to engage Tehran on the issue. But their approaches and priorities have differed over the past year.

Russian and Chinese reluctance to impose harsh sanctions on Tehran -- as initially demanded by Washington -- have created the greatest pressure. Both nations share economic and strategic interests with Iran.

Differences over how severely to punish Tehran for its refusal to suspend enrichment led to months of disputes before agreement was reached in December on a Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions that fell short of the harsher measures sought by the United States.

The sanctions include a review of technical aid to Iran -- programs meant to bolster the peaceful use of nuclear energy in medicine, agriculture or power generation.

IAEA Suspends Iran Aid Projects (BBC)

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The UN nuclear watchdog, the IAEA, says it has frozen almost half its technical aid projects involving Iran.

DOJ_NMG_0130837

The IAEA says its move is to comply with UN sanctions imposed on Tehran late last year over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Twenty-two projects have been suspended, according to an IAEA report.

Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, is to meet EU diplomats at a forum in Germany on Saturday, despite earlier reports to the contrary.

European officials hope to hold informal talks with him on the nuclear stand-off at the top-level security conference in Munich.

'Message of inducement'

The IAEA gives technical aid to dozens of countries on the peaceful use of nuclear energy in fields such as medicine, agriculture and power generation.

The nuclear watchdog has 55 projects that involve Iran.

Of these, 22 have now been frozen to comply with the UN sanctions, which call for an end to programmes that could be exploited by Iran to develop nuclear weapons.

The IAEA board is expected to formally back the move, recommended by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei, when it meets next month.

The BBC's Kerry Skyring in Vienna says that the IAEA has been under pressure from the United States to take a tough line.

U.S. Accidentally Attacks Kurdish Outpost, Killing Several (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel, David S. Cloud

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 — An American military helicopter killed as many as nine Kurdish militia fighters early Friday in the northern city of Mosul when the aircraft mistakenly attacked a guard post.

The guard post protected the local offices of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the political party of the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani. The attack stunned Patriotic Union officials, whose leadership and militia are close allies of United States forces. They said their base and the surrounding guard posts were well known to the American military in Mosul.

“Everybody knows that it is a P.U.K. base and is used for protecting the main road between Mosul and Erbil,” said Kabir Goran, a senior Patriotic Union official, who added that the guard post was less than a mile from the party offices. “We have daily contacts with the Americans and they have been to the base.”

An aide to Mr. Talabani said he had asked the American military for information about the mistake.

The United States command in Baghdad said American troops erroneously believed that they had identified insurgents near the hide-out of a bomb-making cell linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The command said the strike killed five Kurds, described as policemen; Kurdish officials said as many as nine were killed.

Also on Friday, an insurgent group that has taken credit for several recent downings of United States helicopters released a video that it said showed a missile shooting down the Marine CH-46 Sea Knight transport that crashed Wednesday, killing all seven on board.

But Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, a senior officer on the joint staff at the Pentagon, told reporters in Washington on Friday that early indications suggested that mechanical failure had caused the CH-46 crash; he warned against “drawing conclusions from things that are posted on the Internet.”

The American helicopter attack in Mosul struck members of a militia force that is a crucial ally of the United States. The Kurds and their fighters, known as pesh merga, live in mountainous northeastern Iraq, but their control extends west to the Tigris River and Mosul, a city of close to two million. Sunni Arabs make up most of western Mosul, but Kurds dominate the eastern half.

In a statement, the American military said that after observing armed men near the guard post, American troops fired warning shots and called out in Arabic and Kurdish for the men to put down their arms.

An American helicopter then “observed hostile intention” and fired on the guard post. The military statement did not describe specifically what the soldiers saw the Kurdish troops do. But it said that as the helicopter attacked, American ground troops took fire from the bunker. Kurdish officials said six other pesh merga were wounded, some cared for later by American troops.

In the video posted on the Internet by a group calling itself the Islamic State of Iraq, the Sea Knight helicopter, distinctive for its two large rotors atop either end of its long, tube-shaped fuselage, is flying toward the camera. Then it banks hard right as if taking evasive action. After turning a half-circle, an object darts into the screen from the right, trailed by a curl of black smoke. The object comes close to the helicopter, though no impact is visible. But moments after the object enters the frame an explosion rips through the helicopter, which drifts to the ground in flames.

A senior defense official called into question the authenticity of the video, saying that a Cobra attack helicopter was close behind the Sea Knight in the moments before the crash, and that the Cobra pilot saw no sign of ground fire. The official also said the video appeared suspicious because there was no sign of the Cobra in any frame. “It does not show the wingman flying anywhere near the CH-46,” the official said.

The helicopter crash, into an open field near the insurgent-heavy town of Karma, between Falluja and Baghdad in Anbar Province, was the latest of a half-dozen crashes or downings of aircraft over the past three weeks. Military officials are concerned that insurgents have devised new tactics or obtained new equipment that makes American aircraft more vulnerable.

Military investigators suspect that a shoulder-fired missile may have played a role in bringing down an American AH-64 helicopter on Feb. 2, according to a Pentagon document describing possible causes of the recent crashes.

Officials said there had not been a final determination of the cause of the AH-64 crash; no further details could be learned about the evidence suggesting a missile attack. The document noted that the helicopter also might have been struck by fire from a heavy-caliber machine gun.

General Lute said that four of the six helicopters that crashed recently were brought down by enemy fire, but that there was no “definitive evidence that there were missile attacks involved” in any of them. He added that it was too soon to say that attacks on helicopters had increased or that insurgents had adopted more effective tactics.

In addition to the Feb. 2 crash, those brought down by insurgents include a UH-60 that was hit by ground fire on Jan. 20 in Diyala Province; another AH-64 that was shot down near Najaf, on Jan. 28; and a Bell 412 helicopter belonging to an American contractor that was brought down south of Baghdad on Jan. 31, the document said.

U.S. Troops Kill Several Kurds In Mosul (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- U.S. forces killed eight Kurdish soldiers and wounded nine others at an established checkpoint in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul on Friday, Kurdish officials said.

A U.S. military statement offered a differing account of the incident, saying that U.S. troops killed five Kurdish police officers after the men ignored orders to lay down their weapons and exhibited "hostile intention."

"What the American statement said is not true," said Kabir Goran, deputy director of the Mosul office of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, a Kurdish political party. "They are trying to cover the massacre that they carried out at that military point," he said in a telephone interview.

"It is impossible that we attack the Americans," he said. "Their patrols are passing by that point every day, and we never attack them."

The U.S. statement said the American soldiers were in the al-Karama neighborhood of Mosul early Friday preparing for a raid against members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

U.S. soldiers saw a group of armed men in a "bunker" near the building where the soldiers suspected insurgents were housed and instructed them to put down their weapons, the statement said.

"They were called out in Arabic and in Kurdish," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We had a Kurdish speaker out there."

A U.S. helicopter swooped in to take a closer look, and soldiers on board "observed hostile action from the bunker and exercised proper self-defense measures in response to the assessed threat," the statement said.

After the operation, the U.S. military turned over five bodies along with "nine detainees," to local police officials, the statement said. Garver said no insurgents were killed or wounded in the incident and no American troops were hurt.

Also Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, issued a statement and released a video purporting to show the downing of a large transport helicopter that crashed Wednesday in Anbar province.

The video, posted on the Web site of the Search for International Terrorist Entities Institute, which tracks claims made by insurgent groups, shows a twin-rotor helicopter being struck by a missile. The helicopter wobbles in the air, catches on fire and slams into the ground.

Garver, the military spokesman, said investigators are skeptical of the authenticity of the video.

"We've seen the video, and there's nothing in the video that connects it to the helicopter crash on Wednesday," he said, referring to the incident in which a twin-rotor CH-46 Sea Knight came down, killing five Marines and two sailors. He said the account of the crash provided by the Sea Knight's wingman conflicts with what the video shows. Four military helicopters have crashed in Iraq this year, killing 23 service members. Five private security contractors aboard two civilian helicopters were killed in Baghdad Jan. 23 after they came under attack. One of those helicopters was downed.

On Jan. 31, another civilian helicopter came under attack but made an emergency landing, a U.S. official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. No one was injured in that incident, the official said.

Meanwhile, Iraqi police said a group of armed men wearing Iraqi National Guard uniforms kidnapped 13 men in a village north of Hilla on Friday morning. Eleven of the hostages were later killed, according to Capt. Muthanna Ahmed, a police spokesman in Babil province.

Police tracked the hostages and tried to free them, but had to retreat after being attacked with improvised explosive devices and small-arms fire, Ahmed said. Ten of the men killed were Sunnis and one was a Shiite, he said.

Also Friday, the U.S. military disclosed the deaths in combat Thursday of three U.S. soldiers in the western province of Anbar.

U.S. Friendly Fire Kills Kurd Security Force (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A U.S. airstrike accidentally killed eight members of a Kurdish security force and injured another six who were manning an observation point near a political office in the northern city of Mosul, Iraqi officials said Friday.

The U.S. military said that five, not eight, Kurdish police officers died in the attack, which it said had been aimed at bomb-makers affiliated al-Qaida.

U.S. military officials also said that three American soldiers had been killed Thursday during combat in western Anbar province. The attacks brought to 3,118 the number of U.S. troops killed since 2003, according to the icasualties.org Web site. South of the capital in Basra, a British soldier died in a roadside bomb attack and three others were injured, according to a statement from the British Ministry of Defense.

A statement from the U.S. military said that American troops had received intelligence that bomb makers connected to al-Qaida were operating in the Karama neighborhood of Mosul. Seeing armed men near a targeted bunker, ground forces fired warning shots and made several calls in Arabic and Kurdish for the men to lay down their weapons, the statement said.

As the men began shooting at the ground forces, an American aircraft "observed hostile intention from the bunker and exercised proper self-defense measures in response to the assessed threat," said the statement. It expressed "deepest sympathies to the families of those individuals killed."

Kurdish officials reacted angrily, saying the airstrike on one of the main roads in Mosul was inexplicable.

"We don't have any explanation for what the Americans did," said Kabir Amir Koran, an official with a local Kurdish party.

Ali Sourchi, a 30-year-old grocer, said he had been watching a movie shortly before midnight when the power suddenly went out. He went outside to check his generator and saw the airstrike. He fled inside, fearing what might happen next, he said.

"Sounds of the bombings continued until 2:00 a.m.," he said. "In the morning, we found stone and rubble where the guards' position used to be."

Abdullah Bardi, an official with Kurdish militia forces, described the area as an insurgent stronghold.

"We have placed checkpoints in the area to secure the office and those who come through this way," he said, adding that Kurdish officials are investigating the strike. "We are not satisfied with an apology."

The U.S. military increasingly relies on air support during missions.

Another airstrike killed eight suspected insurgents Thursday night in Baghdad, according to a separate statement from the U.S. military.

Baghdad authorities said Friday they had recovered the bodies of 32 people dumped in various neighborhoods. Elsewhere, bombings and kidnappings continued to spread death and destruction.

A car bomb went off south of Mosul near a police patrol, injuring eight. Also north of the capital, in the disputed city of Kirkuk, a car bomb injured a police official and seven others Friday afternoon. The previous night, another car bomb wounded a politician affiliated with the minority Turkmen party.

Authorities in Hillah, south of the capital, said Friday that armed men dressed as police commandos kidnapped 13 men the previous night. Two were freed, but the bodies of the remaining 11 were found nearby.

In Haswa, also south of Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed one civilian and injured seven others.

U.S. Strike Mistakenly Kills 5 Kurds (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. helicopters targeting insurgents mistakenly killed at least five allied Kurdish militiamen in the northern city of Mosul early yesterday. The military also reported three more American soldiers killed in combat, pushing the U.S. death toll to 33 in the first eight days of the month.

Officials said the Kurds were killed about midnight as they guarded a branch of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, a political party led by Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a key supporter of U.S. efforts in Iraq.

The U.S. military said the strike was carried out after American ground forces spotted armed men in a bunker near a building they thought was being used to make bombs for al Qaeda in Iraq. The troops called out in Arabic and Kurdish telling the men to put down their weapons and also fired warning shots before the helicopters opened fire, the military said.

Five men later determined to be Kurdish police officers were killed and nine others were wounded, the U.S. military said, offering condolences to the families of those who died. Kurdish officials put the casualty toll at eight killed and six wounded.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman denounced the air strike, but a spokesman for the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, Azad Jundiyan, said the party realized the air strike was a mistake. "We are allied with the coalition; it was a friendly fire incident, not an intentionally hostile act," he said.

Mr. Jundiyan identified the dead as peshmerga -- Kurdish militiamen who once battled Saddam Hussein's regime. Many peshmerga have been incorporated into the Iraqi army since the U.S.-led invasion.

Three more American soldiers died Thursday in fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said yesterday. More than half the 33 American deaths this month have been in Anbar.

In southern Iraq, a roadside bomb killed a British soldier, and wounded three.

Among the Americans killed this month were seven who died when a CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter crashed in Anbar on Wednesday.

An al Qaeda-linked insurgent group, the Islamic State in Iraq, posted an Internet video yesterday showing what it said was the downing of the Marine helicopter. The U.S. military has said it did not think the craft was shot down, although ground fire has brought down several helicopters recently.

Posted on a Web forum often used by Islamist militants, the two-minute video shows a helicopter that appears to be a Sea Knight in flight. An object trailing smoke is seen in the sky nearby, then the craft bursts into flames with a spray of debris. It is not clear, however, whether the streaking object is a missile, and it cannot be clearly seen hitting the helicopter.

Lt. Gen. Douglas E. Lute, chief operations officer for the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington, said there were indications the crash was caused by mechanical failure, although an investigation was still under way. He said militants have falsely claimed responsibility for aircraft crashes in the past.

In violence across Iraq yesterday, at least 36 persons were killed or found dead.

Added Troops Yield Few Results Yet In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

A month after the Bush administration announced a "surge" in troops for Baghdad, Iraqis are still waiting for anything to change.

Fewer than 20% of the additional Iraqi and American troops have arrived so far. And the roughly 5,000 that have arrived have yet to make a visible impact in this sprawling city of 6 million people, where thousands of paramilitary gunmen patrol the streets.

U.S. officials are trying to manage expectations both domestically and in Iraq, continually asserting that the new forces will slowly take up positions in the capital over the coming months.

But after one of the bloodiest weeks since the U.S.-led invasion of 2003, Iraqis are increasingly impatient. A series of high-profile attacks on both civilians and security forces killed more than 1,000 Iraqis and at least 33 U.S. troops in the first nine days of the month.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has said he is investigating whether he can speed the pace of the troop buildup. But a senior Pentagon official said this week that it was unlikely that U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad any faster than planned. The five brigades going to the capital are due to arrive one per month, with the last coming in May.

So far, 3,000 U.S. troops and about 2,000 Iraqi counterparts have arrived here, according to U.S. officials. "I will be surprised if we can generate forces faster," said the senior official. Speeding the movement of U.S. forces into Baghdad would require a cut in training time, he said — a move resisted by Army officials.

In a handful of mostly Sunni Muslim neighborhoods, residents have noticed more American and Iraqi patrols. But many Iraqis interviewed said they saw no more security forces on the street than usual.

"The situation is the same or worse," said Hameed Abdullah, a 43-year-old from a southern Baghdad neighborhood. Abdullah heard about the security plan on TV but said he had seen little evidence of it in his area. Most shops are still closed, and security forces manning checkpoints do not search the cars.

Last week, he said, his neighbor of 10 years was killed in a drive-by shooting. "Every day someone I know is killed," Abdullah said.

Ahmed Samarie, a 26-year-old engineer who lives in Khadra, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood on the west side, offered an equally dark outlook. Militias and insurgents threaten residents in his neighborhood but face few consequences, he said.

"The Americans pass through the main street all the time, but they never actually patrol or ask what people want done here," he said. "They couldn't care less."

Samarie was skeptical of the Baghdad security plan, which he thought would target only Sunnis. One neighborhood close to his house, Adil, was recently raided by American and Iraqi troops, he said, but Hurriya, a troubled Shiite Muslim neighborhood nearby, was not.

"I will believe this security plan is for real if they start going into Shiite areas and purging them of gunmen," he said. "Otherwise, it's just another scam."

One American advisor to the Iraqi Defense Ministry said that, so far, additional troops have flowed into the least politically sensitive parts of the capital, which are typically Sunni, saving the more difficult Shiite neighborhoods for later. The U.S.-backed Iraqi government is dominated by Shiites and depends on radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr for its majority in parliament, making any move against Shiite areas politically problematic.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters at a Baghdad news conference this week that the security plan "is not going to target any particular sector. It is going to be equitably enforced across the board, for all Iraqis." He specifically said that U.S. and Iraqi forces would have a presence in Sadr City, the huge Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, which is Sadr's base.

Baghdad is already a deadly maze of checkpoints and concrete, manned by both legitimate security forces and gunmen posing as such. Moving through the city is difficult and dangerous. Many Iraqis are prisoners in their neighborhoods, if not their homes.

Before the troop buildup began, there were about 67,000 legitimate government security forces in the city — about 24,500 American troops, 17,500 Iraqi army soldiers and about 25,000 Iraqi police officers.

In addition, the city is home to an unknown number of private security contractors and a vast array of sectarian militiamen.

The 3,000 additional U.S. troops are among 21,500 that President Bush has pledged for Iraq, of whom 17,500 are to come to Baghdad. The Iraqi government is to commit between 8,000 and 10,000 additional troops to the capital, including the 2,000 who have already arrived.

But because Iraqi security forces suffer from widespread absenteeism, the total number may be much lower. U.S. officials have estimated that Iraqi brigades are deploying at about 60% of their full strength.

According to the plan, mixed units of U.S. and Iraqi forces will be deployed throughout nine Baghdad districts. So far, 10 so-called Joint Security Stations have been established to house those units. There will be about three times as many once the troops are fully in place, which would be May at the earliest.

"We're just in the opening days," Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute said in a Pentagon briefing Friday. "We should not expect quick, easy or dramatic results."

No 'magic bullet' seen

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor also counseled patience Friday.

"It's really important to caution people that it's going to take time," Fintor said during a call with reporters in Baghdad. "We're months away from seeing any concrete results. Right now we have to stress there's not going to be any magic bullet for solving Iraq's problems."

Caldwell acknowledged "some confusion" about the timing of the plan. "There is not a per se start date," he said. "You could say that the plan is ongoing. We're kind of rolling into this plan."

But as that happens, Iraqis have grown weary.

In Jamiya, formerly an upscale neighborhood bustling with cafes and dozens of shops, most places are shuttered after a series of bombings.

"The same Iraqi army checkpoints are on the main street and they don't do much," said Nawfal Sabbar, 29. "U.S. Humvees pass by on the same street but that's all they do — pass by."

He is one of the last young men in his area. Most others have left the country. Sabbar and his family are planning to leave for Qatar in a week but are having a hard time finding anyone to look after their house, even for money. He doesn't think the much-vaunted security plan will bring any change.

"Too many people have been killed, and many more people will want revenge for all these killings," he said. "Revenge is in the air. It will last a very long time."

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The new commander of US forces in Iraq, Lt Gen David Petraeus, is assuming control, ahead of a fresh push to quell violence in the capital, Baghdad.

Gen Petraeus will oversee President George W Bush's security plan, under which 21,500 extra American troops will be sent to Iraq.

Gen Petraeus, a veteran of the conflict, has called his task "hard but not hopeless".

Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in bombings in Baghdad this year alone.

DOJ_NMG_0130843

Gen Petraeus was named as Gen George Casey's replacement last month - part of a major shake-up of the US military tackling the conflict in Iraq.

Gen Casey has been promoted to US Army chief of staff.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said, testifying to the Senate armed forces committee last month.

"But hard is not hopeless."

The BBC's Jane Peel in Baghdad says Gen Petraeus' chances of success could be helped by an apparently changed attitude from the Iraqi Prime Minister, Nouri Maliki.

Mr Maliki has promised that all those involved in the violence will be legitimate targets, she says.

In the past, his Shia dominated government has been accused of protecting the Shia militias.

No-one in Baghdad expects an overnight transformation, but both the Iraqis and the Americans will be desperate for some early and tangible results, our correspondent adds.

US and Iraqi forces have been carrying out a low-level offensive against Shia militias in the capital for weeks, seen as a prelude to a major campaign.

The new offensive will involve US and Iraqi forces, thousands of whom are already on the ground, sweeping Baghdad for militants and illegally held weapons, US military officials say.

The Iraqi government has said it will announce guidelines for the new plan in the coming days.

However Mr Bush's plan continues to face considerable opposition both from Democrats and members of his own Republican party, who want an earlier transfer of security to Iraqi leaders.

America's Striving General (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

When a US army officer receives his fourth star, under normal circumstances it would be the crowning moment in a distinguished career. But the circumstances surrounding the promotion of General David Petraeus were anything but normal.

After President George W. Bush nominated Gen Petraeus to command US forces in Iraq, the 54-year-old West Point graduate received a slew of e-mails with messages that said it all: "Congratulations - I think."

By then, however, the general was under no illusions about the mission he had accepted, arguably one of the most unenviable jobs on the planet. Arriving back in Baghdad this week, the -warrior-intellectual - he has a PhD in international relations from Princeton University but revels in challenging men half his age to push-up competitions - was beginning his third tour.

When he commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq, Gen Petraeus would repeatedly ask: "Tell me how this ends?" Four years later, the question is his to answer.

Most people agree that theman who wrote a PhD dissertation entitled "The American Military and the Lessons of Vietnam" is uniquely qualified to oversee the controversial military "surge" that Mr Bush has ordered for Iraq.

Since graduating from West Point in 1974, in the closing stages of the Vietnam war, Gen Petraeus has maintained the reputation - enshrined in the academy's yearbook - as a "striver to the max". The 5ft 9in fitness fanatic and marathon runner won several prizes at the highly competitive US Army ranger school and later graduated top of his class at the Army Command and General Staff College.

After US-led forces toppled Saddam Hussein in Baghdad in 2003, Gen Petraeus took the 101st Airborne Division to the northern city of Mosul, where he gained accolades for establishing and overseeing Taskforce Tom Sawyer. The US effort to win the hearts and minds of the local population focused on rebuilding the city and restoring stability rather than kicking in doors.

Iraqis referred to Gen Petraeus as "King David", a sobriquet some officers use to refer to his perceived arrogance. But some have privately argued that his arrogance and ambition will be an asset since he will take risks that his more cautious predecessor, General George Casey, would have avoided.

Robert Gates, the new US de-fence secretary, yesterday des-cribed that suggestion as "baloney", insisting that he consulted many senior officers about who should lead the US effort in Iraq. "In virtually every case, Gen Petraeus was their first choice . . . even Casey," said Mr Gates.

Whether Gen Petraeus will again be crowned King David remains to be seen. In the 16 months since his last tour, conditions in Iraq have deteriorated sharply. The US military death toll has risen to more than 3,100 and even conservative estimates put Iraqi deaths at about 60,000.

The magnitude of the challenge was underscored last week when the US intelligence community issued a bleak assessment concluding Iraq had des-cended into what could be des-cribed as "civil war plus" be-cause of the different concurrent conflicts.

Gen Petraeus last served in Iraq as the US commander responsible for training Iraqi security forces. While Mr Bush was hoping American troops could "stand down" as Iraqi forces "stood up", the escalating violence has forced him to send Gen Petraeus to Iraq to oversee the entry of 21,500 extra US troops in a last-ditch effort to pacify Baghdad.

Gen Petraeus is aware that the US domestic political landscape has changed dramatically. Many military officers are concerned that the American public will not tolerate the war much longer and that still-supportive politicians will abandon ship.

Democrats opposing the surge have increasingly been joined by influential Republicans, such as John Warner, the respected Virginia senator, who is concerned that US soldiers are being caught in the crossfire of a civil war.

Before leaving Fort Leavenworth, on the banks of the Missouri, for his new home on the less placid banks of the Euphrates, Gen Petraeus had a taste of what it feels like to be caught between warring factions.

Senators used his nomination hearing before the armed services committee last month as a proxy issue to debate the planned surge. However, while there was intense disagreement over the policy, Gen Petraeus was lavished with praise.

The general must have known his promotion was safe when Edward Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democratic senator who specialised in lambasting Donald Rumsfeld, the recently ousted defence secretary, called him an "outstanding military officer". The Senate later overwhelmingly confirmed Gen Petraeus. In contrast, Gen Casey's nomination for army chief of staff drew opposition from a number of senators.

Gen Petraeus appeared calm and confident before the sometimes bellicose politicians on the committee, including heavyweights such as Republican John McCain and Democrat Hillary Clinton.

Displaying political skills that may help navigate the more treacherous political waters of Baghdad, Gen Petraeus mollified the senators by admitting past failures in Iraq. Taking full advantage of their post-Rumsfeld world, many senators asked whether the general would give his honest opinion to Congress.

"I will give you my best professional military advice and if people don't like it, then they can find someone else to give better professional military advice," he replied. "I am not a politician. I'm a guy who wears a uniform and has for 32 years plus . . . I'd just really like to leave it at that . . . learning that minefields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions."

There were also bursts of humour - notably absent when Mr Rumsfeld used to testify. Asked whether a resolution against the surge would affect troop morale, Gen Petraeus joked: "I seriously doubt that our troops are sitting watching C-Span 3 in Iraq right now," in reference to the US public television channel that was broadcasting the hearing.

While Gen Petraeus won over the senators, however, the real battle is in Iraq. While he has called for patience, politicians in the US, who are becoming increasingly sceptical as the 2008 presidential election season opens, may not give him the time he says he needs. "You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," said Mrs Clinton. "You are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis."

New US General In Iraq Hotseat (AFP)

By Bill Ickes

AFP, February 10, 2007

General David Petraeus, a 54-year-old paratrooper with a reputation as a deep thinker, has taken on the toughest job in the US military as head of American-led forces in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0130845

Petraeus was named commander of the 140,000-strong force at a ceremony Saturday in Camp Victory, a massive American base on the outskirts of Baghdad, the violent epicentre of a bitter sectarian war.

He is tasked with turning around a faltering mission which faces mounting US casualties and a dramatic collapse in domestic political support.

"Now is the time for all Iraqis to reject violence and crime and corruption and to rise up against those who employ such methods to further their goals," the general told assembled dignitaries.

"The rucksack of responsibility is very heavy. In truth, it's too heavy for any one person to bear, and we will all have to share the burden and move forward together," he said, adding "the prospects for success are good."

"Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife," he warned, promising to provide "the best leadership I can muster."

Petraeus, who has a doctorate in international relations, took over command from General George Casey, who has been promoted to army chief of staff.

The ceremony, conducted under a crystal chandelier in the grandiose rotunda of one of ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's former palaces, was presided over by US Central Command leader General John Abizaid.

Even as the handover took place, violence continued around Iraq, with police reporting at least nine Iraqis killed in various attacks.

Four people were killed in central Baghdad and nine wounded, including two policemen, when a car bomb exploded, according to security sources.

South of the capital, in the town of Al-Mussayib, two women and a man were killed in a gun attack on their house, said police Captain Mthanna Hassan.

A suicide car bomber killed one Iraqi soldier and wounded five people, including two troops, in an attack on a patrol near the northern town of Tall Afar, Colonel Abdelkarim Al-Juburi told AFP.

In nearby Mosul a policeman was shot dead in his car, he added.

Petraeus's chances of success hang on the latest in a series of what have so far been failed US attempts to regain control of Baghdad and central Iraq, a region plagued by Shiite militias and roving gangs of Sunni insurgents.

Daily attacks on US-led forces and Iraqi civilians have increased steadily since the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003, and more than doubled in the 12 months since Sunni bombers destroyed a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Ahead of the ceremony, Casey told reporters: "My greatest fear is that the Iraqis can't put the past behind them.

"We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny. We can't liberate them from the fears and prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves," he said.

Handing command to Petraeus, he smiled: "Dave, as we say in Iraq, 'Lots done, lots to do'. You won't want for hard work."

More than 3,100 US soldiers have died since the invasion and support for a continuing US presence in Iraq among American voters is at an all-time low, despite President George W. Bush's promise of a new strategy.

At least 16 US, British and Polish troops have died this week alone.

As one of the architects of the new plan, which will see 21,500 extra US troops flown in to work with Iraqi units trying to pacify Baghdad and Anbar province, Petraeus is now the figurehead for a controversial gamble.

Petraeus -- who has spent a total of two-and-a-half years in Iraq since the invasion as commander of the 101 Airborne Division and head of the mission to train Iraqi forces -- is hailed as an intellectual and Iraq's best hope.

But critics of the "surge strategy" of pouring in more troops to kill off the sectarian war and impose Iraqi government authority warn the situation may already have spun beyond the control of the brightest minds.

"Some disasters are irretrievable," warned a report from the influential Washington think-tank, the Council on Foreign Relations, released Friday.

According to a new counter-insurgency manual drafted under Petraeus himself, for victory he would need "at least double the number of troops the United States will have on the ground once the surge is implemented."

Resolution Good For Surge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

TWO WEEKS AGO, the Senate seemed poised to approve a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's planned deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. Such a resolution was viewed — even by some of its supporters — as less a policy prescription than a warning to Bush to live up to his promise that, "surge" or no surge, the U.S. mission in Iraq isn't "open-ended."

But thanks to parliamentary missteps by the new majority, some shrewd maneuvering by the Republican minority and Democratic skittishness about being accused of not supporting the troops, an anti-surge resolution is on hold in the Senate and instead gathering momentum in the House of Representatives. Meanwhile, supporters of the administration are suggesting that Congress should mind its own business.

We disagree. Congress should go on record as a way of pressing Bush and the Iraqi government to make the most of what may be the last politically realistic chance of pacifying that country and keeping it together.

An anti-surge resolution is one way for Congress to make Bush choose between two competing interpretations of his Jan. 10 speech unveiling a "new way forward" in Iraq: (1) That "if the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people"; and (2) that "failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States." Like many in Congress who support an anti-surge resolution, we believe the first message is the only tenable one. That the Bush administration itself might be leaning in that direction was suggested this week by Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates' testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Gates expressed hope that the surge would succeed in pacifying Baghdad and ramping up the ability of Iraqi forces to maintain order on their own. But he also acknowledged that the Pentagon was studying alternatives — notably a redeployment of U.S. combat troops to Iraqi Kurdistan or Kuwait — in case the new strategy fails. Gates said the surge wasn't the "last chance" to salvage Iraq, but the backup plan he described was to move U.S. troops "out of harm's way."

Perhaps most revealingly, Gates told Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W. Va.) that "if the plan to quiet Baghdad is successful and the Iraqis step up, I would hope we would be able to begin drawing down our troops later this year." The implication is that the success — or failure — of the surge will be pronounced sooner rather than later. Gates' comments irritated Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who told the defense secretary that "if you're asking somebody in eight months to solve a 1,400-year-old religious dispute, bring people together who have suffered a dictatorship for 30 years, reconstruct an economy that was raped by a dictator — that's a pretty tall order."

Too tall, we would reply, if it requires the open-ended commitment that even Bush now seems to disavow. The president, Gates and Gen. David H. Petraeus should be given time to make a success of their new approach, but that time should be measured in months, not years. If it takes a resolution from Congress to make that point to the president, so be it.

For Eminent Sunni, Lessons In Weakness (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam Z. al-Zobaee's cousin has been in government custody for eight months.

He hasn't been charged, Zobaee said, and the formal inquiries he himself has made to have the oil engineer released, or at least get the case before a judge, have been rebuffed.

"He was detained because they looked at him like he didn't belong here," Zobaee said during a recent interview in his spacious office in the fortified Green Zone. "He has been in detention for eight months -- and I am a deputy prime minister."

Zobaee, in principle one of Iraq's most powerful men, offers the anecdote to illustrate his powerlessness, which he says is a product of the Shiite-led government's efforts to cast aside high-ranking Sunnis like him.

Shiite political leaders say Zobaee, one of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's two deputies, deserves his placeholder status.

"He does not deserve power," said Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker and a senior member of Maliki's Dawa party. "His group is accused of committing terrorism, and he always gets himself involved in defending terrorism. We have [Sunni] parties that are participating in the government during the day, but they are working at night cooperating with terrorists."

The marginalization of Zobaee -- who denies being an instigator of violence -- is a prominent example of the strained relationship between Sunni and Shiite leaders, an acrimony that many see as the main obstacle to deterring violence and laying the foundation for reconciliation in Iraq.

"We need, first, reconciliation inside the government," Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of parliament, said in an interview. "They have never sat together to have a sound dialogue to agree on who the enemy is."

Maliki and U.S. military officials say Iraqis are taking the lead role in a security plan to pacify the capital and other parts of the country. But Zobaee, who nominally oversees security affairs, said he has been all but left out of preparations for and implementation of the plan. He said it is foolhardy to put Iraqi officials at the helm.

"If you ask me, 'Do you think the multinational forces can put their faith in the hands of the Iraqi government,' I will answer you: 'No. We don't have the right army.' "

In Zobaee's estimation, Iraq is not even "50 percent" ready to roll out the plan. And he accused the Shiite-dominated government of keeping him out of the loop on matters that should be among his primary responsibilities.

"I don't have any authority," he said during an hour-long interview in which he often sounded exasperated. "And always there are obstacles in our way, and we don't find someone to listen to us."

Zobaee also accused the Interior Ministry, which Maliki oversees, of unduly detaining tens of thousands of Sunnis, some of whom, Zobaee said, have been tortured in detention centers. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have been detained in recent years without charges or judicial oversight.

Sunni leaders say the Shiite-led government is only appearing to crack down on Shiite militias -- including the Mahdi Army, which is led by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- in order to appease the United States. But they acknowledge that it does so with trepidation, recognizing the considerable political power of Sadr and other Shiite militia leaders. Sadr is one of Maliki's key backers.

Shiites, on the other hand, say they cannot share details about security operations with Sunni leaders because of fears that the Sunnis will disclose the plans to insurgent groups.

U.S. officials say reconciliation is vital to ending violence in Iraq.

"The only way we will achieve peace and bring real stability in this country is the political process," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a senior U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said Wednesday. "And the political process will allow the reconciliation to take place."

The culture of distrust and finger-pointing in the Iraqi government plays out frequently in parliament, where shouting matches are common and sessions often end in walkouts.

Maliki has repeatedly stressed the importance of overcoming sectarian differences.

"Observers will hopefully conclude that the operations are Iraqi ones aimed at achieving a joint goal," he told military commanders in a speech televised Tuesday. "When operations are carried out based on equality and justice, they will be respected by all of the Iraqis and will silence the voices that will allege that a certain operation has targeted this or that sect."

But Maliki himself hasn't always remained above the sectarian fray. During a parliamentary session Jan. 25, he dressed down a Sunni lawmaker who criticized Maliki's security plan.

Abdul Nasser al-Janabi, who belongs to a Sunni bloc that has pressed for a withdrawal of U.S. troops, demanded parliamentary oversight of the security effort.

An irritated Maliki admonished him: "This brother will trust the prime ministry when I bring your file forward and hold you responsible."

Maliki took the most powerful job in the Iraqi government after a coalition of Shiite political parties won the most seats in December 2005 elections.

He had virtually no control over the appointment of his deputies, who were selected based on the number of votes their parties received. Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih, a Kurd, chairs a panel that oversees energy and oil policy.

Zobaee, a former university professor and union leader who has a doctorate in agronomy, was given the social services and defense portfolios. The latter in theory gives him oversight of the armed forces.

Maliki kept control of the Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police forces as well as detention facilities not run by the U.S. military.

The sectarian antipathy has made lawmaking an arduous and contentious task, even on issues that don't touch on security.

"It is preventing the parliament from doing anything," said Othman, the Kurdish lawmaker. And instead of curbing sectarian tension, he said, government leaders are exacerbating it. "The problem is with the leadership, the religious leadership and the political leadership. It is preventing the parliament from doing anything."

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Kurd and speaker of parliament, said the impact of sectarian differences on the political process could be worse.

"Iraq has not been dismembered into three countries," Mashhadani said during a recent roundtable discussion with reporters. "The presence of a united parliament under the same dome amid bombings is a hopeful and encouraging sign."

With Rumsfeld Gone, Rice Now Target Of War Anger (CNN)

By Elise Labott

CNN.com, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Condoleezza Rice's appearance Wednesday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was downright tame compared with the reception she got last month, when she sat before the same committee to explain President Bush's "way forward" in Iraq.

On January 11, the secretary of state got an earful from both sides of the aisle. Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, a Democrat who is running for president, called the Bush administration's Iraq policy "a fool's paradise," and Sen. Chuck Hagel, another possible White House hopeful, called Bush's plan "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder since Vietnam."

The tone this week was friendlier, but the criticism was much more pointed at Rice's diplomacy and her stewardship of the State Department. Committee Chairman Joe Biden, another Democratic contender for president, warned Rice that Iraq was sucking up the government's time, attention and resources and wondered aloud whether the secretary had the time to address the myriad other problems facing the United States. (Watch how Rice's star has dimmed)

Republican Sen. George Voinovich took Rice to task for not filling high-level vacancies at the State Department. Nobody, he said, was minding the store.

These are rough and uncharted waters for Rice, who sailed through the first six years of the Bush administration relatively unsullied as her colleagues -- particularly former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- took the heat for the quagmire in Iraq.A perfect mix of substance and style

It wasn't always this hard.

After serving as national security adviser during President Bush's first term, Rice arrived at the State Department in 2005 a celebrity -- epitomizing that perfect mix of substance and style. She graced the pages of Vogue magazine and landed on Vanity Fair's best-dressed list.

During her first year she was praised for repairing the Bush administration's "go it alone image" by engaging Europe on the Iran nuclear issue and Asian allies on North Korea.

But it wasn't all smooth sailing. As the war in Iraq went south, so did Rice's plan to spread democracy throughout the Middle East. Her comments about sectarian tensions in the region being the result of the "birth pangs of the Middle East" were followed by a lackluster diplomatic attempt to intervene in Israel's war with Hezbollah.

As the problems in the Middle East mounted, Rice turned to old authoritarian allies, like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, for help.Lightning rod for criticism

Rice remains the most popular member of the Bush administration; her approval ratings in polls are higher than Bush's.

But the honeymoon is clearly over. Rice has inherited the role Rumsfeld played as a primary spokesman of the Iraq war -- and the primary lightning rod for criticism about it.

At a time when the American public and Congress have soured deeply on the war, they are now taking their frustrations out on the administration as a whole, and Rice in particular.

Even her predecessors are getting in on the game. During a rare series of hearings with former secretaries of state and national security advisers -- including James Baker, Henry Kissinger, Madeline Albright, Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski -- Rice was taken to task for failing to practice the art of diplomacy.

"That's what we hire a secretary of state for, not to sit there and proclaim categorical statements, but to engage in the process," former national security adviser Brzezinski said.

Baker and Albright, both former secretaries of state, were particularly critical of Rice's refusal to engage with Iran and Syria.

Rice told The Washington Post in December that the "compensation" required to strike a deal with Iran and Syria would be too high.

But Baker, co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that recommended U.S. officials open a diplomatic front with Iran and Syria, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that when he was secretary of state "we practiced diplomacy full time, and it paid off."

Said Albright, "Talking to governments about hard problems is what diplomacy is all about."Losing her mojo?

Now the headlines are asking whether Rice has lost her mojo.

A recent Economist editorial, entitled "The Falling Star of Condoleezza Rice," said the secretary of state "is not the woman she once was."

But there are signs Rice is trying to turn things around. Next week she will embark on a new push to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, seen as key to keeping Arab support for the war in Iraq and for a more robust policy to deal with Iran's nuclear program and its support for Islamic extremists in the region.

Beating back Tehran diplomatically may prove to be Rice's other primary challenge in her last two years in office. While the Bush administration insists it does not want a military conflict with Tehran, the rhetoric from Washington sounds very similar to that in the months leading up to the invasion of Iraq.

If she pulls off either, Rice could save the Bush administration's foreign policy legacy from being merely an indictment of the mess in Iraq. If she fails on both, she may leave the State Department with a much more dangerous world to deal with than the one she found when she arrived.

Appeals Court Backs Detainee (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

A federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday that a U.S. citizen in U.S. military custody in Iraq has the right to challenge his detention in a federal court.

The judges said all American citizens, regardless of where they are captured and imprisoned, are entitled to federal court review of their cases through habeas corpus petitions if they are in U.S. custody.

The three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said a U.S. court should review the circumstances of Shawqi Ahmad Omar's more than two years of incarceration in Iraq. It rejected the Bush administration's claim that the executive branch has nearly unlimited authority during wartime and its assertion that the United States can hold citizens indefinitely if they are in custody overseas.

The court also found that the U.S. military cannot transfer Omar to the Iraqi government to avoid a habeas corpus hearing. Circuit Judge Janice Rogers Brown, who dissented in part, agreed that the district court has jurisdiction over Omar's habeas case.

"Today's opinion says that when at the end of the day the buck is stopping with a U.S. official, the federal court gets a look into whether it is lawful," said Aziz Huq, a lawyer at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, who represents Omar. "It prevents an area of darkness in which the government could consign both citizens and noncitizens to detention without judicial review."

The ruling applies only to U.S. citizens. It does not delve into whether captured foreign nationals who the government considers enemy combatants -- such as the 393 detainees at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba -- are entitled to the same protection. The Military Commissions Act of 2006 prevents enemy combatants who are foreign nationals from filing habeas corpus petitions. That law also has been challenged in the courts.

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said yesterday's decision appears to be a "fairly straightforward application of habeas corpus" that "says the courts are open." But the case is likely to apply only to a few U.S. citizens, he said.

Justice Department officials said yesterday that they are evaluating the decision and how to proceed.

"It is important to remember that this case concerns an alleged enemy combatant captured by our military and held by a multinational force in a war zone," said Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin. "We believe the court's decision will inappropriately interfere with the executive branch's prerogative to prosecute a war and to make good on its commitments to our allies."

Omar, a dual citizen of Jordan and the United States, was arrested in October 2004 amid allegations that he was aiding Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's terrorist network in Baghdad. Omar has said that he traveled to Baghdad to do reconstruction work and had been planning to leave in November 2004 but was arrested before his departure.

U.S. authorities wanted to transfer him to Iraqi criminal courts for trial, but a U.S. district court stepped in when attorneys argued he could lose his rights to challenge his detention. Omar has been jailed in various U.S. facilities in Iraq. He has told his attorneys he was abused.

One other U.S. citizen detained in Iraq has filed a habeas corpus petition, which is scheduled for a hearing in U.S. federal court next week. Mohammad Munaf was arrested and charged with taking part in a terrorist plot to kidnap a group of Romanian journalists. He was convicted in an Iraqi court and sentenced to death, but before the sentence could be carried out, a U.S. court in October prevented the U.S. military from transferring Munaf to Iraqi custody.

Court Blocks Moving American's Case To Iraq Court (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 (AP) — A federal appeals court blocked the Pentagon on Friday from transferring an imprisoned American to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents.

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled unanimously that the prisoner, Shawqi Omar, a citizen of Jordan and the United States, had a right to argue for his release before a United States court.

By a 2-to-1 vote, the panel also upheld an injunction issued last year by Judge Ricardo M. Urbina of Federal District Court here that blocked the military from turning over Mr. Omar, 45, for trial in an Iraqi court.

"This is a case about whether a U.S. citizen can be cast into a legal black hole with no means to challenge the basis for his detention," Aziz Huq, Mr. Omar's lawyer, said. "The court today reaffirmed the Supreme Court's view that war is not a blank check as far as a citizen's liberty is concerned."

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Erik Ablin, said it believed that the decision would "inappropriately interfere with the executive branch's prerogative to prosecute a war and to make good on its commitments to our allies."

Mr. Ablin noted that the partial dissent called the ruling unprecedented and said it would effectively block a foreign government from making an arrest on its own soil. He said department lawyers were evaluating their next legal step.

American forces captured Mr. Omar in 2004 at his home in Baghdad in a raid on associates of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Qaeda leader killed last year in an airstrike. He has been held without formal charges. Mr. Omar has not had access to counsel, his family says.

The military says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials when he was arrested. The military decided in 2005 to transfer him to the Central Criminal Court of Iraq for trial, but United States courts have blocked that. Lawyers for Mr. Omar's family say he is innocent and is likely to be tortured if transferred to the Iraqis. They say he is a businessman who sought rebuilding contracts in Iraq.

Writing the majority opinion, Judge David S. Tatel said the Supreme Court had held in three cases involving detainees after Sept. 11, 2001, that American courts had jurisdiction to review their detention.

KBR, The Military Honor Civilian Sacrifices (HC)

By Brett Clanton, David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, February 10, 2007

The Defense Department and KBR on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart.

But some honorees at the event said citizen contractors still are not getting the same recognition as the military for sacrifices they make serving their country in Iraq.

"The contractors are every bit as important as the military," said Lloyd Dagit, who lost his 42-year-old son Keven in Iraq on Sept. 20, 2005. But they are rarely treated that way, he said.

Yet on Friday, Dagit was more concerned with remembering his son — and that midnight call from KBR that shattered his world.

"I thought I was prepared for anything that happened," he said. "But I wasn't."

Dagit of Jefferson, Iowa, and the relatives of eight other slain contractors, as well as 19 others who were wounded gathered in Houston on Friday for a private ceremony honoring the KBR workers.

All received the Defense of Freedom medal.

The Pentagon does not include civilian contractor deaths in its casualty figures for Iraq. The tally of war dead roughly stands at 3,100.

The Labor Department — through its division of Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation division — says at least 770 civilian contractors working for U.S. firms had died in Iraq as of Dec. 31, while another 7,761 had been injured.

Supporting troopsKBR, which is in the process of being spun off by Houston-based Halliburton, is the largest military contractor operating in Iraq. Under a multibillion-dollar logistics contract with the Army, some 50,000 KBR employees and subcontractors provide an array of support services for U.S. troops, from building bases to serving food.

And while workers operate under protection by the U.S. military or private security officers, they still come into harm's way.

Ninety-eight KBR employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began. Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action, said company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross.

KBR has received approval to grant Defense of Freedom medals to 95 of its wounded or slain workers, and is seeking permission for more awards, she said.

Some of those medals will be given to KBR employees while they are still serving in the Middle East. But the company has also been quietly hosting U.S. ceremonies like the one Friday morning at the Hilton Houston Post Oak hotel.

Though a government-sponsored award was being given, KBR said "out of respect to the families" it would not allow news media to attend.

After the event, KBR went so far as to surround honorees with security officers, escorting them to a private reception. Two uniformed Houston Police Department officers were also standing outside the hotel's lobby.

Norcross said it was a "joint decision" by the company and the U.S. Army to keep the event closed to the public.

But KBR sent out the invitations, helped with travel arrangements and paid for air fare and rooms for the recipients and up to three guests per invitation.

During the award ceremony, Maj. Gen. Jerome Johnson, commanding general of the Army Sustainment Command, handed each worker or surviving family member a plaque containing the Defense of Freedom medal, along with a certificate signed by Army Secretary Francis Harvey.

Established after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to honor civilians killed or wounded while aiding the military, the medals feature a bald eagle holding a shield on one side, and the words "On Behalf of a Grateful Nation" along with the recipient's name on the reverse.

Among the wounded KBR workers receiving the award was Jeff Hayson, 50, of Yakima, Wash.

Sitting in the hotel's lobby before the ceremony, Hayson struggled to remember how many surgeries he had undergone after shrapnel from a July 2005 roadside bomb cut through his mouth and severed his carotid artery.

"I'm really lucky to be alive," said Hayson, who attended the event with his wife, Valarie.

Across the lobby, in the hotel's lounge, was James Blackwood, another one of KBR's wounded being honored Friday.

"Nobody got out of it without getting hit," said Blackwood, who lives in Fort Worth and is one of a number of former KBR workers pursuing litigation against the company.

But wounded KBR workers such as Wallace McNabb would just like to see contractors receive as much credit as the military for their work in Iraq.

"We get killed and wounded right alongside them," said McNabb, 51, of Lincoln, Neb., who was shot in his left hand while working for KBR as a truck driver in Iraq.

Yet Earnest Cook said he was happy just to be getting any award for his time driving a truck for KBR in Iraq. While the 48-year-old from Troy, Texas, had part of his left elbow blown off in an insurgent attack, he remains matter-of-fact about the whole thing.

"I was just doing what I was supposed to do," he said.

Help For The Intrepid (WSJ)

By Jonathan Gurwitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

SAN ANTONIO -- The word "sacrifice," like the word "war," lends itself to political and rhetorical excess. There are symbolic sacrifices in metaphorical wars. Then there are genuine sacrifices in real wars.

The latter was on display last week at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, as representatives of a grateful nation dedicated the Center for the Intrepid and two new Fisher Houses to those wounded in the global war on terror.

The center is a 65,000-square-foot, state-of-the-art physical rehabilitation facility. The Fisher Houses are homes away from home for the families of military personnel being treated at military medical centers and Veterans Administration hospitals. The center and the houses were built entirely with private funds. More than 600,000 Americans contributed $50 million to construct the Center for the Intrepid. Thousands more donated the $8.3 million needed to build the new Fisher Houses for Brooke Army Medical Center, home to the sole Army Burn Center and one of two Army Amputee Care Centers. BAMC has treated more than 2,600 service members injured in Afghanistan and Iraq. Only Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C. has cared for more casualties.

As the dedication ceremonies commenced, 300 wounded military personnel walked, staggered and rolled beneath the drawn swords of an honor guard to take their seats in the front rows. One of them was Staff Sgt. Jon Arnold-Garcia.

Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia of the 101st Airborne Division lost the lower half of his right leg to a grenade when insurgents struck his convoy in Hawija, Iraq. Not yet fitted with a prosthesis, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia was on crutches.

As the Joint Service Color Guard of the Military District of Washington presented colors, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia rose to attention, without crutches, on one leg.

Next to him was a soldier I knew. Staff Sgt. Steve Bosson of the 1st Cavalry Division is a bear of a man. Looking at his frame, you wouldn't know he's been through three years of surgeries, prosthetic fittings and rehabilitation. Staff Sgt. Bosson lost the lower half of his left leg to a grenade in an ambush west of Baghdad.

At moments during the National Anthem, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia would teeter a bit. To keep his balance, he would occasionally touch the elbow of his right arm, drawn up in salute, to the shoulder of Staff Sgt. Bosson. It was a fleeting yet moving portrait of genuine sacrifice.

Representatives of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund and the Fisher House Foundation spoke at the ceremony, as did Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace. So did Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain. The speakers, however, were merely paying tribute. The true dignitaries were the wounded warriors who sat in the front rows.

Mr. McCain's comments were stately. "What you have done for us, we can never do for you," he told the injured. "But we are mindful of that distinction and humbled by it. And our appreciation for your service demands us all to do what we can, in less trying circumstances, to help keep this nation a place and an idea worthy of the hardships, danger and sacrifices you have born for us so valiantly."

Some critics have questioned the propriety of individuals and businesses, rather than the government, building the Center for the Intrepid and the Fisher Houses. Democratic strategist Paul Begala told my colleague Scott Huddleston, "It is an obscenity that a government that can find billions in no-bid contracts for Halliburton and trillions in tax cuts for the wealthy cannot find a few million dollars to bind up the wounds of its heroes."

Mr. Begala is of course correct that the government has an inviolable obligation to care for military personnel and veterans. But do the thanks of citizens end with the filing of tax returns?

Arnold Fisher, the philanthropic force behind the center, who saw it through from groundbreaking to completion in fewer than 15 months, provided a rhetorical answer: "Why would we want our government to do that which we could do ourselves in half the time, at half the cost and twice the quality?"

Everywhere one turned were examples of men and women inspired to give of their own accord, to show gratitude worthy of the sacrifice of the citizen soldiers of the volunteer military.

John Melia is a Marine veteran who was severely wounded in a helicopter crash in Somalia in 1992. After his recuperation at BAMC, he began the Wounded Warrior Project, a nonprofit organization that places veterans at the bedside of wounded military personnel to support them and their families.

Kirk Bauer is an Army veteran who lost a leg in a grenade attack in Vietnam in 1969. A year later, he began working with Disabled Sports USA, a nonprofit that provides adaptive sports opportunities for individuals, military or civilian, with permanent physical disabilities. Today Mr. Bauer is executive director of the organization, which now has 87 chapters in 35 states.

Janis Roznowski is a flight attendant for American Airlines. After volunteering on a government-chartered flight bringing troops home from the Middle East, Ms. Roznowski felt compelled to follow up on the needs of the wounded. She started Operation Comfort, a nonprofit organization that plans recreational projects and events for convalescing personnel and their families.

"We're not done yet," Mr. Fisher told me in the gleaming lobby of the Center for the Intrepid. With more combat troops headed for Iraq and a spring offensive expected from the Taliban in Afghanistan, the ranks of the wounded will grow.

Have these men and women earned the government's commitment to provide them the finest care available? Of course. Do they also deserve -- beyond the payment of taxes and vapid talk about national sacrifice -- some measure of support from the American people?

"We can never give them back what they lost," said Richard Santulli, chairman and CEO of NetJets and chairman of the board of trustees of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund. "But it is our duty as Americans to give them back as much normalcy in their lives as we can. That will be the best legacy this center can provide."

Mr. Gurwitz is a member of the editorial board of the San Antonio Express-News.

Survival Of Ancient Faith Threatened By Fighting In Iraq (WP/AP)

By Chris Newmarker

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- Among the casualties of the Iraq war is a little-known religious faith called Mandaeanism that has survived roughly two millennia and whose adherents believe that John the Baptist was their great teacher.

While there were more than 60,000 Mandaeans in Iraq in the early 1990s, only about 5,000 to 7,000 remain. Many have fled amid targeted killings, rapes, forced conversions and property confiscation by Islamic extremists, according to a report released last week by the New Jersey-based Mandaean Society of America.

Among the roughly 1,500 Mandaeans in the United States, there have been continual phone calls with endangered friends and relatives, fundraisers and unsuccessful lobbying efforts in Washington to get Mandaeans out of Iraq, as well as neighboring Jordan and Syria.

"Unfortunately, we're not big in numbers, and numbers talk," said Suhaib Nashi, a 53-year-old pediatrician who helps run the Mandaean Society of America out of his Morristown, N.J., home.

Mandaean leaders say tens of thousands of their brethren are scattered around the world, including a U.S. community centered around New York and Detroit.

With the dispersion comes concern that the faith is withering, especially as more Mandaeans marry non-Mandaeans, with no mechanism to bring their children into the fold.

"There's not much hope for us to survive to two or three generations," Nashi said.

Scholars who study the Mandaean religion and culture say its extinction would be a great loss, the end of an ancient religious movement. Dating to the time of the Roman Empire, it survived primarily in what is today Iraq and Iran, a branch of the Gnostic movement that borrowed elements of Christianity.

Mandaeans view John the Baptist as a great teacher, and engage in baptisms to come in closer contact with a "world of light" that is better than the material world on Earth.

"It represents a slice of the culture of the Middle East before the rise of Islam. It's a view to a former world. And frankly, we don't know very much about it," said Charles G. Haberl, an instructor in Middle Eastern studies at Rutgers University.

Haberl, who says he's trying to arrange a reprint of one of the Mandaeans' main holy books for the first time in about 150 years, laments that an "enormous literary tradition" may soon disappear.

"It would be as if a museum or library were put to the torch," Haberl said.

Driven from Iraq and Iran, many Mandaeans have adapted to their new homes, enjoying financial success as medical doctors, civil engineers and jewelers, Nashi said.

But being scattered means that many in the younger generation have found spouses outside the community. And since a Mandaean has to be born a Mandaean, the children of such marriages have a questionable status in the religion.

Mamoon Aldulaimi, 60, of Lake Grove, N.Y., is a civil engineer who's a leader in the Mandaean community. Aldulaimi's son, 20-year-old Hani Aldulaimi, married an American raised as a Baptist.

At the wedding last May in the Phoenix area, where the newlyweds live, Mamoon Aldulaimi's daughter-in-law prominently displayed a darfash, a cross with cloth hanging off of it that's a symbol of Mandaeanism.

"She took that initiative as a matter of respect for us," Aldulaimi said.

But with the religion's few dozen priests reluctant to agree on a mechanism to bring in the children of mixed marriages, Aldulaimi and others wonder how long Mandaeanism will survive.

Meanwhile, the few thousand Mandaeans still living in Iraq are finding their lives increasingly in danger, targeted by extremists of every political stripe and religious faith.

Nashi said a cousin on his father's side, Suhail Jani Sahar, was killed by Shiite fighters in November. A more distant cousin on his mother's side, Yahya al-Chuhaily, was killed by Sunnis in June.

"Where there are areas where the Shia are the majority, they'll kill the Mandaeans and the Christians along with the Sunnis. Where there are areas where the Sunni are the majority, they'll kill the Mandaeans and the Christians along with the Shia," Nashi said.

Jorunn Buckley, an assistant professor of religion at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, has studied Mandaeans for decades and has testified for them in U.S. immigration courts. She said the United States could do much more to get Mandaeans out of the Middle East.

"It's not that many people," Buckley said. "It's not 5 million people."

When contacted about the issue, a State Department spokesman cited Jan. 17 congressional testimony by Ellen R. Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state for population, refugees, and migration, who said the department has been expanding the ability of the United States to bring in more Iraqi refugees, including the "special populations" of religious minorities.

"We intend to ensure that these special populations receive the same consideration and access to the U.S. resettlement program as others," Sauerbrey told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Pentagon To Extend Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By Robert Burns

AP, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130855

The Pentagon plans to extend its buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said Friday.

The move comes as U.S. and allied commanders anticipate a renewed offensive this spring by the Taliban, and as they seek additional reinforcements from NATO countries. The effort to bolster forces there so far has brought only limited success, with a few nations promising handfuls of additional troops and equipment.

The extension of the U.S. buildup means American troop levels in Afghanistan, which increased this month to about 26,000 — the highest of the war — will remain roughly the same until at least spring 2008. Until now, a level of 22,000 to 23,000 had prevailed through much of last year.

The decision, expected to be announced in Washington as early as next week, entails sending an Army combat brigade to replace the 3rd Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division when it leaves this spring.

Without replacing that brigade, the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan would have receded to the lower level. That is because the U.S. has had extra troops in the country since earlier this month, when a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division arrived.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision has not been announced, declined to identify the replacement brigade. There are about 3,500 soldiers in a brigade.

The move comes as the United States is also adding 21,500 troops to its forces in Iraq, which totaled around 130,000 before that buildup started.

While President Bush's troop increase in Iraq has aroused widespread public and congressional opposition, there has been little dissent over efforts to intensify U.S. operations in Afghanistan. Both conflicts, however, are continuing to put severe strains on a military that is constantly scrambling to find fresh troops and equipment to send to the war zones.

The increase in the U.S. force in Afghanistan comes as NATO's new top commander, Gen. John Craddock, is seeking 1,500 to 2,000 extra combat troops for the campaign, plus about 800 more from the British.

Decisions about adjusting U.S. troop levels next year will depend in part on whether the United States' NATO partners send all the combat and support forces they have promised.

About 15,000 of the American troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000. The other 12,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

The 3rd Brigade originally was to go home this month, as it turned over command to the brigade of the 82nd Airborne, but the Pentagon announced in January that it instead will be kept in place four extra months.

Until now, it was not clear whether the Pentagon would replace the 3rd Brigade when it went home.

The senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision to extend the buildup has not been announced, said the unit that replaces the 3rd Brigade in late spring will remain for a year.

Thus the number of brigades in Afghanistan, which increased from one to two this month with the 82nd Airborne's arrival, will remain at that level until the spring of 2008 and possibly beyond, he said.

4 Afghan Police Killed In Taliban Ambush (AP)

Associated Press, February 10, 2007

Taliban militants ambushed a truck full of Afghan police in southern Afghanistan, killing four officers and injuring three, an official said Saturday.

The attack occurred Friday evening in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, said provincial police chief Afmatullah Alizai. The three injured were in serious condition, he said.

NATO forces in September killed more than 500 militants in the Panjwayi area, largely clearing the region of militants in an offensive dubbed Operation Medusa.

Canadian and U.S. Special Forces are now working in Panjwayi to increase security. More Afghan security checkpoints have been put up, a new road is being built and schools and clinics are re-opening.

But small groups of fighters remain.

DOJ_NMG_0130856

The attack on the police happened near the village of Talukan. Militants in December beheaded two men in Talukan, saying the two were working with NATO forces.

Attacks spiked in Afghanistan last year, with some 4,000 people killed in insurgency-related violence, according to an Associated Press count based on numbers from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials.

NATO officials are bracing for more violence this spring, when fighters typically step up attacks after a winter lull.

Eleven Taliban, Four Police Killed In New Afghan Violence (AFP)

AFP, February 10, 2007

Four policemen and 11 Taliban have been killed in fresh violence in southern Afghanistan, as a suicide car bomb narrowly missed a NATO military convoy.

The Taliban fighters were killed Friday in an Afghan and International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) operation in Kajaki district of the southern province of Helmand, provincial police chief Mohammad Nabi Mullahkhail said Saturday.

British forces with ISAF have been trying to clear the area of militants to allow the resumption of work to rehabilitate a hydropower project that could supply power to 1.8 million people.

The violence follows the death of 10 Taliban on Thursday in the same area, who were killed in clashes with Afghan and British troops, police said.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Yousuf Ahmadi, confirmed the fighting in Kajaki but denied any losses on his side claiming instead that several Afghan and NATO soldiers were killed.

The security forces said they did not suffer any casualties.

Overnight Saturday Taliban militants ambushed a police patrol in Panjwayi district of neighbouring Kandahar province, killing four police and wounding three more, provincial police chief Assmatullah Alizay told AFP.

The police were on patrol late Friday when Taliban fighters opened fire, kicking off a gunbattle. There was no information on any Taliban casualties, he said.

Ahmadi claimed in a telephone call from an undisclosed location that around 10 police were killed and wounded.

Also in Kandahar, a suicide attacker detonated a car bomb as he tried to approach a NATO convoy near the southern city of Kandahar but he missed by metres and killed only himself.

The attacker was blown to pieces and body parts were flung across the area as was the shattered vehicle used to carry the bomber, Alizay said.

The blast was on a major highway that has seen many of the regular attacks in the city, including a February 4 suicide bombing targeted at a Canadian convoy that also caused no casualties besides the bomber.

The militants stepped up their bloody insurgency in 2006, with the violence claiming more than 4,000 lives. The religious extremists were toppled from power in a US-led offensive in late 2001.

Gates To Meet Musharraf In Pakistan Next Week: Officials (AFP)

AFP, February 10, 2007

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates will visit Pakistan early next week for talks with President Pervez Musharraf on the threat from Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan, official sources said.

It will be Gates' first visit to the key US ally in the "war on terror" since he came to office late last year. He is expected to fly to Afghanistan afterwards.

Gates' visit will be closely followed by separate visits to the region by NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and two top diplomats from the United States and Britain, the sources said.

"These visits are part of a renewed focus on Afghanistan, how to deal with the threat posed by Taliban," a senior Pakistani official told AFP on Saturday.

Afghanistan suffered its bloodiest year in 2006 with more than 4,000 people killed, mostly rebels, sometimes in pitched battles between Taliban-led insurgents and NATO-led troops in regions bordering Pakistan.

Pakistan has faced mounting accusations it has not stopped Taliban using its territory as a sanctuary and launching pad for attacks inside Afghanistan, where the hardliners were ousted from power in late 2001 by US-led forces.

The foreign forces in Afghanistan are bracing for expected surge in Taliban violence in the coming months and NATO has said it wants to reinforce its 35,000 troop-deployment in the war-torn country.

Musharraf recently said security along the porous Pakistan-Afghanistan border was the joint responsibility of all the forces nearby, and Pakistan could not win the fight against militancy on its own.

Camouflaged Defense Spending (LAT)

By Veronique DeRugy

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

AT THE SAME TIME that President Bush requested more than $700 billion for the Pentagon budget this week, he managed to create the impression that he was asking for the much smaller amount of $481 billion. The trick he used — socking about $235 billion into two "emergency supplemental" funding requests for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan — didn't fool the public for very long. But the longer the White House and Congress continue to treat "war-related" funding as a separate item from the budget for the Department of Defense, the harder it will be to control a ballooning federal budget.

Here's how the supplemental shell game works. The official defense budget for 2008 comes to $481 billion. That's a 10% increase over last year and a 62% increase over 2001. And it conveniently fails to include a supplemental request of $141.7 billion, which brings the 2008 defense total to $622.7 billion. On top of that, the president requested a 2007 supplemental in the amount of $93.4 billion, bringing this week's entire defense "budget authority request" to $716 billion (the figure of actual outlays is even higher because it includes billions already committed to the Pentagon).

Both of these supplemental items are part of the true cost of defense, and the one piece of good news is that they were mentioned in Monday's $2.9-trillion budget proposal. That's a big improvement over recent practice, in which supplementals were requested throughout the year but never mentioned in official proposed budgets. (That $93.4 billion for 2007 comes on top of a $70-billion "bridge supplemental" appropriated in November.)

However, the underlying problem — the use of supplementals to paper over the real costs of defense and domestic programs and to avoid making tough budget choices — is very much alive.

Supplemental budget requests are supposed to provide funding that cannot wait until the next appropriations cycle. Congress uses them to foot unexpected costs because of natural disaster or war. Thus, supplementals provided the initial funding for conflicts including the Persian Gulf War, Bosnia and Kosovo. However, the continued funding for these conflicts came through regular budget horse-trading. Traditionally, supplemental spending makes up less than 1% of defense spending, and it rarely rises above 3%.

By contrast, in 2007, at least 16.4% of new defense spending will go through supplemental bills. And yet, after four years of engagement, the cost of the war in Iraq is by no means unpredictable or sudden. The largest expenditures in the supplementals are the salaries and benefits of Army National Guard personnel and Reservists called to active duty.

So why abuse supplemental appropriations? Because Congress and the president have discovered that they are an effective way to discreetly increase spending for a long and painful war. As important, supplemental spending does not count against budget caps or automatically trigger offsetting cuts. Thus, the Pentagon can have money for the war while keeping space available in the regular budget for pet projects.

Last year, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker gave the game away when he testified before a Senate committee that the Army preferred to fund 30,000 additional troops through supplementals because including the funds in its annual budget request "would have to displace other things that are too important to us as we transform."

But that trade-off is exactly what should be happening. In the 2008 budget, instead of one defense budget request that has to balance and justify the need for war-fighting funds with such Cold War-era weapons boondoggles as the Air Force's F-22 stealth fighter, the Marine Corps' tilt-wing V-22 Osprey and the Navy's DDG-1000 stealth destroyer and Virginia-class attack submarine, the Pentagon separates the two and gets to have its cake and eat it too.

Nor is the Pentagon the only player in the shell game. By trimming the administration's formal defense spending request (while relying on supplemental spending to make up the difference), Congress can free up the amount "saved" for non-defense appropriations.

That's why, in 2006, then-House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) asked that $6 billion be cut from the proposed 2007 defense budget and shifted over to erase almost $4 billion in cuts proposed for the departments of Labor and Health and Human Services. That made Congress look fiscally responsible. In the 2007 fiscal year, this bipartisan practice will make it possible for Congress to spend an extra $170 billion.

The Democratic Congress could use Iraq spending as leverage for some long-overdue cutting of waste at the Pentagon. Or Congress may decide that more than $700 billion for defense is worth every penny. But we must stop pretending that war-related costs are somehow separate from the budget of a department whose only mission is to fight and win the nation's wars. That won't happen until Washington stops hiding major defense spending increases — years after this "emergency" practice should have stopped.

DOJ:

Ousted U.S. Attorney Blames Policy Disputes With Bosses (AZREP)

By Billy House And Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, February 10, 2007

Former U.S. Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton said Friday that he left office in January for "principled reasons, not performance issues," as a deputy attorney general suggested this week.

Charlton, who was one of six top federal prosecutors across the country forced to resign, said there had been "policy disputes" with his Justice Department higher-ups. Charlton spoke to The Arizona Republic on Friday in his first public comments since being asked to step down.

Although Charlton declined to elaborate, two sources said a main disagreement between Charlton and officials in Washington centered on when to seek the death penalty in federal murder cases.

As a U.S attorney, Charlton has pursed the death penalty in some cases. But his insistence on determining whether to push for capital punishment on a case-by-case basis clashed on at least two instances with a Justice Department effort to centralize decisions nationally and to seek the death penalty in a uniform way.

Charlton acknowledged that he was among the prosecutors who received a telephone call on Dec. 7 from Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, asking him to resign.

"I certainly was given no indication there were performance concerns," Charlton said.

Like all U.S. attorneys, Charlton served at the pleasure of the president. He was appointed in November 2001.

Even so, Charlton said that he told Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, of the call and that Kyl agreed to speak to officials at the department on his behalf.

"Senator Kyl informed me that after his conversation with the Department of Justice that the department agreed they would reconsider their asking me to resign," Charlton said.

But, Charlton said, "it then became apparent to me that our views had become so divergent and disparate that I would resign."

"I left for principled reasons, not performance issues," said Charlton, now a partner in the firm of Gallagher and Kennedy.

'Issue of semantics' A Justice Department official in Washington who asked not to be identified said that Charlton's distinction between policy and performance "may be an issue of semantics."

"Policy is set at a national level," the official said. "Individual U.S. attorneys around the country can't just make up their own policy agendas. Such a situation would result in chaos with 93 different U.S. attorneys implementing different policy decisions around the country. That is no way to run an organization."

Kyl, in a statement released by his office on Friday, said he had "been assured that both Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales and Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty are grateful for Paul Charlton's five years of service, as am I."

"My understanding is that Paul Charlton's departure resulted from disagreements with the Department of Justice about some office policies," Kyl added. A spokeswoman for Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he also believes Charlton "was an exemplary U.S. attorney."

Charlton's comments come amid a growing controversy over the forced resignations of six top prosecutors.

McNulty testified this week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is looking into the dismissals, and suggested that the Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for "performance-related" reasons.

The ousters have prompted a Senate battle over a provision quietly slipped into the Patriot Act reauthorization last year to allow the Justice Department to replace prosecutors with interim successors for indefinite terms, viewed by some as a Bush administration end-around past Congress.

On Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee in a bipartisan vote passed a measure opposed by Kyl to repeal that provision.

One of the ousted U.S. attorneys, John McKay of Seattle, said earlier this week that his office received glowing performance reviews as recently as last fall. And another, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, has also told a newspaper that he had not been told of any problems with his performance.

The suggestion that Charl- ton was asked to leave for performance-related reasons stunned one former supervisor, former Deputy Attorney General James Comey. Comey was McNulty's predecessor in that job, leaving in August 2005.

Charlton "was one of the stars of the U.S. attorney community," Comey, now general counsel for Lockheed Martin, said Friday. "His office handled a staggering caseload and number of crimes."

Arizona case Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona, said there has been only one person sentenced under the Federal Death Penalty Act in Arizona. Lezmond Charles Mitchell, 25, is being held at the Special Confinement Unit in Terre Haute, Ind., one of 44 inmates there facing execution.

Mitchell was convicted in the October 2001 murder of Alyce Slim, 65, and Tiffany Lee, 9, during a kidnapping. Mitchell and a co-defendant, Johnny Orsinger, stabbed the victims to death after catching a ride as hitchhikers. Mitchell is reportedly the first and only Native American facing federal execution. The Navajo Nation has criticized his sentence, which is scheduled for appeal Thursday in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Hornbuckle said federal prosecutors are seeking the death penalty against Jose Rios Rico, who faces trial for murder during a drug-trafficking crime, as well as numerous other felony offenses related to meth deals.

In one case, four members of the New Mexican Mafia, or New Eme, faced execution for murder and other crimes. The defendants, including brothers Luis and Felipe Cisneros, accepted last-minute plea bargains. Three received life sentences; the fourth got 16 years.

Larry Hammond, a Phoenix attorney who represented Felipe Cisneros, said Charlton was an "honest broker" in the case, deciding to give up capital punishment because the government would have faced an expensive six-month trial with severe effect on victims and an unknown verdict.

"It was true that, for a long time, main Justice was not prepared to go along" with the plea deal, Hammond said, adding that authorities in Washington, D.C., finally relented.

Under Charlton's administration, several other death-penalty actions were initiated but later dropped.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, said that the Bush administration has become more aggressive in pursuing executions.

Dieter noted that the federal Death Penalty Act was expanded in 1994 to make numerous offenses eligible for capital punishment, including virtually any murder committed as part of another federal crime.

He said Justice Department officials have sought to deal with inconsistent death-penalty prosecutions from state to state by creating national protocols.

At the same time, he noted, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's first attorney general, John Ashcroft, are also solid backers of capital punishment while their predecessor, Janet Reno, philosophically opposed the law.

As a result, new protocols have been imposed requiring Justice Department review of all cases that are death- penalty eligible, reducing the autonomy of local U.S. at- torneys.

Charlton Exit Linked To Death Penalty Push (AP)

WASHINGTON - Supporters of former U.S. Attorney Paul K. Charlton say that the former federal prosecutor clashed with the Bush administration over the death penalty before he resigned in December.

Former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods said Friday the Justice Department in Washington pressed Charlton to apply the death penalty in certain cases, but Charlton resisted because he didn't believe it was the right thing to do. Charlton resigned in December and left office at the end of last month.

"It's obvious that they may have felt there were more circumstances where (the death penalty) was warranted than he did," said Woods, who has spoken with Charlton recently. "I think he should get credit for standing on principle rather than just doing what he was told so he didn't make waves. A lot of people don't have the guts to stand up and say 'no.' "

Woods did not know whether the conflicts led directly to Charlton's departure after serving as the U.S. attorney for Arizona since 2001. Charlton took a job with a Phoenix law firm.

Charlton did not respond to repeated requests for comment throughout the week. The 46-year-old career prosecutor told The Associated Press in December that he had decided it was time to leave.

A Justice Department spokesman was not immediately available for comment Friday evening.

Charlton's resignation came as accusations swirled on Capitol Hill that the Bush administration had used a provision of the USA Patriot Act to oust federal prosecutors and replace them with White House allies without Senate confirmation.

Democrats have accused the administration of punishing prosecutors whose work targeted Republican allies. Charlton's office handled preliminary investigations into Republican Reps. Jim Kolbe and Rick Renzi before the November election.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has denied the charge and promised to submit every replacement for Senate confirmation. Seven federal prosecutors have left office in the last year; most, like Charlton, stepped down in December.

Editorial: Call McKay's Firing What It Is: A Political Purge (TACNT)

Tacoma (WA) News Tribune, February 10, 2007

John McKay, by all accounts, was a stellar U.S. attorney.

Since becoming Western Wash- ington's top federal prosecutor in 2001, he led an aggressive team that filed charges against twice as many defendants and posted a higher conviction rate despite the bigger case-load.

McKay won admiration of federal judges and state law enforcement officials, and earned the Navy's highest civilian honor for creating an interagency information-sharing system that has become a national model.

Even his bosses seemed to think McKay was doing a topnotch job. Just last March, Justice Department evaluators gave McKay's office a glowing review, calling him an "effective, well-regarded and capable leader."

So it came as quite the surprise when McKay announced in December that he was stepping down. There was no plum appointment or job waiting in the wings, only a chance to pursue other opportunities — usually code for "I was shown the door."

As so, it turns out, McKay was. He spoke out this week in defense of himself and his former employees after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate judiciary panel that McKay and five other Republican U.S. attorneys were forced to resign for "performance-related" issues.

McKay says no one ever raised performance issues with him, not even on Dec. 7 when a senior Justice Department official called out of the blue to tell him he had to resign by the end of January.

The truth behind the mass exodus has a lot more to do with the politicization of the U.S. Attorney's Office than it does with poor lawyering. A Justice Department source told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer that President Bush and the Republican Party want to "build their bench" by replacing top prosecutors with younger conservatives to enhance their résumés for future positions.

Come to find out, Congress did the administration a big favor last year when it gave Attorney Gen. Alberto Gonzales the power to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Now the administration doesn't have to go to the trouble of seeking Senate confirmation.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted this week to repeal that new authority; the rest of the Senate and House should follow its lead. U.S. attorneys may serve at the pleasure of the president, but the interests of justice demand that they be shielded from the brute machinations of political retribution and cronyism.

Editorial: Firings Reek Of Politics (SPT)

St Petersburg (FL) Times, February 10, 2007

Former U.S. Attorney John McKay's last performance appraisal gave him a highly favorable rating and said he is "an effective, well-regarded and capable leader." But McKay, of the Justice Department's Western Washington office, got kicked out the door. He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys across the country who have been removed for what appear to be political reasons.

U.S. attorneys act as chief federal prosecutors within the states and are charged with being fair and independent. But there is no job that can't be filled by political loyalists.

In a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general, claimed that most of the incumbents had been replaced for performance issues. Yet he admitted to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that H.E. Cummins III, a former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, had done nothing to justify being removed. Cummins was replaced with a former political director for the Republican National Committee.

Schumer is investigating the removals. The administration is exploiting a provision of the reauthorized Patriot Act, which allows it to ignore the Senate confirmation process.

Previously, the president could name an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. After that, a federal judge would appoint a substitute who would fill the job until the Senate confirmed the administration's choice. The Patriot Act allows the president's appointee to stay in the job indefinitely.

An administration prone to putting partisans and political hacks in key public posts could use this loophole to fill its top prosecutor ranks with party activists who are less than shining legal lights. It also may use this unilateral power to intimidate those prosecutors who remain.

In ousting San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the Bush administration has signaled to others in its corps that investigating public corruption comes at a price. Lam headed the office that unearthed the misdeeds of congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is now in prison after admitting taking more than $2-million in bribes. The probe had been continuing under her leadership and included other members of Congress.

Senate confirmation is integral to reducing the partisanship of presidential appointments and is especially important for posts where impartiality and independence are needed qualifications. The new law that makes it possible to cut the Senate out should be repealed, as a measure introduced by Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., would do. Meanwhile, Schumer and other senators should continue to press for better explanations for the removal of people who seemed to be doing their job.

Gregg Herrington Column: U.S. Attorney's 'Resignation' Doesn't Wash (VANCC)

By Gregg Herrington, Columbian staff writer

Vancouver (WA) Columbian, February 10, 2007

This ought to teach U.S. Rep. Brian Baird and Clark County Prosecutor Art Curtis to keep their mouths shut.

The two Democrats have liberally praised a Bush administration Republican appointee, John McKay, for doing a heckuva job as U.S. attorney for Western Washington. Now McKay is no longer in that job. He's toast. Out on his ear.

When he announced in December that he was moving on, McKay didn't say much. He played the Colin Powell role of an obedient and noncomplaining soldier. He said something gauzy about pursuing other interests.

At least he spared us tergiversation about spending more time with his family or catching up on reading back copies of National Geographic.

Then came Wednesday's revelation before the Senate Judiciary Committee: Seven U.S. attorneys around the country had been asked to resign in recent months. Later in the day, McKay told The Associated Press, "I was ordered (in December) to resign. ... I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues."

Just seven months earlier McKay "received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators," The Seattle Times reported Thursday.

I figure the Baird-Curtis praise was a nail in McKay's career coffin.

Some 90 U.S. attorneys around the country serve at the pleasure of the president, prosecuting, or not, federal crimes.

But the Bush White House likes its minions to be attuned to the greater vision: moving the blue states into the red column. And how can one do that if one is working closely with the other side, sharing credit with Democrats while beefing up the federal crime-fighting apparatus in Southwest Washington?

Too politically moderate?

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer said Thursday that a former Justice Department source said McKay is "too politically moderate" for the Bush administration. Other theories boil down to McKay not being enough of a partisan. The Justice Department doesn't comment on specific attorneys but cited performance as an issue for those it sent packing.

Nobody's buying it.

Chief U.S. District Judge Robert Lasnik told The Times that among federal judges in Western Washington, "it was unanimous that ... John McKay was an absolutely superb U.S. attorney, and by every measure the performance of his office improved during his tenure."

Norm Maleng, the moderate Republican King County prosecutor, said McKay "took the U.S. attorney's office to a higher level. He reached out to every prosecutor in Western Washington, and renewed connections. ..."

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., somewhere between suspicious and outraged, called for a Judiciary Committee probe of McKay's dismissal. That was Wednesday. By Thursday she was closer to outrage and wrote the attorney general, asking for an explanation.

Friend to Southwest Washington

In Vancouver, Curtis, the Democratic county prosecutor for 26 years, said, "John McKay did more for law enforcement in Southwest Washington than any U.S. attorney I've ever worked with. I was saddened when I heard he resigned and saddened that he was asked to resign."

Baird, whose public praise for McKay has been free-flowing for several years, said, "John McKay is an outstanding individual and a great friend to Southwest Washington. He's probably the best U.S. attorney we've ever had, for this region."

Much of their regard for McKay stems from his paying attention to Clark County, long a backwater in the world of federal criminal prosecution. McKay, in 2003, was instrumental in getting a Federal Investigative Center in Vancouver, staffed with people from various federal crime-fighting agencies who historically have served this area mostly out of Tacoma and Seattle.

Maybe the next time local Democrats feel the urge to say something critical of a Bush appointee, they ought to say something nice instead. That'd fix him.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Eye Jobs' Role In Pixar Stock Options (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2007

Film director Lasseter reportedly received many that offered advantageous timing

These days, the most animated discussions about Steve Jobs have nothing to do with his high-tech wizardry and everything to do with his alleged involvement in a growing stock-options manipulation scandal that has engulfed Apple Inc., the Cupertino technology giant he runs, and Pixar Animation Studios, the Emeryville movie company he sold to Walt Disney Co. last year.

Federal prosecutors in San Francisco are scrutinizing options awarded to top Pixar executives on dates that guaranteed them the highest potential profits. Among the grants being reviewed: Two-time Oscar-winning animated film director John Lasseter and former Pixar President Edwin Catmull received options that allowed them to buy Pixar stock at the lowest price in 2000. In 1997, Lasseter received options just before a production agreement with Disney that pumped up shares nearly 50 percent.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco declined to comment.

The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that Jobs, then Pixar's chairman and CEO, signed the 2001 employment contract with Lasseter that included a large options grant on a date more than three months before the contract was signed. The Journal cited a person familiar with the matter.

It remains unclear what role if any Jobs played in selecting the favorable date, according to the Journal. But the timing grabbed the attention of federal authorities, prompting an investigation by Disney that has not been completed. Washington lawyer William McLucas, a former Securities and Exchange Commission official heading the investigation, could not be reached for comment. In a conference call with investors in November, Disney CEO Bob Iger said the board began the investigation after being contacted by the SEC and the Justice Department.

Federal investigations of both Apple and Pixar have put Jobs on the hot seat. An internal Apple probe cleared Jobs of wrongdoing but acknowledged that he was aware and even recommended the selection of "favorable" dates to potentially inflate the value of stock options to key executives. Jobs sits on Disney's board and is its largest individual shareholder. Lasseter is now chief creative officer of Disney's animation studios. A Disney spokesman could not be reached for comment.

"This is yet another incident of really questionable ethical conduct by Steve Jobs," said James Post, a Boston University management professor who teaches corporate governance and ethics. "Steve Jobs is too smart a guy to just have stumbled multiple times into this kind of behavior. Now it will be up to the U.S. attorney or the SEC to decide what to do about that."

In March 2001, Jobs signed a 10-year employment contract with Lasseter, who had delivered box-office gold for Pixar with "Toy Story" and other animated films. Jobs was eager to lock Lasseter into a long-term contract, fearing Disney might try to recruit the director, the Journal reported.

The new contract included a $5 million signing bonus and a $2.5 million annual salary. An SEC filing said 1 million stock options were "previously" granted "at the fair market value" on Dec. 5, 2000, the day before the options were dated. That price was the lowest of 2000. By that March, Pixar's shares had rebounded dramatically.

From 2003 through last year, Lasseter cashed in about 880,000 of the options, adjusted for a 2-for-1 split, at various prices before converting the remaining shares to Disney shares when Pixar was sold, the Journal reported.

Revelations of Jobs' potential involvement in the suspect timing of stock-option grants at Apple and Pixar are becoming cumulative, said Adam Pritchard, a University of Michigan law professor who used to work for the SEC. It remains to be seen if prosecutors can make the case that Jobs understood that the practice ran afoul of securities laws.

"There was no effort to disguise what's being done, which suggests he didn't think there was anything wrong with it," Pritchard said.

Former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone cautions against a rush to judgment. "There are 1,000 facts that could make one of these stock-options cases turn 180 degrees," he said.

SEC Formalizes KLA Probe (SJMN)

By Mark Schwanhausser And Ryan Blitstein

San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has elevated its probe into stock option backdating at KLA-Tencor into a formal investigation, the company said Friday.

The San Jose maker of chip-inspection equipment, which said it learned the news Feb. 2, has faced an informal investigation by the SEC and a separate probe by the Justice Department since last May, when newspaper reports raised questions about the fortunate timing of options awarded to Chairman Kenneth Levy.

Last week, KLA acknowledged in its 2006 annual report that the company intentionally priced stock options ``retroactively," falsified documents and violated its stock plan rules about issuing discounted options. The company said that some former executives selected the ``fortuitously low" prices, while others were aware of the abuses.

The internal inquiry led to the ouster of Levy, a Silicon Valley pioneer, General Counsel Stuart Nichols, and director Jon Tompkins, the former CEO of Tencor before it merged with KLA.

The company also fired Kenneth Schroeder, a former chief executive who most recently served as a senior adviser, and canceled all tainted options he held. Although KLA-Tencor hasn't said so explicitly, its reports appear to blame Schroeder for much of the options abuses. Schroeder plans to fight his firing and the cancellation of his options, KLA-Tencor said.

A formal investigation means the SEC can issue subpoenas to force the disclosure of information, rather than asking for information to be provided voluntarily during an informal inquiry.

But it doesn't necessarily indicate a dramatic shift by the SEC, said Darryl P. Rains, a partner with Morrison & Foerster in Palo Alto. For example, the SEC might formalize an investigation in order to subpoena an uncooperative former executive or a financial institution that can't otherwise turn over an executive's private banking or brokerage statements.

``People often mistake it to mean it's more serious," Rains said. ``KLA's case is quite serious, but I don't think it became more serious all of a sudden."

KLA is ``cooperating fully" with the SEC and Justice Department investigations ``and intends to continue to do so," it said in its quarterly report to the SEC.

The company recently restated results from 1994 through 2005 to include $370 million in charges related to those backdated options. KLA-Tencor expects to record up to $6 million in additional charges in coming financial periods related to the backdating.

The SEC filing released Friday also provides details about what the company is doing to help rank-and-file employees deal with the fallout of the backdating scandal. The company said that all employees who got options got tainted options.

If workers hold discounted options, the company intends to offer to reprice them so that workers can avoid a new 20 percent tax and interest on discounted options. In turn, it intends to pay bonuses to compensate workers for the lost discount. It also might consider paying tax penalties that workers incur. If workers exercised tainted options in 2006, the company intends to pay any additional taxes they incur.

Such payments are expected to cost the company about $30 million.

The company also will compensate employees who were unable to buy discounted stock in the employee stock purchase plan, or ESPP. The company had to suspend the ESPP last year because it was prohibited from issuing stock while it was behind in releasing up-to-date earnings information. KLA-Tencor began making such payments last year, and it decided Jan. 24 to continue doing so into 2007.

KLA also disclosed that the Department of Labor is examining its 401(k) plan in connection to the backdating, but a company spokeswoman declined to elaborate late Friday.

GM Accounting Issues Still Unresolved (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

General Motors Corp. said late Friday it still isn't ready to say when it will resolve accounting issues that forced it to delay filing its fourth-quarter and full-year financial results for 2006.

Separately, shares of GM and Ford Motor Co. rose Friday after Deutsche Bank upgraded the auto giants' shares to "buy," citing optimism that the companies can win health-care-cost savings from the United Auto Workers union this fall. Shares of GM were up 6.5% to $36.01 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Ford were at $8.73, up 2.1%, on the NYSE.

GM was originally scheduled to report preliminary fourth-quarter results Jan. 30 but announced two weeks ago that it would postpone the release. The company said it would provide further information on the progress of its financial reporting during the week of Feb. 5 and that it would submit its 10-k report with the Securities and Exchange Commission by the Mar. 1 deadline.

GM spokeswoman Renee-Rashid Merem said "it's still our intent to file by the due date." She said the company is still looking into various issues that forced the earnings delay.

The Detroit auto maker needs to review its accounting for previously disclosed deferred-tax liabilities that were overstated dating back to 2001 and for certain derivatives transactions and hedging activities. In addition, the company said it needed more time to finalize financial results and re-evaluate the value for GMAC Financial Services, the lending arm in which GM sold a majority stake last year.

Sallie Chairman Sold Shares Ahead Of Cuts (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord sold $18.3 million worth of company stock last week, just days before the Bush administration unveiled a multibillion-dollar cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to plummet.

Lord sold 400,000 shares of company stock Thursday, Feb. 1, and Friday, Feb. 2. The following Monday, after President Bush announced a budget that would cut subsidies to the student-lending industry by about $19 billion over five years, Sallie Mae's stock plunged about 9 percent, to $42.37 from $46.46, its lowest closing price in more than two years.

In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that night, SLM Corp., as Sallie Mae is formally known, disclosed Lord's sale of the shares, which it said was done to fund unspecified personal projects.

Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, said this week that Lord had planned to sell the shares for weeks and told the company about his plans to sell the stock, which represented about 29 percent of the Sallie Mae shares he owns outright, nine days before the sale.

Democrats in Congress have been calling for changes in student loan programs that would hurt Sallie Mae. The Reston-based student lending company has opposed the changes. But, Joyce said, Lord had no idea Bush would propose such huge rollbacks of lender subsidies. "Nobody had these cuts on their radar screen," he said. "The student lending community did not see this coming."

"I can understand that people are raising questions, but the timing was just completely coincidental," Joyce said. "He had been thinking of doing this for many weeks. He was watching the market and just elected to do it on Thursday and Friday."

If Lord had sold his shares at Monday's closing price of $42.37, he would have received about $1.4 million less. Lord sold the shares in a series of transactions over the two days at prices that ranged from $45.75 to $46.03.

"It certainly seems to raise some fairly significant questions," said Larry P. Ellsworth, a former lawyer with the SEC's trial unit. He said company executives generally cannot trade on potentially market-moving information if they receive the information in their official roles and it is not available to the public.

Lord, who was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment, did not act on such information, Joyce said.

William M. Diefenderfer III, chairman of the Sallie Mae board's audit committee, said Lord told the directors at the end of a meeting Jan. 25 that that he planned to sell up to $30 million worth of company stock. "Everybody said fine, and that was it," Diefenderfer said yesterday.

"Al is as honest as the day is long," Diefenderfer added. "If he knew the cuts were coming, he would not have sold."

Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department, said some Capitol Hill staff members were briefed on the proposed budget last Thursday but that the suggested cuts were not shared with Sallie Mae officials before Monday's announcement.

There were signs that the White House would propose cutting subsidies for the lending industry in its budget, said Matt Snowling, an analyst at Arlington investment bank Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group.

"We downgraded Sallie Mae about three or four weeks ago because we had heard that the administration was looking at cutting into lender subsidies," he said. "It's not completely a surprise to us, although it clearly was a surprise to a lot of investors."

The company's stock has been declining for months, though this week's drop was particularly precipitous.

The day after the president's budget and Lord's sale were disclosed, Sallie Mae stock closed at $41.96 per share, a 52-week low. The stock rebounded yesterday, closing at $42.55.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Trial Exposes White House Crisis Machine (AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

David Addington, chief legal adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney, says he was taken aback when the White House started making public pronouncements about the CIA leak investigation.

In the fall of 2003, President Bush's press secretary was categorically denying that either Karl Rove or I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was involved in exposing the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA employee married to a critic of the war in Iraq.

"Why are you making these statements?" Addington asked White House communications director Dan Bartlett.

"Your boss is the one who wanted" them, Bartlett replied, referring to Cheney.

With that, "I shut up," Addington recalled recently for jurors in Libby's CIA leak trial, which begins its fourth week on Monday with Libby's lawyers calling their first witnesses.

So far, the testimony of Addington and other administration aides, along with documents and Libby's audiotaped grand jury testimony, have provided a rare glimpse of how the Bush White House scrambled to respond to a political crisis as it intersected a criminal investigation.

At the intersection was Cheney, along with Rove and Libby, who were working in the summer of 2003 to rebut claims by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that Bush had misled the nation about prewar intelligence on Iraq.

The White House denials on behalf of Rove and Libby came just before Rove secretly began acknowledging to the FBI that he had confirmed Plame's identity for conservative columnist Bob Novak, who first published her name and relationship to Wilson.

About the same time, Libby came under suspicion because NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert had talked to the FBI, contradicting Libby's version of a conversation between the two men that would become the heart of the perjury and obstruction charges against Libby.

Bush and Cheney made a common mistake in their public handling of the Plame affair, says presidential scholar and University of Texas government professor Bruce Buchanan, who has watched Bush's career since his days as Texas governor.

"They're in a high-stakes game of poker, the immediate pressure is political and the people in charge are political people," Buchanan said. "If there is a legal issue it will dawn, but by then someone is out on a limb."

Testimony and documents in the trial show Rove joining Cheney in trying to undercut Wilson's claim that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat.

"We're a day late in getting responses to the story," Rove told a staff meeting, according to Libby's notes.

"Get the full story out," Cheney told aides, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

There were glitches in the leak campaign against Wilson.

New York Times reporter Judith Miller never wrote a story about it, even after Cheney persuaded Bush to declassify prewar intelligence so it could be shared with Miller. The intelligence report said Iraq was vigorously trying to acquire uranium from the African nation of Niger.

"It was a totally failed effort," Libby told the grand jury of his meetings with Miller.

But there were successes too.

Libby recalled asking Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz to reach out to The Wall Street Journal.

"I don't have as good a relationship with The Wall Street Journal as Secretary Wolfowitz did," Libby told the grand jury. "I talked to Secretary Wolfowitz about trying to get that point across, and he undertook to do so."

The Journal ran an editorial focusing on the theme Libby wanted. The editorial stated that the prewar intelligence the newspaper was describing had not come from the White House, "which to our mind has handled this story in a hamhanded fashion."

In the Libby trial, Bush comes across mostly as an interested observer.

DOJ_NMG_0130867

According to Libby's notes, some of which surfaced at the trial, Bush expressed interest in a May 6, 2003 New York Times column critical of the administration and referencing an unnamed former ambassador, who turned out to be Wilson.

In questioning Libby before the grand jury, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald juxtaposed Bush's public statements condemning leakers and Libby's contacts with reporters, some of whom have testified against him.

"Were you at all concerned that while the president was stating that there's no White House involvement in any leaks whatsoever, that you were one of the people who may have been referred to" in press reports about possible White House leakers? asked Fitzgerald.

In the grand jury recordings, the prosecutor also asked Libby about his interaction with Rove a few days before Novak exposed Plame's CIA identity. Libby said Rove "was animated that Novak was animated about this." Libby added that Rove "thought it was a good thing that somebody was writing about" Wilson and his wife.

Cheney told Libby early in the effort to deal with Wilson that his wife worked at the CIA. And while the Cheney-Libby team worked in lockstep attacking Wilson in July 2003, Libby said he faced a somewhat distant vice president when the affair came under investigation, first by the Justice Department, then by Fitzgerald.

Regarding his discussions with reporters about Wilson's wife, "I would have been happy to unburden myself" to Cheney, Libby told the grand jury, but "he didn't want to hear it."

Taking The Bait On A Phish Scam (WP)

By Annys Shin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Job Seekers Are Targets, Victims of Sophisticated Ploy

The online news site USA Voice isn't going to win any kudos from media critics. Not for its top story Monday, "Super Bowl Ads Don't Live Up to the Hype." And not for its Fox News-style slogan, "USA Voice: Honest and Unfiltered."

As a phishing scheme, however, privacy experts say it's a winner.

The Web site for the "world's fastest growing news organization" looked good enough to fool Katherine Brinton, an aspiring journalist in Philadelphia. After posting her r?sum? on Monster.com nine months ago, the 23-year old received an e-mail from USA Voice in November that said it was looking for reporters with "excellent writing skills" and an "innate ability to find the truth."

Brinton filled out an online application with her name, address and telephone number. But instead of job offers, she began receiving a stream of unsolicited e-mails hawking Viagra, payday loans and penny stocks.

"I felt like I was being scammed," she said.

Brinton fell victim to a sophisticated phishing scam, which, in recent months, targeted thousands of job seekers on such popular Web sites as Monster.com and CareerBuilder.com. Phishers send out seemingly legitimate e-mail in an attempt to get people to reply with personal information then used in a variety of scams.

Since June, the Better Business Bureau serving Metro Washington has logged more than 8,000 inquiries about USA Voice and a related entity, Instant Human Resources. USA Voice lists a downtown Washington address; Instant Human Resources lists an address in Rockville. Both locations turned out to be a service that forwards mail for other businesses. Instant Human Resources' parent company, Internet Solutions, says it is based in Orlando.

The Better Business Bureau has received 20 complaints about the three companies, and all share similarities. USA Voice, Instant Human Resources and Internet Solutions advertised such positions as "gossip reporter," "IT assistant" and "quality control administrator" on employment sites such as Monster, CareerBuilder and Yahoo HotJobs, and contacted people who had posted r?sum?s there. But after being enticed to give up personal information, job seekers never heard from the companies again and instead began getting inundated with spam.

"These firms purport to provide employment opportunities. Consumers allege that the only thing they have received is bulk unsolicited e-mail. Based on this, it would appear that the given companies are . . . a scheme to amass and sell personal contact information," said Edward J. Johnson III, chief executive of the Better Business Bureau of Washington.

None of the companies responded to Better Business Bureau inquiries. They also did not respond to a reporter's e-mails or to notes left in their Washington-area mailboxes.

In 2006, about 109 million U.S. adults received phishing e-mails, up from 57 million in 2004, according to research firm Gartner, of Stamford, Conn. About one in six phishing e-mails are opened -- a better rate than for e-mails from legitimate businesses, said Jeff Wilbur, vice president of marketing for e-mail security firm Iconix.

The majority of phishing e-mails claim to be from financial institutions, but phishers have also switched to mimicking dating, social networking and other kinds of online services. In those cases, victims might let their guard down because they are not giving out financial information, Wilbur said. But such attacks can leave them just as vulnerable to identity theft.

"Sometimes these phishing attacks look innocent because you're not giving up what you consider huge personal information. But it might be the final piece of the puzzle of the information they have on you," Wilbur said.

Job search sites offer identity thieves a rich source of personal information and a pool of potential victims willing to divulge even more in hopes of landing employment. Since 2004, some of the largest online job search firms, such as Monster and CareerBuilder, have taken more precautions against criminals looking to collect personal information from their users.

Privacy experts say the job sites could do more to weed out fraudulent ads. "People, when looking for work, are at their most vulnerable. Job sites owe it to consumers to take that extra step to make sure these scams don't slip through the net," said Pam Dixon, executive director of the World Privacy Forum, a nonprofit research and consumer group.

Spokespeople for Monster, CareerBuilder, and Yahoo said they include warnings about fraud on their sites, screen employment listings and employer Web sites and monitor job postings daily.

CareerBuilder removed job ads by USA Voice eight months ago, said spokeswoman Jennifer Sullivan. Monster removed ads by USA Voice and Instant Human Resources in December and ads by Internet Solutions last week, said spokeswoman Danielle Perry. Yahoo removed ads from Internet Solutions last week.

Privacy experts and security officials at the job sites agreed that the three Web sites in question are "particularly clever" and "very slick." Internet Solutions, for example, requires users to create a password. Dixon said this was probably a ploy to collect access codes for online bank and e-commerce accounts. Most people use the same password for everything, security experts said, and criminals know that.

USA Voice's victims were persuaded to harvest personal information from others. After posting her r?sum? on CareerBuilder, Emma Ward of Collegeville, Pa., was contacted by e-mail by USA Voice. The 24-year-old was told she qualified to be an editor and was responsible for recruiting her own writers. She just had to collect and send their e-mail addresses to the company. The writers, in turn, would be paid by the number of hits their stories received, giving them incentive to direct more people to the USA Voice site.

Ward never got around to recruiting anyone. She stopped hearing from USA Voice and started receiving spam.

Job seekers got offers, but not for legitimate employment. Instant Human Resources told Michael Coleman of Bronxville, N.Y., after seeing his r?sum? on Monster or CareerBuilder, that he could be the U.S. representative for an overseas firm. The 34-year-old Web project manager signed onto the Instant Human Resources' Web site, which required him to enter his name, address, phone number, and Social Security number and create a password.

Coleman followed the instructions but entered a fake Social Security number. The job, he said, "didn't sound right." He didn't pursue it any further after online research confirmed his suspicions: The position sounded like a scam involving cashing old money orders.

"For anyone looking for a job, it's a tough economy," Coleman said. "You don't want to go to a site and see some scam."

California: Elie Wiesel Is Attacked (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, was attacked at a San Francisco hotel last week by an unknown assailant, the police said yesterday. Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, said Mr. Wiesel, 78, was attending a conference when a man approached him in an elevator and asked to interview him. After a brief discussion, the man dragged Mr. Wiesel off the elevator and tried to restrain him, but Mr. Wiesel screamed, and the attacker fled. Mr. Wiesel was not injured. No arrests were made, though Sergeant Gittens said the police had a “person of interest” in the case. The Associated Press reported that a Holocaust denier calling himself Eric Hunt had claimed credit on an anti-Semitic Web site for accosting Mr. Wiesel, but the police could not confirm whether he was the suspect.

Elie Wiesel Accosted At Peace Conference (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, California (AP) -- Nobel laureate and Holocaust scholar Elie Wiesel was dragged from an elevator and roughed up during a peace conference at a San Francisco hotel last week, police said Friday. The author was not injured.

The assailant approached Wiesel in an elevator February 1 at the Argent Hotel and requested an interview, police Sgt. Neville Gittens said.

When Wiesel consented to talk in the hotel's lobby, the man insisted it be done in a hotel room and dragged the 78-year-old off the elevator on the sixth floor, Gittens said.

The assailant fled after Wiesel began to scream, and Wiesel went to the lobby and called police.

Gittens said police are investigating the incident as a crime. He said investigators were aware of a posting at an anti-Semitic Web site in which a man claimed responsibility for the attack, but declined to comment further.

Wiesel couldn't be immediately reached for comment at Boston University, where he teaches, or through his institute in New York.

Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camps at Auschwitz and Buchenwald during World War II, has worked for human rights in many parts of the world and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986.

California: Sex Offender Law Not Retroactive (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2007

A federal judge ruled that a voter-approved restriction on where sex offenders can live could not be applied retroactively, potentially freeing thousands of parolees from a ban on living within 2,000 feet of a school or other place where children gather.

The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said there was nothing in the law, Proposition 83, that specified its provisions were to be applied retroactively.

The proposition, known as Jessica's Law, was approved Nov. 7 by 70.5 percent of voters and took effect the next day. It also increases prison terms for sex offenders and requires lifetime satellite tracking of rapists and other felony sex criminals after their release from prison.

Coca-Cola Spy Goes To Jail After Apartment Fire, Judge Doesn't Wait Until Her May 23 Sentencing To Put (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 10, 2007

A federal judge ordered ex-Coke secretary Joya Williams to jail Friday, saying she had an "utter disregard for the law."

Williams, who faces 10 years in prison for trying to sell Coke trade secrets to Pepsi, has been free on a $3,000 bond since her conviction Feb. 2. She will be sentenced May 23.

But prosecutors this week asked Judge J. Owen Forrester to revoke the bond following a fire at Williams' apartment that started within an hour of a jury finding her guilty last week.

Assistant U.S. Attorney BJay Pak told Forrester during a hearing Friday that Williams, 41, admitted being "high as a kite" on Vicks cough medicine as the jury read the guilty verdict last week. Pak said she had drunk an entire bottle of the medication.

Jurors convicted Williams under the federal Corporate Espionage Act of trying to sell confidential Coke documents and sample test products for $1.5 million to an undercover FBI agent posing as a Pepsi go-between.

After the verdict, Williams drove home to her apartment in Norcross, which burned down a short time later. Gwinnett investigators have ruled the fire an accident, but Pak told the judge that Williams has made conflicting statements about how the fire started.

Williams first told fire investigators she saw the fire when she drove up to the apartment building, Pak said. Then she told them she opened her apartment door and saw smoke. On Monday, Williams told investigators she lit candles to stay warm and that the candles caused the blaze that displaced nine families, Pak said.

"In stressful situations, she's prone to act like this in an unpredictable behavior," Pak said. "I'm not clearly convinced if she drives out of the courthouse today she's not capable of making irrational decisions that put the public at risk."

Pak said the stiff sentence Williams faces also could prompt her to flee. He also was concerned about the fact that she had no place to live and no job.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, said there was no evidence Williams set the apartment fire on purpose. Singer asked the judge to put Williams on electronic monitoring and argued she had a strong support system.

Williams' parents, George and Karen Williams, each testified that they were willing to take Williams into their home in Rex until her sentencing.

"I'll do whatever is necessary," George Williams told the judge.

"She will eat when I eat. She will have a place to sleep when I have a place to sleep."

Several among the two dozen friends, family and church members who attended the hearing Friday testified she was not a danger.

The judge disagreed and told U.S. marshals to take Williams into custody.

"These hearings are never pleasant," the judge said. "This is federal court. In federal court, we don't play."

Forrester said he was swayed by the fact that Williams "showed absolutely no regard for the truth" at trial and an "utter disregard for the law" in general.

"She attacked Mr. Pak and accused him of manipulating the evidence," Forrester said of Williams' often-defiant testimony during her two-week trial.

Forrester said Williams' conflicting statements about the fire could be construed under federal law as "guilty knowledge." He said he was skeptical of Williams' explanation that she lit candles in the middle of the day to keep warm.

Forrester also said he was concerned about threatening text messages Williams sent to a government witness prior to trial. In one of the messages, Williams told the witness, a former boyfriend, "I will pay u back."

Prosecutors said Williams sent the message after the witness resisted her attempts to influence his testimony.

"You just can't do anything more serious than that," Forrester said after reading the series of text messages aloud. "I think you are a danger."

Williams showed no emotion as she was taken into custody Friday. She removed a hair clip and was led away. Her parents were somber as they watched their daughter slip away behind a door.

In the hallway outside court, Williams' family and friends hugged her parents. Someone hummed a hymn.

All declined to comment, as did Singer, Williams' attorney.

Williams' plot was exposed last year after Pepsi executives received a solicitation and turned it over to Coke executives, who called the FBI.

Two accomplices, Ibrahim Dimson of New York and Edmund Duhaney of Decatur, pleaded guilty in October and also will be sentenced in May.

At trial, Williams said she took documents from Coke because she was behind on her work. She then tried to convince jurors that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from her apartment and masterminded the scheme behind her back.

Coke Thief Jailed As Flight Risk (AP)

By Dorie Turner, The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2007

ATLANTA — A former Coca-Cola secretary who was convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant was ordered to jail Friday over concerns that she could be a flight risk.

DOJ_NMG_0130871

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester told Joya Williams that her behavior since her arrest in July has showed that she ''would do anything to avoid going to jail.''

''You have utter disregard for the law,'' Forrester said during the two-hour hearing in federal court. ''I could not trust you on your word.''

Williams, 41, who had been free on bond pending sentencing, was immediately taken into custody.

She faces up to 10 years in prison for conspiring to steal trade secrets from

Atlanta-based Coca-Cola Co. and sell them to rival PepsiCo. Inc. The sentencing for Williams and two co-defendants who pleaded guilty to conspiracy — Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney — is set for May 23.

Federal prosecutors filed papers Tuesday asking for the immediate jailing of Williams after investigators found clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items in her Mustang following a fire that destroyed her apartment at Hunter's Pointe Apartments in Norcross a week ago.

The fire, which was ruled accidental, occurred nearly 90 minutes after Williams was found guilty in federal court in Atlanta. Ten units, including one that was vacant, were destroyed by the blaze.

Gwinnett County fire investigators found a lit candle ignited some bedroom curtains in apartment No. 1009, which is Williams' listed address. Gwinnett officials said they could not confirm the name of the apartment's occupants.

U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said that Williams told fire investigators that she was ''high as a kite'' from mixing prescription medications with an entire bottle of cough medicine before the verdict last week. Pak said Williams also lied to fire investigators several times about her whereabouts when the fire started.

He also pointed to threatening text messages Williams sent to her former boyfriend Sedrick Wilson after he declined her requests that he lie on the witness stand.

''In stressful situations, she is proven to act unpredictably,'' Pak told the judge.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, called the government's claim that her client is a risk to the community and a risk of flight ''more than offensive.''

''She has met all of the conditions of her bond,'' Singer told the judge.

She pointed to witness testimony that Williams' car was ''junky'' and always full of clothing and other items. She said Williams had no intention of fleeing after the fire because she left her keys and cell phone in her apartment.

Singer declined further comment after the hearing.

Given A Fine, Hevesi Praises His Successor (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 9 — The former state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, praised his replacement on Friday, after a hearing at which a judge sentenced him to pay a $5,000 fine for his use of state employees to chauffeur his wife.

The State Legislature voted on Wednesday to appoint Thomas P. DiNapoli, an assemblyman from Nassau County, as the new comptroller, two months after Mr. Hevesi resigned as part of a plea deal with the Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares.

Speaking after his courtroom appearance, Mr. Hevesi praised Mr. DiNapoli, whom Gov. Eliot Spitzer has criticized as unqualified.

"He's a very smart public official, and I think he will make an excellent comptroller," Mr. Hevesi said.

Before resigning last year, Mr. Hevesi agreed to plead guilty to a felony charge of defrauding the government and to submit a DNA sample for the state's criminal database.

In delivering the sentence, Judge Stephen W. Herrick described Mr. Hevesi's actions as "unexplainable and totally unacceptable," but cited Mr. Hevesi's decades of public service, cooperation with the investigation and agreement to leave politics as reasons for the mild sentence.

"Your fall from grace here has been total and from a very great height," Judge Herrick said. Mr. Hevesi served for more than two decades in the Assembly and later as New York City comptroller before he won election to the state comptroller's job in 2002.

In accepting the sentence, Mr. Hevesi apologized to his family, to voters and to his former office staff, saying he took full and sole responsibility for his actions. "I'm culpable, I'm responsible, and I apologize," he said, before a courtroom filled mostly with reporters.

But Mr. Hevesi's lawyer, Joel Cohen, was less meek. Before Mr. Hevesi's statement of regret, Mr. Cohen delivered what amounted to a defense of his client. Conceding that Mr. Hevesi's "judgment eluded him," he nevertheless criticized the press for describing Mr. Hevesi as "disgraced." He also hinted that Mr. Soares had been overly eager for publicity, saying that the district attorney "is now very well known."

Leaving the courthouse, Mr. Hevesi said he had not decided what to do next.

"I was waiting for today to decide what to do with the rest of my life," he said.

Jury Votes Against Execution In Trial Of Drug Dealer Convicted In 2 Killings (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

A notorious street-corner crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was spared the death penalty yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn when a jury failed to reach a unanimous verdict to execute him for ordering the killing of two rivals.

The jury's action will result in a sentence of life without the possibility of release for the convicted drug dealer, Kenneth McGriff, 46, who was known as Supreme and whose drug crew, the Supreme Team, held sway on the streets of southeast Queens in the 1980s.

After the panel delivered its verdict and the jurors were ushered from the courtroom, Mr. McGriff's tearful brother apologized to the families of the two murdered men. In the courtroom's gallery, he embraced the aunt of Troy Singleton, one of his brother's two victims, saying, "So sorry, so sorry."

Moments later, the aunt, Rita Williams, with tears in her eyes, hugged each of the three prosecutors in the case, reaching over the balustrade that separates the gallery from the well of the courtroom.

She also hugged and kissed the two New York Police Department detectives who had been investigating the killings since 2001. One of the detectives, Anthony Castiglia, who retired last year, whispered to her, "It's over now."

Last week, after the same anonymous jury found Mr. McGriff guilty of ordering the murders, Mr. Singleton's mother, Bessie Singleton, and Karen Cameron, the mother of Mr. McGriff's other victim, Eric Smith, said they would be uncomfortable with a death sentence.

All the jurors, who were questioned by the judge before being selected to serve on the case, had said they were willing to sentence the defendant to death if the evidence warranted it. On the verdict sheet, the jury noted that "execution would not be an option" if the case had been tried in state court.

One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David A. Ruhnke, who defended the case with Jean Barrett, said his client was relieved by the jury's action.

"And we feel relieved to have gotten to death's door and not had it open," he said.

He contended that the case should never have been prosecuted in federal court and suggested that the government's decision to seek the death penalty was inappropriate.

"The chances of securing the death penalty in this case were almost zero from the beginning," he said. "The rest of the country is falling out of love with the death penalty, and the Bush administration is still in the infatuation stage."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, whose office prosecuted the case, would not directly address Mr. Ruhnke's comments, saying only, "The decision to impose the death penalty is solely within the province of the jury, and we respect their decision."

As the jury delivered its verdict in United States District Court in Brooklyn, with the forewoman responding to the clerk's questions on the lengthy verdict sheet, Mr. McGriff appeared impassive. He leaned his chin on his hand, stroked his goatee and pushed his glasses up the bridge of his nose.

Mr. McGriff was convicted on Feb. 1 of ordering the two 2001 murders and a range of other crimes.

The verdict in the penalty phase, which the jury returned after deliberating for about three and a half hours, came two weeks after the judge in the case, Frederic Block, called the government's effort to seek the death penalty "absurd" and a waste of taxpayers' money. In unusually blunt language, he urged the prosecutors, outside the presence of the jury, to forward his remarks to their Justice Department superiors in Washington and to ask them to abandon the endeavor.

Yesterday, as he was being led from the courtroom, Mr. McGriff, who had always behaved courteously during the lengthy investigation, the detectives have said, nodded at Mr. Castiglia's partner, William Courtney, who nodded back.

NYC Drug Lord Spared Death Penalty (AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A remorseless drug lord with ties to hip hop and Hollywood was spared the death penalty Friday by a jury that instead sentenced him to life in prison without parole for having two rivals killed.

Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff, 46, who had listened calmly as federal prosecutors called for his death, showed no reaction as the jury announced he would not receive a lethal injection.

Jurors, who deliberated just over 2 1/2 hours on the sentence, convicted him last week of paying $50,000 for the 2001 killings of an obscure rapper named Eric "E-Money Bags" Smith and Troy Singleton.

Prosecutors said Smith was killed for his fatal 1999 shooting of a McGriff associate, while Singleton was targeted because McGriff felt he might retaliate on Smith's behalf.

McGriff was the founder of the Supreme Crew, a brutal drug gang that operated in Queens during the 1980s. At its peak, the Supreme Team's network of dealers was making $200,000 a day, authorities said.

After McGriff did prison time on a drug conviction, he was released in 1997 and aligned himself with neighborhood friend and music mogul Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo. Defense attorneys claimed this was part of McGriff's plan to create movies and music.

The one-time street thugs produced one film, "Crime Partners 2000," a straight to video affair that featured rappers Ja Rule, Snoop Dogg and Ice-T.

Prosecutors said McGriff returned to the drug business in New York and Baltimore. Lorenzo and his brother, Chris, were indicted with McGriff but acquitted at a separate trial of using their label Murder Inc. to launder $1 million in drug money.

After Smith's slaying in a hail of gunfire, McGriff text messaged a friend: "You missed the party."

McGriff also was convicted of drug dealing but acquitted of lesser drug and weapons charges.

DISTRICT BRIEFING (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

COURTS

Conviction of Former Detective Overturned

By a 7 to 5 vote, a federal appeals court yesterday overturned the conviction of a former D.C. police detective arrested in an FBI sting.

Nelson Valdes was convicted in October 2002 of three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450. Valdes provided the informant with names and addresses in March 2001 to match four license plates and checked on warrants on another person, prosecutors said.

Valdes was tried for bribery, and the jury in U.S. District Court returned guilty verdicts on the gratuities charge, a lesser offense.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals reversed the conviction a year ago, ruling in a 2 to 1 decision that the gratuities charge -- which bars seeking or accepting gratuities "for or because of any official act" -- did not apply to Valdes's conduct in the case.

Acting en banc, or as a full appellate court, the court ruled yesterday that the conviction must be overturned. The majority found that Valdes's actions did not constitute an "official act" under the law. Valdes's queries, the judges said, were not used to launch a police investigation, action or decision.

The dissenters said that such a strict interpretation will harm the ability to conduct stings of corrupt public officials.

Valdes has faced other trouble: He was indicted in 2001 on two counts of cocaine distribution. He was acquitted of those charges after a month-long trial in 2002.

Douglas Development Official Pleads Guilty

The chief financial officer for one of Washington's most prominent development companies pleaded guilty Thursday to tax evasion, the U.S. attorney's office said.

John E. Brownell, 45, is the third top official from Douglas Development Corp. to be found guilty of felony charges. Prosecutors said Douglas Development made payments to a credit-line account to disguise compensation for Brownell, and he received other unreported income through various financial maneuverings.

A jury convicted Douglas Jemal, president and owner of Douglas Development, of wire fraud in the fall but acquitted him of more serious bribery and conspiracy charges.

Blake Esherick, the company's vice president, was convicted by the same jury of wire fraud and two counts of tax evasion.

Jemal and Esherick are awaiting sentencing.

Brownell, of Rockville, is to be sentenced June 7 by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina.

Sex Probe Targets Inglewood Officers (LAT)

By Ashley Surdin And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

The department is looking into allegations of massage parlor visits.

At least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that have been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown.

The internal affairs investigation by the Inglewood Police Department began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia.

That probe, which resulted in charges against more than two dozen people, led to allegations that Inglewood officers engaged in the sexual liaisons — sometimes in uniform — during work hours and off duty, according to several local and federal sources familiar with the case.

Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included "very detailed ledgers" that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation.

The ledgers, the source said, had the names of customers and the amounts they paid except when the customers were police officers. In those cases the women allegedly entered a symbol.

Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution. The woman's attorney said this week that he has filed a claim against the city and is awaiting an answer from authorities on whether the two officers have been arrested or charged.

Though he and other city officials would not disclose details about the new inquiry, Inglewood Councilman Ralph L. Franklin said it was aimed at determining whether the alleged sexual misconduct involved a large number of officers over an extended period of time. He said the FBI was assisting police in the investigation.

Franklin also said the department was trying to determine if any ranking officers in the department were involved in collusion with the officers suspected of misconduct.

Numerous law enforcement officials and city leaders said the Inglewood Police Department's internal affairs unit will ultimately recommend whether any officers should face criminal charges.

To date, sources say, none of the officers has been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments.

DOJ_NMG_0130875

The internal affairs investigation began more than a year ago when several Inglewood massage parlors and tanning salons were the focus of federal allegations of money laundering and prostitution. To date, 18 people have pleaded guilty in that investigation, and four others — including the alleged owner of the brothels, Kimberly Mao — are awaiting trial.

Mao has pleaded not guilty to the federal charges and has repeatedly denied involvement in prostitution or money laundering.

But last week, in a group interview organized by Mao, a dozen women who worked for her at the businesses told The Times that they had seen or heard of officers coming into the massage parlors and sometimes demanding sexual services.

The women, who denied they were prostitutes, recalled several specific incidents, including one in which officers donned masks to hide their identities and pointed guns at employees. Another employee told The Times that an older officer exposed himself in an unsuccessful effort to have her engage in sex with him.

Sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year.

But Assistant U.S. Atty. Carmen Luege, who is prosecuting Mao and her co-defendants, said she was not aware of any federal probe of the Inglewood officers.

Customs agency spokeswoman Virginia Kice declined to comment other than to say that if the agency uncovered evidence of misconduct or criminal activity by other law enforcement officers, it would refer the matter to the appropriate law enforcement agency for investigation. Given the nature of the allegations, that agency would probably be the FBI. An FBI spokeswoman said she could not confirm nor deny that an expanded investigation was underway.

Inglewood Mayor Roosevelt Dorn would not address specific questions about the investigation other than to say no officers have been fired and that he was confident the department would do a thorough job investigating the alleged misconduct.

"They are on top of it and doing their due diligence," Dorn said. "They are doing what you would expect our police force to do. You have to be very careful when you're doing this type of investigation. You don't want to ruin anyone's career or create problems with families without having actual proof and proof that would stand up in a court of law."

Inglewood interim Police Chief J. I. Davis, who took over the department after the investigation was underway, would only say that his agency was actively pursuing a "difficult and sensitive" inquiry.

Inglewood, a working-class city of 112,000, has long struggled with prostitution problems. Because of its proximity to Los Angeles International Airport, Inglewood has numerous hotels lining its main commercial streets.

The investigation comes as the department, the seventh-largest police agency in the county, struggles to fill two dozen vacancies in its 213-officer force.

At a town hall meeting Thursday night, police commanders said they were doing everything possible to fill the positions, and many citizens applauded the efforts to increase the size of the force.

During the meeting, police officials said a top priority has been to combat prostitution in the city by dramatically reducing the number of massage parlors that could serve as fronts for sexual encounters. Since 2004, the department's efforts have cut the number of massage parlors from 23 to seven, a police official told the town hall meeting. There was no mention of the internal investigation.

Since that investigation began, Inglewood police as well as the FBI have begun a separate inquiry into the alleged rape of a Florida woman who was stopped by two patrol officers on suspicion of prostitution.

In that incident, which is also under investigation by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office, a 23-year-old woman alleged that the officers confronted her on Century Boulevard on a Sunday night as she left her hotel to have dinner at a fast-food restaurant. The thoroughfare has pockets that have long been known for prostitution.

The woman, who has said she was in town with her boyfriend to visit her mother for the holidays, alleged that the officers accused her of being a prostitute and demanded that she take them back to her hotel to prove she was not a streetwalker.

At the hotel, according to her attorney, the night manager verified that the woman was from Florida and a registered guest at the hotel. But one officer insisted that she take him to her room while the other officer waited by the patrol car, attorney Dylan Pollard said.

It was there, the woman has said, that she was raped.

Inglewood Officers Suspected Of Having Sex At Massage Parlors (SDUT/AP)

Associated Press
The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 10, 2007

INGLEWOOD – As many as six current and former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex at massage parlors and other adult businesses targeted in a recent crackdown.

The police department became aware of the allegations after federal agents began investigating Asian women being smuggled into Los Angeles, according to Saturday's Los Angeles Times.

Evidence includes "very detailed ledgers" that indicate officers were given sexual favors without paying, one source told the newspaper.

None of the officers under investigation have been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments, sources told the newspaper.

In the prostitution and money-laundering investigation involving massage parlors and tanning salons, 18 people have pleaded guilty to federal charges, and four others are awaiting trial.

About two months ago, the FBI confirmed it was investigating two Inglewood officers in the alleged rape of a 23-year-old Florida woman they detained on suspicion of prostitution. The woman's attorney said he filed a claim against the city and is awaiting word on whether the two officers have been arrested or charged.

Man Faces Fraud Charges Related To Hurricane Relief (TEXGAZ)

By Lynn LaRowe, Texarkana Gazette
Texarkana (TX) Gazette, February 10, 2007

A Texarkana man has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Texas in a fraud case related to hurricane relief in the Eastern District of Texas.

Gary Williams Trice, 36, has been charged with mail fraud after he allegedly illegally acquired $36,000 in FEMA hurricane assistance money. Trice is alleged to have submitted as many as 14 fraudulent applications for assistance based on hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma by using different names, addresses and Social Security numbers.

The investigation was conducted jointly by the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General, the United States Postal Service and the Department of Homeland Security.

"Hurricane-related fraud remains a priority of the Department of Justice," said United States Attorney Matthew Orwig in a press release issued this week. "Applications for assistance are continuing to be reviewed and any appearances of fraud will be thoroughly investigated."

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force was created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud.

The case is being prosecuted by Special Assistant United States Attorney Denise Simpson in Tyler, Texas.

If convicted, Trice faces up to 20 years in federal prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

Death Penalty Bears Down On O'Malley, Kaine (WP)

By John Wagner, Tim Craig
The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The governors of Maryland and Virginia have much in common: Both Martin O'Malley and Timothy M. Kaine are considered rising stars in the Democratic Party. Both grappled with violent crime as big-city mayors and have wives who have served as judges. And both are practicing Catholics who have voiced personal opposition to the death penalty.

Now they share something else: Both face decisions on that divisive issue that will be watched closely in their states and beyond.

O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, has pledged to work with lawmakers to repeal Maryland's death penalty -- and could effectively halt executions through the end of his tenure even without their support, given a recent court ruling.

Kaine, who was sworn in last year, presides over a state where executions are far more frequent. He soon could have to decide whether to sign bills to expand capital punishment in Virginia.

With Maryland lawmakers preparing to debate the death penalty in coming weeks, O'Malley said in an interview yesterday that his office has started researching the amount of money that the state has spent prosecuting such cases.

"I think the facts are on the side of those who say this is neither a deterrent nor is it cost-effective and in fact we may be wasting dollars that could be spent saving lives," O'Malley said.

Kaine, who has allowed four executions to proceed, would not say in a recent interview what he would do when the anticipated legislation reaches his desk, but he allowed that he does "not look at the expansion of the death penalty with a favorable eye."

"I would not say the problem in Virginia is that the death penalty is not applied enough," Kaine said.

The posture on both sides of the Potomac River -- and the openness of the governors on the issue -- is testament to the changing politics of the death penalty, analysts say.

"It wasn't long ago that if you were a Democrat and against the death penalty, you'd run a hundred miles from it," said Steve Jarding, a party strategist who gained prominence running Mark Warner's successful 2001 bid for Virginia governor. "It's still a polarizing issue, and you never want the polarizing issues to be the dominant ones. But the climate really has changed."

Although polls show that a majority of Americans support capital punishment, there is also evidence of growing unease about executions. That may make O'Malley's and Kaine's views less of a political liability than they would have been in years past.

Nationally, the number of death sentences dropped last year to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated by the U.S. Supreme Court 30 years ago. Of the 38 states that allow capital punishment, only 14 carried it out last year.

A dozen states, including Maryland, have suspended executions amid questions about the use of lethal injection. And last month, a New Jersey commission recommended that the state abandon capital punishment altogether, an idea embraced by the state's Democratic governor, Jon S. Corzine.

Anita Dunn, a national Democratic consultant, said "a sea shift" started in 2000 when Illinois's Republican governor, George Ryan, imposed a moratorium after a series of cases in which people sentenced to death had been wrongly convicted.

Opposition to the death penalty "used to be used against Democrats to show they were out-of-touch liberals," said Dunn, whose recent clients included O'Malley's Democratic primary opponent, former Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan.

Dunn said using the death penalty against a Democrat like O'Malley would be difficult because the former Baltimore mayor "built his career as a crime fighter."

Unlike Kaine, who has called his Catholic faith the underpinning of his opposition to the death penalty, O'Malley has not cast his opposition in religious terms. "Certainly on an issue like this, there's absolutely a moral aspect to it," he said. "But there are good people on both sides of this debate."

During last year's campaign in Maryland, neither Duncan nor then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) sought to use O'Malley's views on the death penalty against him, and the issue rarely came up. O'Malley offered his views when asked, but he did not make any promises about repealing the death penalty.

Aides say O'Malley likely would not have joined the debate so early in his term if not for a December court ruling that effectively halts executions until the state adopts new regulations on lethal injection. The ruling emboldened death penalty opponents, who introduced legislation last month that would replace the death penalty with life without parole.

Even with O'Malley's involvement, some supporters of a repeal are skeptical that it could survive a likely filibuster on the Senate floor -- if it gets that far.

"On the death penalty, I don't think people are persuadable or malleable," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

If the legislation fails, the short-term future of Maryland's death penalty is likely to rest squarely on O'Malley.

Under the court ruling, executions cannot resume until his administration drafts new regulations or until the legislature passes a bill allowing executions without new regulations. There is widespread speculation that O'Malley may decide not to put forward regulations, leaving a de facto moratorium in place as long as he is in office. He declined to discuss that prospect yesterday.

Capital punishment has also been a sensitive subject for Kaine, Virginia's first Catholic governor.

Since 1976, Virginia has put 98 people to death, second only to Texas, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. (Maryland has executed five.)

Kaine was dogged during his 2005 bid for governor about whether he would implement the state's ultimate punishment. In an interview a month before the election, he made it clear that he embraced the Catholic Church's teachings that the death penalty is inhumane. He referred to Pope John Paul II, who said in 1999 that the United States' use of the death penalty was "cruel and unnecessary."

But Kaine also sought to draw distinctions between his personal beliefs and the policy of the state, saying the law requires the governor to implement the death penalty unless there are extraordinary circumstances.

Virginia's Republican nominee for governor, Jerry W. Kilgore, then the attorney general, seized on Kaine's personal opposition, running an ad stating, "Tim Kaine says that Adolf Hitler doesn't qualify for the death penalty."

Even though a Washington Poll that year showed that 76 percent of Virginia voters favored capital punishment, many observers believe the ads backfired and helped Kaine win the election.

Kaine has continued to wrestle with the death penalty since taking office last January. In interviews, he said the hardest part of his job is having to decide whether to let an execution proceed.

But he has largely done what he campaigned on. Four times, he has said he found no "compelling reason" to overturn the decision of the jury and appellate courts. Kaine has so far spared one man, at least temporarily.

Kaine has also spoken out against a state policy that allows death row inmates to decide if they want to die by lethal injection or the electric chair.

Last summer, convicted killer Brandon W. Hedrick chose to die by electric chair, making national headlines.

Kaine will soon face another tough decision relating to the death penalty: The Virginia Senate and House, both dominated by law-and-order conservatives, have approved bills to expand the use of capital punishment by making accomplices and the killers of judges and court witnesses eligible for the penalty.

"It's like how many ways can you ban gay marriage?" Kaine said. "Virginia would like to do it nine times rather than eight times. The death penalty statute is kind of the same way. . . . I've got to be convinced there is a problem, and I've got to be convinced that the bill fixes a problem."

Catholic Lawmakers Oppose Death-penalty Repeal (WT)

By Tom Lobianco

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Key Catholic lawmakers in the General Assembly are splitting with major Catholic groups over an attempt to abolish the death penalty in Maryland.

"I know it's a little inconsistent, but I do feel [the death penalty] is a deterrent," said Sen. Norman R. Stone Jr., Baltimore County Democrat and a Catholic.

"Maybe you don't reconcile it until you meet your maker," said Delegate Susan K. McComas, Harford County Republican and a Catholic who is a member of the House Judiciary Committee.

The Maryland Catholic Conference is supporting a bill to repeal the death penalty this session, but some of its strongest opposition is coming from Catholic lawmakers.

Mr. Stone will weigh the bill with 10 other members of the Senate Judicial Proceedings Committee, including Sen. Alex X. Mooney, Frederick County Republican and the committee's other Catholic.

DOJ_NMG_0130879

Mr. Mooney, who supported a death penalty moratorium in 2003 and has been lobbied by death penalty opponents in past sessions, said he will oppose a repeal this session.

Two Baltimore Democrats proposed a repeal after a Maryland Court of Appeals ruling barred executions until the state develops a protocol for administering lethal injections.

Death penalty opponents received a boost when Gov. Martin O'Malley, a Democrat and Catholic, said he would sign a repeal if it reaches his desk.

"It helps give the legislation a head of steam we can build on," said Richard J. Dowling, executive director of the Maryland Catholic Conference.

Mr. Dowling said he is actively lobbying members of all faiths and remains optimistic that the repeal will move this year.

Mrs. McComas, a ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee that must vet the proposal, has spoken with Mr. Dowling about the death penalty, but said she remains steadfast in her support of capital punishment.

"To take that option off the table really tips the balance in favor of some very terrible people," she said.

Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrat and lead sponsor of the repeal legislation, said the issue is a "very high priority."

"We are working with every member to get the votes necessary to pass the [legislation]," he said.

While there might be enough support to move the repeal through the House, Senate Republicans said they have enough votes to kill the proposal in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Of the 11 members on the Senate committee, six support the death penalty.

If the repeal passes, a pair of Catholic delegates said they will push to have a referendum vote to reinstate the death penalty.

Delegate Patrick L. McDonough, Baltimore County Republican and a Catholic, said he will work with Delegate Richard K. Impallaria, Baltimore County Republican and a Catholic, to reinstate the death penalty if it is repealed.

CIVIL LAW:

Backlog Of Healthcare Fraud Cases Tops 150 (FWST/COX)

By Julia Malone, Cox News Service

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - Federal prosecutors admitted having a backlog of more than 150 cases in which pharmaceutical companies are accused of defrauding federal and state healthcare programs, a Justice Department lawyer acknowledged to a congressional panel Friday.

Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, said his department has recovered $5.3 billion since 1999 from major drug manufacturers in a variety of kickback schemes and overcharges that defrauded Medicaid and Medicare.

But when asked by House Committee on Oversight Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., why the government doesn't move faster on these cases to recoup even more taxpayer money, Tenpas said his office is short on lawyers and investigators.

"These are very complex cases," he said, adding that his office has not added new positions, despite estimates that the prescription drug fraud cases produce $15 in payments and penalties for every $1 spent on prosecution.

Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of a Medicaid task force for the Texas attorney general's office, said at the congressional hearing that his team of lawyers had more than paid its way by recovering $64.1 million from just four manufacturers that had overcharged the state and federal government for prescription drugs.

O'Connell, in an interview later, estimated that his office has collected more than $100 million from drug companies since his anti-fraud office was set up in 1999. Expenses for his task force, recently expanded to 10 lawyers, have added up to $5 million to $7 million, he said.

O'Connell said he has pursued claims against doctors, dentists and hospitals.

But whistle-blowers with inside knowledge about prescription drug companies have given them the biggest cases by far, he said.

He recalled that one company had billed the government $21.40 for an inhaler that investigators later discovered had a real cost of $2.

James W. Moorman, president of the watchdog group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said, "Texas has by far the most successful Medicaid anti-fraud program" of the states.

However, Moorman said the federal government's effort has been "overwhelmed" by the fraud cases.

Waxman repeatedly raised concerns about the new prescription drug benefit, known as "Part D" for Medicare recipients.

The new program "is going to cost $1 trillion over 10 years -- $50 billion over this next year," Waxman said. "That program's got to be as ripe for fraud as any other."

Tenpas said officials at the Justice Department are "clearly concerned there could be fraud in that program" but added that after only one year of operation and not enough data "we don't have many conclusions yet."

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America issued a statement defending the industry.

Federal health programs that provide prescription drugs provide a "critical safety net for low-income patients, seniors and the disabled," the trade group said.

GAO Warns Of Medicare Drug Overcharging (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON --Federal law makers should consider doing more to ensure the government is not overcharged for prescription drugs, according to a government watch dog.

A director for the Government Accountability Office told members of Congress Friday that the Medicare drug benefit program is vulnerable to false billing schemes because it relies on private companies to report drug prices. Under the program, about 42 million eligible senior citizens can choose between thousands of prescription drug plans offered by health insurers that individually negotiate drug prices with manufacturers.

GAO's health care director John Dicken said the Medicare drug program's "complex set of relationships and transactions with private entities" makes it difficult to verify the accuracy of drug prices charged to the government. Dicken told members of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform that Medicare needs to have systems in place to spot inflated price reporting.

In 2006, plans offered by UnitedHealth Group and Humana had the highest enrollment numbers although the GAO report did not single out any companies or providers by names. Representatives from Humana and UnitedHealth were not able to provide immediate comment for this story.

The hearing comes nearly one month after Democrats in the House pushed through legislation that would require the government to negotiate Medicare drug prices directly with drug manufacturers. The bill is pending in the Senate but President Bush has promised to veto it, saying the current system is already reducing prices for seniors.

Last year one drug maker agreed to settle charges brought by state and federal prosecutors that it allegedly inflated prices of its products.

Last August, GlaxoSmithKline paid $41 million to settle claims by more than 40 state Medicaid programs. Several months earlier, the Justice Department opened a suit against Abbott Laboratories, alleging the company's billing schemes cost government health programs more than $175 million over 10 years. The case is currently pending in U.S. District Court of Massachusetts.

House Chairman Vows Probe Of Drugmaker `Profiteering' (BLOOM)

By Aliza Marcus

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Henry Waxman pledged Congress will investigate a range of allegations that drugmakers are ``profiteering" by overcharging federal health programs.

``If even half of them are true, billions of federal dollars that should be buying needed care are instead adding to drug company profits," Waxman, Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said at a hearing today on alleged fraud and abuse in drug pricing.

Democrats promised more aggressive oversight of government practices when they took control of Congress in January, and the hearing was an initial effort to apply such scrutiny to health- care costs.

The session at times turned into a debate over the Medicare drug plan for the elderly, which was designed three years ago when Republicans controlled Congress.

``Can you think of any other system that could be designed more expensive than the one designed by the Republicans?" Waxman of California said. He announced he has sent letters to health insurers and drug benefit managers demanding information about the prices they negotiated with drugmakers and how savings are being passed on to seniors enrolled in Medicare drug plans.

Republican Response

``I have to wonder if the goal is to harass" the companies, said Tom Davis of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. Davis said he took the faster and easier route of asking the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, which collects the information. ``Let's see who gets their answer first."

The House passed a bill in January that would require the federal government to negotiate with drugmakers for lower prices for Medicare. President George W. Bush has said he would veto the legislation if it passed the Senate in its current form.

Prices of medicines covered by the Medicare program, now in its second year, appear higher than those available at Costco warehouse stores or at Drugstore.com, Waxman said.

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which represents drugmakers, said growth in spending on prescription medicine was at its lowest level in years.

``Many studies have also found that medicines help lower health-care costs because they help keep patients out of the hospital and help them avoid expensive emergency rooms visits," Ken Johnson, senior vice president, said in a statement.

$5.3 Billion Recovered

The Justice Department has recovered more than $5.3 billion related to pharmaceutical fraud in federal and state programs since 1999, Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, told the committee.

``It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs," Tenpas said in a statement submitted to the committee.

Witnesses at the hearing described a complicated system of drug pricing that made it easier for companies to commit fraud.

``Government agencies don't actually know what they are paying for drugs, said Gerard F. Anderson, director of the Center for Hospital Finance and Management at the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health in Baltimore.

To protect against waste and fraud, prices should be compared among federal programs to find the best deals, Anderson said. The Department of Veterans Affairs, which negotiates for the drugs it provides, pays less than Medicare plans, he said.

Medicaid Allegations

Waxman cited allegations that the federal Medicaid program, which covers about 50 million low-income Americans and spent about $30 billion on drugs in 2005, has been ``repeatedly overcharged for essential medications."

The price of drugs concerns many Americans, polls have shown.

``This entire issue of health-care policy, and particularly prescription drugs and drug prices, has been in Democrats' craw for at least six years," Dennis W. Johnson, a professor of political management at George Washington University in Washington, said in a telephone interview yesterday. ``Now that they are in the majority, this is something they are going to go after."

Sailor, Family File $150M Claim Against Navy (NAVT)

By Chris Amos, Staff writer

Navy Times, February 10, 2007

ET3 says malpractice at Jacksonville hospital caused baby's brain damage

A Navy family has filed a claim against the Navy for $150 million, alleging that malpractice by Naval Hospital Jacksonville doctors and staff caused their newborn son to suffer severe brain damage that has left him unable to walk, talk or see.

DOJ_NMG_0130882

Sean Cronin, a civilian lawyer representing Electronics Technician 3rd Class Joseph Alcorn and his wife, Kendra, said injuries to their son Gavin, the second child born during a twin pregnancy, were caused when he did not receive enough oxygen during delivery in May 2005.

Cronin said hospital records show that Gavin's limbs were blue and that he was not breathing when he was delivered about an hour after his sister.

Gavin's sister had unrelated complications during delivery but has since recovered.

Shortly after delivery, Gavin was transferred to a civilian hospital in Jacksonville, where doctors used an MRI to determine that he suffered brain damage during delivery, Cronin said.

Capt. Raquel Bono, commanding officer of Naval Hospital Jacksonville, said Navy doctors identified Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy as high risk before delivery and took steps, including having extra doctors present during delivery, to prevent complications. She said close attention was paid to the fetal heart rate and to the mother's uterine contractions.

"We monitor this very closely, and it allows us to respond very quickly if the fetus is in distress," she said.

All multiple-birth deliveries are considered high risk, Bono said, adding that other factors, such as the mother's nutritional status, history of smoking, and alcohol or prescription drug use, also can lead to elevated risk levels.

"The prenatal period is very important and delicate time. There are a whole myriad of causes that determine whether a child develops cerebral palsy," she said, adding that only 5 percent of cerebral palsy cases are linked to delivery and that a much larger number — at least 60 percent — begin well before delivery.

But the specific type of cerebral palsy suffered by Gavin, Cronin said, is linked directly to oxygen deprivation during delivery. He added that cerebral palsy developed before delivery would damage large parts of the brain, instead of localized damage that Gavin suffered.

Bono would not say which, if any, prenatal risk factors other than a multiple delivery were present during Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy, but she defended the actions of doctors and staff at the hospital, which she said delivers about 120 babies each month and conforms to national standards set by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

"In a high-risk industry such as health care, everything can be done according to standards, and unanticipated outcomes can still happen," she said.

But Cronin said the hospital was attempting to shift blame onto Kendra Alcorn by discussing complications caused by smoking and prescription medicines. While he admitted that Kendra Alcorn smoked, he said there was no evidence linking smoking to the type of brain damage that Gavin suffered.

"There is no evidence that this is a congenital defect," he said. "All evidence indicates that this was caused by asphyxiation. I am extremely disappointed that the hospital is attempting to blame the victim. This is an attempt to smear the family and not be accountable for their own actions."

The Navy has six months to respond to the Alcorn's claim. It can pay the full amount, offer a reduced settlement or pay nothing.

After the six-month period, if the family is not satisfied with the Navy's response, they can file a lawsuit in U.S. District Court.

At that point, Justice Department lawyers would take over the lawsuit's defense.

Naval Hospital Jacksonville has been at the center of several malpractice claims since 2000. As reported by the Navy Times, medical malpractice at the hospital has left at least 12 patients dead and another four disabled or crippled, according to federal court papers.

A recent case involves a $15 million lawsuit filed against the Navy after doctors failed to diagnose bacterial meningitis in a 3-month-old boy in June 2006.

That boy, Justin Michael Shantz, later died.

Bono defended the hospital's record.

"I have every confidence that quality health care is being provided," she said, adding that the national standard for malpractice lawsuits in a year is 2.4 per 100 physicians. Naval Hospital Jacksonville has 1.3 per 100 physicians, she said. While acknowledging that 13 percent of the hospital's patients cannot sue because they are on active duty, she said that even when those numbers were accounted for, the hospital still beats national averages.

DOJ_NMG_0130883

Naval hospital doctors also exceed the national rate for being board qualified, she said.

Cronin, a retired Navy commander and former P-3 pilot who says his child was born at Naval Hospital Jacksonville, did not dispute that.

“I have no doubt that they are able to provide quality of care,” he said. “I just think they had some failures of quality of care in this case.”

Expert Cites Controller Fatigue In Crash That Killed Radio Star (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2007

An aviation consultant testified Friday that an air-traffic controller's fatigue was a contributing factor in the midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others seven years ago.

At a federal trial stemming from lawsuits over the crash, Farrell Smith, a former Federal Aviation Administration official, said records showed that controller Gregory Fowler worked more than seven hours that day without taking a break.

In the hour before the collision, Fowler had been involved in 416 transmissions with pilots, one every 8.65 seconds, Smith said.

"He's vulnerable to fatigue, mental and physical," Smith said of Fowler, whom lawyers for the three victims' families blamed for the collision. "It's critical safety-wise to give them a break, so they're sharp and aware."

Collins had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P flown by student pilot Sharon Hock as the two aircraft approached Waukegan Regional Airport near the lakefront. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, while Hock died when her plane plummeted onto a Zion street.

On Friday Paul Pieri, a former flight instructor who witnessed the crash, testified that he had been surprised when Collins' plane passed in front of his shortly before the collision. If Collins had accurately reported his position, Pieri said, "He should have already been past me on final approach" to the airfield.

Justice Department lawyers, representing the FAA at the trial, contend that Collins caused the collision.

William Sullivan Lawrence, an expert pilot who rose to colonel in 26 years in the Marine Corps, testified that neither Collins nor Hock had been negligent.

"I think he did the same thing that 99.9 percent of general-aviation pilots would have done," Lawrence said of Collins. He also credited Hock with doing "a fine job."

Lawrence, who did a test run to try to re-create what the two pilots encountered that day, said they were flying west into the sun under hazy conditions, "the worst of all situations."

Contributing to the accident was that Collins was flying a low-wing plane with poor visibility below him as he descended into the rear of Hock's high-wing plane, Lawrence said.

Man Pleads Guilty In Austin Immigrant Brothel Case (AAS)

By Steven Kreytak, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin (TX) American-Statesman, February 10, 2007

Austin site was part of 13-city prostitution network.

A man who federal authorities say managed brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City in an elaborate multistate immigrant smuggling and prostitution ring pleaded guilty in federal court Friday.

The ring included brothels in 13 cities, including ones across Texas, as far west as Las Vegas and as far east as New York City and Atlanta, according to documents filed with Juan Balderas-Orosco's plea. The operators snuck hundreds of women into the country from Mexico as well as Central and South American countries, and forced them to have sex with as many as 40 men — mostly undocumented immigrants — a day, the documents said.

Their bosses, who moved the women among the brothels in the interstate network, kept all or part of the women's earnings, the documents said.

"The prostitutes reported they were not free to leave the brothels on their own, and the brothel operators were usually armed with firearms," one court document said.

Balderas, 34, faces 10 years in prison at a later sentencing on each of three crimes: transportation for prostitution, conspiracy to smuggle, transport and harbor illegal aliens, and importation of aliens.

Balderas' lawyer, Kristin Etter, declined to talk about the case, other than to say it is a symptom of a broken immigration system.

With limited legal channels for immigrants to the U.S., some immigrants "are pushed into this underground economy and forced into these kinds of jobs," she said outside court.

Balderas, who was the manager of brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City, is the lead defendant in an indictment filed last year in U.S. District Court in Austin charging 12 people in the case with various smuggling and prostitution crimes.

Six people pleaded guilty in the case earlier this week and another defendant, Mohammad Arami, pleaded guilty with Balderas before U.S. Magistrate Judge Robert Pitman on Friday.

Three defendants are fugitives in the case, including one woman accused of running the operation: Cecilia Maria Roberson, aka "Lila." Information about that woman's nationality and possible whereabouts were not included in court documents.

Another woman whom co-defendants and some of the prostitutes identified as a boss of the operation, Maria Camacho-Teran, was arrested in December, and her case is pending. She earned substantial income from the operation, is a citizen of Venezuela and is married to a U.S. citizen, a judge wrote in court documents.

Arami pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit money laundering. He owned a house at 9807 FM 969 that federal agents raided last summer. Court documents say that Arami knew that the rent on that house was paid with proceeds of the illegal operation.

Both men said little more than "yes" at the sentencing hearing. They were responding to a standard list of questions Pitman asked regarding whether they understood the ramifications of their pleas.

Federal Prosecutor Opposes Dismissal Of Charges In 1964 Killings Of 2 Black Men In Miss. (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

AP, February 10, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Kidnapping remains a capital crime under federal law and there is no statute of limitations that would justify dismissing charges against a reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men, say federal prosecutors.

James Ford Seale, 71, has pleaded not guilty to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail.

Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate has not ruled on the dismissal motion.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed this week, said Seale's defense was misreading the law. He said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law.

"The limitations period depends upon the capital nature of the crime, and not on whether the death penalty is in fact available for a defendant in a particular case. Because the defendant is charged with offenses deemed by Congress to be capital in nature, he may be prosecuted for those offenses without limitation," Lampton said in the government's response.

Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense.

Joiner said the 1968 decision gave trial courts no option but to treat as non-capital cases in which the death penalty provision of a statute has been removed. Therefore, the five-year non-capital statute of limitations must apply.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI - consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer - turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000.

Feinstein Joins Clamor Over Jailed Border Agents (SFC)

By Carolyn Lochhead, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2007

2 officers convicted in 2005 shooting of alleged smuggler

Washington -- Sen. Dianne Feinstein intervened Friday in the cases of two Border Patrol agents who are imprisoned for shooting an alleged Mexican drug smuggler and who have become a cause celebre for anti-illegal immigration GOP politicians, conservative media and activists.

The California Democrat, who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote letters to three top administration officials -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin -- asking for specific information about their agencies' involvement in the case.

Feinstein is the first prominent Democrat to become involved in the case of the border agents, and her office said she has secured the agreement of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to conduct a committee investigation. She said Leahy is open to a hearing on the matter.

Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos were convicted last March and sentenced Oct. 9 for the 2005 shooting of an alleged drug smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who had driven a van loaded with 743 pounds of marijuana from Mexico to Texas. The agents shot Aldrete-Davila as he tried to flee back across the border with Mexico, then hid evidence of the shooting and failed to report it, according to the evidence presented at their trial. Compean received a 12-year federal prison sentence, and Ramos 11 years and one month.

Last Saturday, Ramos was injured in a fight with five other inmates at the federal prison in Yazoo City, Miss. Prison authorities said he sustained minor bruises and abrasions.

President Bush has so far refused to pardon the agents, though he has said he would "look at all the facts" and urged others to do the same in a Fox News interview Jan. 31.

"I get asked about pardons in a lot of different cases, and there's a procedure in place," Bush said in the interview. "And what I've told members of Congress who have written me, our call was, just look at the case. Look at the facts in the case. And people need to understand why these folks were sent to trial and why a jury of their peers convicted them."

The case -- and Bush's response -- has enraged conservative Republican House members. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Huntington Beach (Orange County), invited Ramos' wife to the State of the Union address. This week, he warned there would be calls for Bush's impeachment if either of the agents dies in prison.

Feinstein spokesman Scott Gerber said Feinstein called for an investigation because "she believes there are serious questions." He said she also asked her California state director in San Francisco, Jim Molinari, a former U.S. marshal, to look into the case informally and advise her.

"This was a case of two agents who were pursuing a suspect who turned out to be involved in drug trafficking, and it raises questions about the length of their sentence and how they're being treated in prison," Gerber said. "Certainly, the Department of Justice can conduct investigations, but at the same time the senator thinks there are significant issues that need to be resolved, and the Judiciary Committee is the appropriate venue to look at these questions."

Feinstein told Gonzales in her letter that she strongly believes the agents' sentences are too extreme, given that the victim resisted arrest and was smuggling large quantities of drugs. Further, she wrote, the agents had to her knowledge no prior convictions or aggravating circumstances to warrant such long terms.

The U.S. attorney who prosecuted the case, Johnny Sutton, has maintained that Congress determined the penalty, setting a mandatory minimum 10-year sentence for discharging a firearm during a crime of violence.

Feinstein said she found it even more disturbing that Ramos was beaten in prison. "It is not hard to predict that two federal agents would be targeted in a prison population and that special precautions should have been employed to ensure their safety," Feinstein wrote.

Ramos and the five inmates who assaulted him have been segregated from the general prison population, according to Bureau of Prisons spokesperson Traci Billingsley. She said that the assailants will face disciplinary proceedings and that the bureau will "take all necessary measures to ensure his ongoing safety."

The Justice Department has posted on its Web site a four-page document defending its prosecution by Sutton, the U.S. attorney in the Western District of Texas. It is titled "Myth vs. Reality: The Facts of Why the Government Prosecuted agents Compean and Ramos" at www.usdoj.gov/usao/txw.

Congressman Campaigns To Help Imprisoned Ex-border Agent (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

YAZOO CITY — U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado met today with Ignacio Ramos at the prison where the former U.S. Border Patrol agent was attacked by other inmates.

Tancredo said he offered encouragement and campaigned to get Ramos a change of cells.

Ramos is serving time at Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex for shooting a drug smuggling suspect in Texas and then lying about it.

“I gave him as much positive information as I could,” Tancredo said after leaving the prison in Yazoo City, Miss., about 40 miles northeast of Jackson. “And it is our hope we can get him moved to another part of the facility that is safe for him but not in a segregated environment ... 23 hours a day in a cell, which he has now.”

A Republican presidential candidate and opponent of illegal immigration, Tancredo has said the Bush administration failed to protect Ramos and has demanded that the agents receive a full presidential pardon.

The congressman said he was allowed to see the prison area where Ramos was beaten and had “observed bruises and abrasions on his body.”

Tancredo, the founder and former chairman of the House Immigration Reform caucus, said Ramos had one bruise that “starts at the top of a shoulder and goes all the way to the elbow. It is very deep, a purplish, red, very deep bruise.”

Before traveling to the prison that houses low- and medium-security inmates, the congressman said the Ramos family “has had to endure too much already for something as diminutive as a failure to report an incident. Sure it deserves punishment, but not one worse than some murderers.”

Tancredo said after today’s meeting he believed prison officials would move Ramos from isolation to better, but still safe, quarters elsewhere in the facility.

“I talked with the warden ... at great length and she was very accommodating,” he said. “She said she would in fact request a new placement for him.”

Tancredo said he understood a meeting would be held next Wednesday to consider the request.

Public information officials at the Yazoo City facility referred all questions to the Federal Bureau of Prisons in Washington, which did not release any new information about a possible Ramos transfer.

Tancredo said he told Ramos that there had been vigils and other demonstrations of support for the agents and that "a lot of people were praying for him."

Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed the beating of Ramos, whose conviction along with that of fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean drew sharp criticism from some who said the agents were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals.

A federal report was released Wednesday on the shootings, and Senate Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., agreed to allow Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, to hold a hearing on the case.

An Associated Press photographer from Jackson, at the prison Friday to take pictures of Tancredo, was told by a security officer that he had to surrender the digital disk in his camera before he would be allowed to leave the facility. Later, the photographer was allowed to leave with the digital images — scenes of the exterior of the prison.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last year of shooting Osvaldo Aldrete Davila in 2005 at a rural area near El Paso, Texas, and then trying to cover up the incident. Davila was shot once in the buttocks.

In a statement issued Wednesday afternoon, Rep. John Culberson, D-Texas, said Ramos and Compean "may not have followed proper procedure following the shooting, which at most should have resulted in their suspensions from the force, but not criminal procedure."

Ramos and Compean, who reported to prison in January, were each sentenced in October to more than a decade behind bars. Compean is serving his sentence at the Elkton Federal Correctional Institution, a low-security prison in Ohio. There have been no reports of problems with his detention.

Monica Ramos, the agent's wife, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that he called her on his 38th birthday and said: "They got me. They got me good."

Monica Ramos said her husband described being attacked late Saturday, when he "let his guard down" and went to his bed. The attackers, she said, kicked and stomped him for several minutes before running away.

Ignacio Ramos was able to identify one man in the group and is now pursuing criminal charges, Monica Ramos said.

ANTITRUST:

Cousins Get 2 Years In Concrete Scheme (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, February 10, 2007

Prison term nearly twice that of plea-bargaining ringleaders

Two men convicted in November of involvement in an Indianapolis-area concrete price-fixing conspiracy will spend nearly twice as long in prison as ringleaders who cooperated and pleaded guilty.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney on Friday sentenced Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., to 27 months in prison for violating antitrust law and lying to the FBI.

The prison terms will be followed by two years of supervised release. Both men were ordered to pay $5,000 fines.

The conspiracy's ringleaders, who testified against the Beaver cousins in November, were sentenced to 14 months in prison.

The Beavers acknowledged attending several secret meetings called to set prices, but they still deny participating in the scheme. Both men agreed, however, they had lied to investigators.

"It's something I'm not proud of," said Chris Beaver, 42. "I was scared they would handcuff me in front of my children."

But, he added, "We did not do any price-fixing."

Ricky Beaver, 43, also denied price-fixing, saying: "I only went to two meetings. I didn't agree to anything."

McKinney was unmoved, saying the jury had spoken, and he agreed the Beavers were active participants.

The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials, the largest fine ever paid by a participant in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy.

The Beavers' defense attorney, Jeffrey A. Lockwood, called the cousins' involvement in the conspiracy "minuscule." But prosecutors asserted the company sold $50 million worth of ready-mix concrete at potentially inflated prices during the conspiracy.

Ready-mix concrete is made on demand and hauled to work sites in mixer trucks for public and private projects, such as sidewalks, driveways, bridges and roads.

The Beavers' sentencing came hours after McKinney sentenced John J. Blatzheim, 52, executive vice president of Fishers-based Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., to nine months in prison and a year of probation, and fined him $5,000.

A charge of lying to the FBI was dropped in exchange for Blatzheim's guilty plea.

"I've disappointed a lot of people," Blatzheim said in court Friday.

He acknowledged attending meetings to fix prices and "policing the agreement."

Friday's hearings closed out the price-fixing cases pending against individual defendants.

In all, nine current or former officials of four area companies have been sentenced to prison in the scheme to overcharge concrete customers from July 2000 through May 25, 2004, when a series of early-morning FBI raids broke up the conspiracy.

"We're pleased the defendants received significant sentences that reflect the seriousness of the crimes," said Scott D. Hammond, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division.

Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing.

Lear Agrees To Buyout Offer Of $2.8 Billion From Icahn (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

DETROIT, Feb. 9 — One of the biggest shareholders of the Lear Corporation, a manufacturer of automotive seats, criticized the company's deal on Friday to sell itself for $2.8 billion to the investor Carl C. Icahn.

The shareholder, Richard S. Pzena, who owns 11 percent of Lear through his firm, Pzena Investment Management, said he believed that the price was too low and that Lear did not need outside help to turn around its business.

Another shareholder, Evercore Asset, which calls itself a relatively small shareholder of Lear, said Friday that it was going to vote against Mr. Icahn's bid. Evercore said the offer price of $36 a share does not reflect the value of Lear.

The deal — the latest in a wave of major investments in the troubled auto parts industry — is worth $5.3 billion, including $2.5 billion in debt that will be assumed by American Real Estate Partners, the investment firm controlled by Mr. Icahn. Mr. Icahn already owns nearly 16 percent of Lear's 76.3 million outstanding shares, which would be valued at $36 each.

That is $3.39 less than the closing price for Lear's stock on Friday; shares fell 1.7 percent after the deal was announced.

Lear, based in Southfield, Mich., expects the deal to close by the end of the second quarter. But the company said it would also consider any other offers submitted within 45 days.

Mr. Pzena sent a letter critical of the proposed buyout to Lear's independent directors this week.

Mr. Pzena said in an interview on Friday that Lear is in the middle of a turnaround. He believes that Lear shares could be worth $60 each within a few years, which would make his stake in the company worth $201 million more than it is valued under Mr. Icahn's offer.

"I don't understand why they felt like they had to sell the company at all," Mr. Pzena said. "I hope that the shareholders send a message to the board that they can't be doing these kinds of things."

In a statement, the chairman and chief executive of Lear, Robert E. Rossiter, said shareholders should be pleased with the buyout terms.

"Following a very thorough review of the proposed transaction, our board unanimously concluded that the A.R.E.P. offer was in the best interests of Lear's shareholders," Mr. Rossiter said.

"We believe that the transaction price, which represents a multiple of about nine times our forecasted 2007 core operating earnings — excluding the interior business — provides shareholders with significant value."

Lear, which lost more than $2 billion in the last two years, agreed in the fall to sell its automotive interiors division to another billionaire investor specializing in struggling companies, Wilbur L. Ross.

An analyst with Lehman Brothers in New York, Brian A. Johnson, said he expected the buyout of Lear to be supported by most shareholders, particularly those who paid less than $30 a share for their interest in the company.

(Mr. Icahn bought nearly 8.7 million Lear shares in November for $23 each, regulatory filings show.)

Lear Holders Call For New Bids (WSJ)

By Terry Kosdrosky

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Management Backs Offer From Icahn; A Fair Valuation?

Lear Corp.'s support of a takeover offer by billionaire investor Carl Icahn has raised questions about whether the auto-parts supplier's board has worked hard enough to get the best deal for shareholders.

Management's welcoming response to the offer also sparked shareholder calls for the company to seek competing bids.

The auto-parts supplier said on Friday its management supported Mr. Icahn's $36-a-share offer, adding that its board voted unanimously in favor of it, even though Lear stock has been trading at about the offer price.

The deal involving Mr. Icahn's American Real Estate Partners L.P., and valued at about $5.3 billion, is the latest move to grab a bigger stake in the auto-parts sector. Companies like Lear have struggled with lower production from U.S. auto makers, high raw-materials costs and pricing pressures. But deep-pocketed investors have been drawn to the sector because of the low valuations of many ailing companies and the belief some will recover.

At least three major shareholders believe Lear shares have the potential to appreciate well beyond the Icahn offer price and said they will vote against the bid. Richard Pzena, whose investment firm owns 10% of Lear, said he plans to push the board to solicit offers from other potential buyers. Mr. Pzena also said he is concerned Lear's management is backing the deal at least in part because it includes raises and other financial rewards.

Chairman and Chief Executive Bob Rossiter would give up the CEO title but would see his base salary increase to $1.15 million in the first two years. In 2005, Mr. Rossiter earned $1.1 million in base salary and no bonus, according to the company's proxy statement. His base salary would be $700,000 in the third year, when he is to become nonexecutive chairman, according to new employment agreements filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his first year, he gets a guaranteed bonus of no less than $1.72 million.

President and Chief Operating Officer Douglas G. DelGrosso would be named chief executive, succeeding Mr. Rossiter, and would have his salary increased to $1.15 million initially and would receive an annual bonus of at least $1.43 million. In 2005, the last period Lear's compensation figures were disclosed, Mr. DelGrosso was paid $705,834 in base salary and no bonus.

Mr. Rossiter said a buyout would leave the company in a stronger position to cut costs and expand in Asia. He said the deal, which requires approval from a majority of holders of Lear common stock, "provides shareholders with significant value."

Lear makes auto seats, interior parts and electronics.

Shares in the Southfield, Mich., company were down 1.7% to $39.39 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Friday. The stock reached a 52-week intraday high of $41.14 this week, after Mr. Icahn's proposal was announced on Monday.

Mr. Icahn already owns a 16% stake in Lear. Mr. Icahn's $5.3 billion offer values Lear at $2.75 billion. He would pay about $2.31 billion in cash to buy the shares he doesn't already own and assume $2.5 billion in debt.

If Lear accepts a superior bid, Lear could have to pay a termination fee of more than $85 million, plus as much as $15 million in expenses, according to a filing made with the SEC.

The company said it will solicit other offers over the next 45 days. Wall Street analysts, however, said Friday it is unlikely any other offers will materialize.

Like Mr. Pzena's firm, Pzena Investment Management LLC, Braun, von Wyss & Müller, the Zurich-based investment adviser for Classic Fund Management Aktiengesellschaft, said they would oppose the deal. They each said Lear's value is closer to $60 a share. Brandes Investment Partners LP, which owns a 3.9% stake in Lear, also said it would vote against the deal, arguing the price is far below Lear's long-term fair value.

One smaller shareholder, however, said he supports the deal. Robert Chapman, managing member of Los Angeles-based Chapman Capital LLC, said $36 is a good price, noting that Lear was trading at about $28 a month ago.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.'s J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. served as financial adviser, and Winston & Strawn LLP as legal counsel to a special committee of Lear's board. Bank of America Corp. provided Mr. Icahn's affiliate with debt-financing commitments.

U.S. Inquiry On Bonds At Big Bank (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

Bank of America said yesterday that it was cooperating with a Justice Department investigation into bidding practices in the municipal bond business in exchange for leniency.

The agreement with the bank may be a significant breakthrough for government investigators who have been looking at how the proceeds of bonds issued by cities, school districts and other municipal authorities are invested between the time the money is raised and when it is spent on projects like new water systems and school gymnasiums.

Investigators are examining whether there was collusion among some financial institutions in bidding to handle the bond revenue during those interim periods.

Last November, the Justice Department issued subpoenas and raided the offices of several firms that served as go-betweens for municipalities and large financial institutions.

The investigation is the biggest in municipal finance since the 1990s, when the Securities and Exchange Commission accused some Wall Street firms of “yield burning” — or profiting by overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings. The current investigation is unusual because it appears to involve possible criminal charges.

Bank of America said the Justice Department had agreed not to bring criminal charges against the bank because it was the first institution to volunteer information before the subpoenas were issued. Furthermore, the agreement limits the civil penalties that prosecutors can pursue against the bank to actual damages, rather than the treble damages it can pursue against others.

The deal, which the bank said would not be available to other financial institutions, is contingent on continued cooperation by Bank of America.

“If a company has participated in industrywide practices, its cooperation can prove invaluable,” said Kathleen F. Brickey, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis who specializes in white-collar crime. as prosecutors investigate other companies. “This will be unwelcome news for others” in the industry.

In a separate settlement with the Internal Revenue Service, Bank of America said yesterday that it would pay $14.7 million to the federal government for its role in the use of contracts that provided guaranteed investment returns on proceeds from bond pools issued by multiple municipalities. The I.R.S. has been examining whether such pools are being used to generate profits from tax-free municipal bonds.

"They are related only in that the two are happening at the same time and involve the municipal arena," said Shirley Norton, a Bank of America spokeswoman.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department confirmed that it had reached an agreement with Bank of America but would not answer questions about the deal. A spokesman for the I.R.S. declined to comment.

Municipal bonds are a big business for Wall Street — about $385 billion of bonds were issued last year, according to the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association. The bonds provide a steady source of fees and are a relatively safe, and tax-free, investment.

In recent years, several government agencies, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, have focused on how the proceeds of the bonds are handled in the months or years before they are spent. Because the money is tax-free, municipalities cannot generate a higher return on the money by investing it than what it costs to raise the money. If they do earn more, the balance is due to the United States Treasury.

To get around those limits, consultants to municipalities and major financial institutions like Bank of America have used guaranteed investment contracts that limit the return cities and other agencies can earn from their bond proceeds.

Investigators are looking into whether some financial institutions have colluded when bidding for those contracts, which are structured in a way that appeared to satisfy the I.R.S. rules but in reality provide excessive fees or returns to banks and advisers involved in the transactions.

"Municipal bond proceeds are supposed to be spent for tangible purposes, not to earn interest in arbitrage," said Charles Anderson, a retired I.R.S. field inspector who now has a private consulting practice. "You want a transparent and above- board process of people getting investment contracts."

In November, Bloomberg News reported that federal agents raided and seized documents from the offices of three brokers that specialized in municipal finance and Justice Department lawyers subpoenaed documents from two insurance companies and General Electric.

Shares of Bank of America slipped 33 cents, to $52.99.

Bank Of America To Cooperate With Justice Department (AP)

By IEVA M. AUGSTUMS, AP Business Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Bank of America Corp. said Friday it has entered into a "leniency agreement" with the Department of Justice related to an investigation into the municipal derivatives industry.

The Charlotte-based bank said the agreement will keep the department from bringing any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in the matter in return for its continuing cooperation.

The bank said it was receiving the special treatment because it went to the department with information about bidding practices in the bond industry before the government began its investigation last year.

Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to a number of Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports.

Tax-exempt municipal bonds are sold to fund state and local projects, including sewer systems, bridges and stadiums.

Bank of America spokesman Shirley Norton declined comment, citing the bank's of not commenting "on ongoing investigations."

The bank will continue to fully cooperate with the investigations being conducted by the Justice Department, the SEC, and the Internal Revenue Service, Norton said.

Separately, the bank agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS over the bank's role in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements related to "blind pool" bond transactions. Guaranteed investment contracts are issued by insurers and offer guaranteed rates of return for specified periods. Many retirement plans include them.

Bank of America did not admit to any liability under the Internal Revenue Code, it said in a statement.

Cooperation Gives BofA Leniency In Inquiry, Bank Says (CO)

By Rick Rothacker

The Charlotte Observer, February 10, 2007

Bank of America Corp. said Friday that it won't face criminal prosecution for anti-trust matters in the U.S. Justice Department's ongoing investigation of bidding practices in the municipal bond industry.

The Charlotte bank said it reached a leniency agreement with the agency, in return for its continuing cooperation. The announcement shed new light on the bank's role in a wide-ranging probe that became public late last year.

Under the Justice Department's leniency program, amnesty is available to a company that first reports information to the agency before the government has started its own investigation, the bank said.

Separately, Bank of America said it had agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS related to certain bond transactions. Under the agreement, the bank said it did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code.

State and local governments issue municipal bonds to raise money for projects ranging from schools to transportation systems to housing projects. In return, investors receive tax breaks on the interest they receive from the bonds.

In 2006, investment banks raised about $379 billion through municipal bond issues, the second best year on record, according to Thomson Financial. Bank of America was the ninth-biggest underwriter.

The industry faced scrutiny in the 1990s over the marking up of bond prices and now faces renewed examination. Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports.

At the time, the Justice Department said it was looking at "anti-competitive practices." The reports also said the IRS was examining whether consultants and underwriters were evading taxes in certain transactions.

An inquiry into the municipal bond business is "long overdue," said Mark Schwartz, a former investment banker who is now a critic of the industry.

"It's a club," said Schwartz, a Philadelphia-area attorney. "There's a lot of trading going on: `I'll give this, if you put us in that deal.' "

One of the areas under scrutiny is so-called "blind pool" transactions in which underwriters issue bonds for unspecified projects, he said. The incentive for the investment banks is lucrative fees produced by the deals.

The IRS gets concerned because investors are getting a tax break for buying bonds for projects that may not come to fruition, he said. "The treasury doesn't want to be subsidizing deals that aren't needed," Schwartz said.

In addition, the underwriters, with no specific municipal project on deck, will often re-invest the proceeds from blind-pool bond issues. This can raise questions about whether these investments, arranged under so-called "guaranteed investment contracts," were properly bid out.

Bank of America said the IRS settlement related to its role "in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements in connection with certain blind-pool bond transactions." Bank spokeswoman Shirley Norton said she could not comment further because the investigation is ongoing.

The bank said it continues to cooperate with investigations by the Justice Department, the SEC and the IRS. A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Bank of America is cooperating in its probe of "anti-competitive practices in the municipal derivatives industry."

Industrywide Municipal Bond Investigation

• What happened? The U.S. Justice Department has given Bank of America immunity from criminal anti-trust prosecution under an amnesty agreement. The bank also reached a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS.

Bank Of America To Cooperate In Muni Bid-Rig Probe (Update4) (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Bank of America Corp., the second- largest U.S. bank, said the Justice Department agreed not to press antitrust charges against the bank in exchange for its assistance with a criminal probe of the municipal bond market.

The bank also agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the Internal Revenue Service in connection with its role in providing investment contacts to some state and local governments, the bank said in a statement.

Bank of America is the first to announce an agreement with the U.S. government in connection with an antitrust probe of bid-rigging of investment contracts that are sold to states and municipalities. The settlement may help speed the pace of the probe, which has roiled an almost 200-year-old market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding.

``It's a positive step when you see settlements because it does tend to expedite the process," said Carol Lew, the president of the National Association of Bond Lawyers and a public finance attorney at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Roth in Newport Beach, California.

Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, wasn't immediately available for comment. Shirley Norton, a spokeswoman for Bank of America, declined to comment. Nancy Mathis, an IRS spokeswoman, declined to comment.

`Roadmap'

The agreement came after Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America gave information to investigators before they initiated the probe, the bank said in its statement. The bank said offers of amnesty are available from the Justice Department to the first who reports behavior that is later investigated.

``If you're the first one in the door, you get credit for that from the government, said John Fahy, a former U.S. prosecutor now in private practice in Rutherford, New Jersey. ``You are educating the prosecutors. You are giving them a roadmap as to how particular fraud occurred."

Bank of America shares fell 33 cents to $52.99 at 4:16 p.m. in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

More than a dozen banks, insurers and brokers have been subpoenaed in the investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department's probe follows the IRS in looking into whether there were conspiracies to rig the bidding for so-called guaranteed investment contracts, where local governments invest money raised at bond sales until it is needed to pay for schools and other projects.

Yield-Burning

Local governments are required to rebate to the IRS much of the earnings they reap by reinvesting funds raised from tax-exempt bond sales. The IRS is concerned that unfair bidding on investment contracts may have deprived the federal government of money, much like the so-called yield burning scandals of the 1990s, when Wall Street banks overcharged municipal borrowers for Treasury bond investments.

The Justice Department has declined to comment on the probe, saying only that it was investigating anti-competitive practices in the industry. Subpoenas issued in the investigation sought information on several financial products, including derivatives.

``We have little public information about the scope and magnitude of the investigation," Lew said. ``That type of climate can hurt the entire municipal bond industry."

Blind Pools

Bank of America, second only to Citigroup Inc. as the biggest bank by stock market value, said the settlement with the IRS stems from its sale of investment contracts and other products to agencies that sold bonds for so-called blind pools, sums of money that were to be made available to local government borrowers for projects like low-income housing and schools. In some cases, such transactions did nothing for the public while generating millions in fees for the banks and advisers that put them together, according to an Oct. 4 article by Bloomberg News.

Five days before companies disclosed receiving subpoenas from the Justice Department in connection with its probe, George K. Baum & Co., a Kansas City, Missouri-based investment bank, said it settled allegations with the IRS that it illegally diverted profits on municipal bond deals. That settlement covered more than $2 billion of so-called blind-pool deals between 1997 and 2001.

Bank of America provided the guaranteed investment contract on at least one of the Baum transactions targeted by the IRS, a $100 million issue sold in 2000 by Rural Enterprises of Oklahoma Inc., bond documents show. Rural Enterprise of Oklahoma Inc. disclosed in July 2003 that a ``significant," hidden payment was made to Baum by the provider of the investment agreement.

Atlanta Deal

Questions about bid rigging were also raised in connection with a $453 million guaranteed investment contract that Bank of America won from the city of Atlanta. That bidding for that agreement was handled by CDR Financial Products Inc., a Beverly Hills, California adviser to local governments that was raided in November in connection with the Justice Department probe.

The IRS in 2005 told Atlanta officials that the city may have overpaid for a $453 million guaranteed investment contract from Bank of America Corp. The IRS asked whether banks arranged to submit ``courtesy losing bids" at an auction held to win the city's investment business, according to a Feb. 5 2005 letter obtained by Bloomberg News.

CDR has previously defended its work in response to the investigation. A spokesman for the firm, Allan Ripp, declined to comment today on Bank of America's agreement.

Bank of America in 2002 fired the employee in its municipal derivatives department who handled the Atlanta contract after he told his manager that he paid a total of $182,393 to CDR, another broker, and two rival banks on transactions in which they played no role, according to records from the NASD and North Carolina's state court in Mecklenburg County, as reported in a Bloomberg article on Oct. 4.

The payments to CDR were described as a bid to build its relationship with the broker, according to an e-mail contained in court records.

Bank Of America Faces Probe On Muni Bonds (MRKTWTCH)

By Steve Gelsi

Market Watch, February 10, 2007

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Bank of America late Friday disclosed it's participating in a government probe into illegal activity surrounding proceeds from municipal bonds and how the money is invested prior to spending on public projects such as schools and bridges.

Separately, the Bank of America (BAC) has agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS relating to its role in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements in connection with certain "blind pool" bond transactions.

The pact by the nation's second-largest bank with the U.S. Justice Department could mark a breakthrough as the government investigates practices in the multi-billion dollar municipal bond industry.

Bank of America said it's inked a leniency agreement in connection with the department's investigation into bidding practices in the municipal derivatives sector.

"This amnesty grant was a result of the company voluntarily providing information to the Department before the Department began its investigation, as well as the company's continuing cooperation," Bank of America said.

In return for the company's cooperation, the Justice Department will not bring any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in connection with matters that the company reported to the Justice Department, Bank of America said.

The company said it's cooperated and continues to fully cooperate with the industry-wide investigations being conducted by the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Internal Revenue Service.

Under the agreement, Bank of America did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code.

The investigation marks the largest in municipal finance since about 15 years ago, when the SEC Wall Street institutions of overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings.

FirstGroup To Buy U.S.'s Laidlaw For $3.6 Billion (Update11) (BLOOM)

By Tracy Alloway

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Britain's FirstGroup Plc agreed to buy Laidlaw International Inc., owner of the largest U.S. school-bus company and the Greyhound bus service, for $3.6 billion to triple revenue in North America.

Laidlaw investors will receive $35.25 in cash for each share, Aberdeen, Scotland-based FirstGroup, the U.K.'s biggest train operator, said today in a statement. That's 11 percent more than the closing price of $31.72 yesterday.

FirstGroup will merge its Ryder U.S. student buses division, acquired in 1999, with Laidlaw's fleet to give it a 13 percent share of the North American school bus market. Laidlaw's Greyhound Lines Inc. unit, the largest inter-city bus company, is ``a less obvious strategic fit'' and will be reviewed, FirstGroup said.

``Being able to combine the two companies will create cost benefits that will flow through relatively quickly,'' said Gert Zonneveld, an analyst at Panmure Gordon in London with a ``buy'' recommendation on the stock. It ``also effectively removes one major competitor from the market, which makes a lot of strategic sense.''

Shares of FirstGroup rose 34.5 pence, or 6.2 percent, to 595.5 pence in London. The stock has risen 45 percent in the past year, boosting the company's market value to 2.3 billion pounds ($4.48 billion). Laidlaw shares rose $2.86, or 9 percent, to $34.58 at 4:04 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

Laidlaw, founded in 1924, filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after almost 20 years of expansion. It bought hundreds of small school bus operators during the 1990s, culminating with the acquisition of Greyhound in 1998.

Greyhound now accounts for 40 percent of Laidlaw's sales. Its school transportation division makes up about 50 percent of the Naperville, Illinois-based company's revenue.

``What's new in this transaction is the Greyhound business,'' said Chief Executive Officer Moir Lockhead in a meeting with analysts today in London. ``We'll do the strategic review and then we'll take it from there.'' He said he did not know how long the review would take to complete.

Greyhound, which serves some 2,200 destinations, is the result of 93 years of expansion and acquisition. Founded in 1914, the company diversified in the 1970s and owned stakes in everything from Dial Corp. deodorant to a meat-packing business.

``You would hope they're more committed to keeping 100 percent of what they've bought,'' said Alistair Gunn, an analyst at Arbuthnot Securities in London with a ``neutral'' rating on the stock. ``It wouldn't surprise me if they did retain Greyhound and if they don't they'll get a good price for it.''

U.S. Business

Most of FirstGroup's U.S. business consists of contracts to operate and manage bus services on behalf of local authorities. The market for management of public buses is estimated by FirstGroup to be worth $15 billion, of which only $2 billion is outsourced to private companies.

``FirstGroup is familiar with the school bus and transit markets in which Laidlaw operates and has followed Laidlaw in an acquisition context for over two years,'' it said in the statement.

The enlarged group will employ more than 71,000 workers in the U.S., FirstGroup said, and operate about 63,000 school buses. The acquisition will generate about $70 million in savings a year, according to the company.

`A New Focus'

``This gives us a new focus,'' said Lockhead. Half of the FirstGroup's sales will now come from the U.S., Finance Director Dean Finch estimated at the meeting. Just under a third of revenue currently comes from North America.

In the U.K. FirstGroup runs one out of every five local bus services and carries some 2.8 million passengers a day. Its Scottish train service handles 95 percent of passenger train services in Scotland, according to its Web site.

``There are likely to be some competition issues,'' said Zonneveld. ``That's one thing that needs to be addressed,'' he said. The deal is subject to a U.S. antitrust review, FirstGroup said.

Gina Talamona, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman, said it hasn't been determined whether her agency's antitrust division or the Federal Trade Commission will review the deal.

The acquisition will be financed through debt facilities of $3.75 billion and the issue of 375 pounds worth of new shares, including 200 million pounds worth of new shares placed today.

The price is 8.4 times FirstGroup's 2006 operating profit. Its last major acquisition in the U.S., that of Ryder Public Transportation Services, was 6.6 times 1998 operating profit.

Credit-Default Swaps

DOJ_NMG_0130896

Credit-default swaps-based on 10 million euros of FirstGroup debt rose 11,000 euros to 71,000 euros, according to CMA Datavision. Credit-default swaps are based on corporate bonds and are used to speculate on a company's ability to repay debt. An increase indicates a reduction in credit quality.

Fitch Ratings said today it may lower FirstGroup's credit ratings, following the announcement that had it agreed to buy Laidlaw. The ratings firm ranks the company's debt BBB+, its eighth-highest investment grade ranking. Standard & Poor's grades the debt one level lower at BBB, and it put FirstGroup on a ``watch negative," indicating it may lower its rating.

FirstGroup has 550 million pounds of bonds outstanding, according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The extra yield, or spread, that investors demand to hold FirstGroup's 300 million pounds of 6.875 percent bonds due April 2013, compared with government bonds of a similar maturity, widened 1 basis point to 89 basis points today. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point.

New EPA Rules For Gasoline Limit Benzene, A Carcinogen (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Environmental Protection Agency issued rules yesterday that will dramatically cut toxic fumes from cars and trucks over the next 25 years.

The regulations, which will reduce the amount of cancer-causing benzene in gasoline and set tighter emission standards for autos in cold temperatures and for fuel containers, will help reduce toxic emissions from passenger cars by 80 percent from 1999 levels by 2030.

"Americans love their cars," EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a statement. "By clearing the air from tons of fuel and exhaust pollution, President Bush and EPA are paving the road toward healthier drivers and a cleaner environment."

Among air pollutants, benzene -- which naturally occurs in crude oil and is increased through refining to boost gasoline's octane rating -- poses the second-biggest cancer risk to Americans, after diesel emissions. In 2004 it constituted 1 percent of U.S. gas on average; under the new rule benzene levels will drop to an average of 0.62 percent.

The EPA will allow oil refineries to trade pollution credits among themselves as long as the industry as a whole stays below the limit, but the agency imposed an absolute cap of 1.3 percent benzene in any given product. The rule also sets tougher emission standards for cars operating at temperatures of 20 degrees Fahrenheit or below, as well as for fuel evaporation from tanks, fuel lines and gas cans.

Environmentalists, who had successfully sued EPA for failing to issue a benzene ruling by 2004, hailed yesterday's move but questioned the decision to allow refineries to trade emission credits.

"We're happy that EPA has addressed this important public health issue at last, even if it did take a federal court case to make the agency act," said Marti Sinclair, a volunteer for the advocacy group Sierra Club. "But it is disappointing that EPA would undermine its own program by adopting this dangerous trading scheme."

But Frank O'Donnell, who heads the advocacy group Clean Air Watch, said the new regulation would help improve air quality nationwide: "Benzene levels everywhere are going to drop."

In an interview, William Wehrum, acting assistant administrator for EPA's air and radiation office, said the agency is protecting Americans' health by capping benzene levels. EPA estimates that the rule, which will take effect in 2011 for gasoline, will cost $400 million to implement in 2030 and produce $6 billion in health benefits.

"We want to achieve good environmental outcomes in the cheapest way possible," he said. "We do expect some minor variations from place to place."

Charles T. Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, which represents oil refineries, said facilities in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific Northwest "are going to have to do a lot more than we anticipated" to meet the new standards.

"What's the impact on supply and cost, that's my concern," said Drevna, who added that his members are already having to change their processes to meet low-sulfur diesel standards and other federal rules. "This is, as Pink Floyd would say, another brick in the wall."

Some environmentalists are still pushing to eliminate two other air toxics that improve gasoline performance, toluene and xylene, as well as to clean up diesel fuel. "This is a missed opportunity to clean up the air and save lives," said Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition.

But Wehrum said the administration had tried to produce a practical and effective rule. "The single most important thing we can do to reduce the risks associated with toxic emissions is to focus on benzene," he said.

E.P.A. Limits The Benzene In Gasoline By 2011 (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The Environmental Protection Agency is requiring significant reductions in the amount of cancer-causing benzene and other toxic hydrocarbon gases in gasoline and released into the air during storage and use, under a rule released Friday.

The final rule, issued under a court-ordered deadline set after environmental groups filed suit about two years ago, provides more uniform reductions around the country than the agency had originally proposed.

It was greeted with praise from environmental groups usually critical of the Bush administration in this area and with considerably less enthusiasm by the organization representing the country's 149 refineries.

The rule puts a ceiling on the total benzene content of any gasoline produced after 2011.

The rule limits opportunities for those refineries that are not meeting the benzene limit to meet their obligation by buying credits from other refineries whose gasoline more than meets the standard.

"Benzene content in gasoline is going to go significantly down everywhere in the country," said William Wehrum, the agency's acting assistant administrator of air and radiation programs. "Are there going to be variations from place to place? Yes."

The original proposal would have given refineries more leeway to average the benzene content across their entire gasoline supply. That would have left some regions, particularly parts of the Pacific Northwest and the Rocky Mountain States, with benzene levels well above the levels permissible elsewhere, because their gasoline has historically contained more benzene. Objections by Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, played a role in the agency's decision instead to limit the trading program, Mr. Wehrum said.

In addition to the new benzene limits for gasoline, the new rule also orders cuts for benzene levels in tailpipe emissions and pungent benzene vapors escaping from gasoline cans.

The new standard will cut 19,643 tons of benzene from gasoline when the controls on refiners take effect in four years. In addition, several other rules currently in force will have the side effect of cutting benzene from all of these sources, reducing benzene from its 1999 level of 250,000 tons, the most recent figure available.

The agency estimated that the new rule, called the Mobile Source Air Toxics rule, would result in 33,000 tons of reductions by 2015. Those reductions, combined with the additional reductions that were side benefits of other rules, would cut the benzene levels down to 108,000 tons.

"Cars and trucks put out a whole toxic soup of pollutants," Emily Figdor of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, one of the two groups that sued the agency, said in an interview. "The administration is going after one of them. Benzene poses a whole host of health risks. It's a good thing that they strengthened the standard."

But Charles Drevna, the executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, said the agency had "thrown a curve" by insisting on a ceiling on the amount of benzene in any refinery's gasoline, which limits the refinery's ability to use allowances.

"Certain areas are going to have a much more difficult time," Mr. Drevna said, including those refineries in the Pacific Northwest and the Rocky Mountains.

California's current standard for benzene is already below the new national standard, so that state's 13 refineries are not affected. Highly industrialized areas like the Northeast and the Chicago area are already required to produce what is known as reformulated gasoline, and so their benzene levels have been reduced somewhat in recent years, though not as much as they will be under the new rule.

Mr. Drevna said that a spate of new rules, including a rule making steep cuts in the sulfur content of diesel fuel and a separate rule reducing the sulfur content of gasoline, have put a burden on refiners.

Mr. Wehrum, of the federal agency, said the trading program was designed "to allow the flexibility for industry to find the most cost-effective place to spend."

For Mr. Drevna, it was not flexible enough.

For Marti Sinclair of the Sierra Club, which was also a plaintiff in the lawsuit, it was too much.

"We are happy that E.P.A. has addressed this important public health issue at last," Ms. Sinclair said in a statement, adding, "It is disappointing that E.P.A. would undermine its own program by adopting this dangerous trading scheme."

Frankenfood? (WP)

EVER SINCE the Food and Drug Administration officially vouched for the safety of food derived from cloned animals last month, Americans have given themselves a long and unnecessary national stomachache. Citing concerns over everything from safety to ethics, many of them told pollsters that they are apprehensive about milk and meat from clones entering supermarkets. Members of Congress are preparing to push legislation requiring food from clones and their progeny to be labeled as such. And, The Post's Rick Weiss reported recently, a new controversy is brewing over whether food providers can label products from the offspring of cloned animals as "organic," even if ranchers follow federal criteria for such labels.

All of which is to say that there is a lot of misunderstanding about the issue of cloning livestock for food production. One of the most common -- and commonly exploited -- misconceptions is that once the meat and milk industries begin selling food from clones and their offspring, animal products from clones will flood supermarkets. In fact, cloning animals is very expensive; ranchers would not clone an animal only to slaughter it. Instead, ranchers will clone animals with desirable traits, such as leaner meat, and breed the resulting genetic copies with other animals, bettering herds over the course of generations.

The process is almost identical to time-tested methods of animal husbandry, and it is very similar to modern crop breeding. The result for consumers is consistently better meat and other animal products from the progeny of clones, which experts agree are safe to eat, not from clones themselves, which are also safe but which contain subtle genetic differences from parent animals that anti-cloning activists exploit to stoke public outcry. High-quality animal products will probably also become more abundant and, therefore, cheaper.

As the debate over cloned food intensifies -- expect a battle involving the cloning industry, anti-cloning advocates, the FDA and Congress this year -- it is important for the public not to overestimate the differences between cloning livestock for the purpose of breeding and what American ranchers and breeders already do to better their flocks and herds. The facts are less threatening than many Americans realize.

U.S., Latin American Authorities Pledge United Front Against Gangs (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

An international summit on transnational gangs wrapped up in Universal City on Friday with an agreement between U.S. and Latin American law enforcement leaders to begin crafting four initiatives, including one to improve intelligence sharing on criminals who move back and forth over borders.

Three other proposals to be discussed when the officials meet again in April in El Salvador include:

• Creating an international prevention campaign using sports celebrities and singers to urge kids to stay out of gangs.

• Developing an exchange program in which U.S. mid- and high-level law enforcement officials would be embedded in Central American and Mexican agencies and Latin American officials would spend time in the U.S.

• Creating a "Top 20" fugitive program that would identify the worst of the worst transnational gang members so border guards could be on the lookout for them in all of the countries.

"We have arrested people here who were deported five times, so we want to put some of them on the list so we look harder at the border for the worst of the worst," said Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal section of the FBI's Los Angeles office.

More than 100 federal agents, police chiefs and prosecutors from the U.S. and law enforcement officials from Belize, Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, Canada and El Salvador attended the three-day summit at the Universal City Hilton to discuss the problems that occur when hardened gang criminals enter the U.S. illegally and then are deported back to Latin America.

"There was agreement that we need to vary our way of sharing information with special operating mechanisms not only on the law enforcement side but also on the prevention piece," said Rodrigo Avila-Aviles, director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police.

Officials from Interpol and the U.S. National Gang Intelligence Center provided expertise at the summit on ways to develop databases that can share information on gangs throughout the region.

Augusto Del Pino, deputy attorney general from the Mexican state of Chiapas, said the conference was important because it opened lines of communication and created relationships that can assist all of the nations.

"To me this was a very important summit because we were able to gather information, exchange it, and make a review of the system and judicial and police operations," Del Pino said.

The group also discussed ways to alert Mexican authorities when a gang member in the U.S. adopts an alias that he then tries to use upon returning to Mexico.

"We will be able to identify the people we have caught and we have in prison [when] they change names and pretend to be somebody else," Del Pino said.

Also aiding the effort was the announcement this week by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the federal government would accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, which will help track gang members.

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton said they planned to travel to El Salvador in April to continue talks on ways to cooperate with their Central American counterparts.

"Many of the gangs that start here — from 18th Street to MS to the Crips and the Bloods — started here in Los Angeles, went across the country, and in the case of the first two have gone to Mexico, Latin America and beyond," Villaraigosa said. "So we are coordinating our efforts."

FBI Laud$ Anti-drug Work By City Police (PHDN)

By Christine Olley

Philadelphia Daily News, February 10, 2007

The Philadelphia division of the FBI gave the Philadelphia Police Department a pat on the back yesterday for its work in trying to cripple the city's lucrative drug trade.

Special Agent in Charge J.P. Weis lauded the efforts of Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson, Deputy Commissioner Richard Ross and leaders of the Narcotics Bureau, and presented them with a commemorative plaque and a check for approximately $2 million, which represented a portion of the money they had seized jointly during the 2005-06 fiscal year.

He said of the relationship between the two agencies, "It illustrates the camaraderie between these two units that transcends mere cooperation."

Last year, Weis said, drug seizures and monetary forfeitures in the city totaled close to $3 million.

DOJ_NMG_0130900

Just this week, police stopped a tractor-trailer with a Texas license plate on Aramingo Avenue in Port Richmond and found 100 kilos of cocaine with an estimated street value of $10 million.

Forfeitures as large as Monday's are what Weis describes as a powerful tool against drug acitivity.

"Forfeitures are a way to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity," he said.

"Why should the subjects still have access to the proceeds of their illegal activities?" he asked.

Husband Of Former FBI Tech Admits To Conspiracy Over 'ice' (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, February 10, 2007

The spouse of a former FBI technician has admitted to conspiring with others to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams, or 1.1 pounds, of methamphetamine.

Eric "Babu" Moniz, 35, of Waialua pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court to the charge, punishable by a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison.

Moniz was one of 23 individuals indicted by a federal grand jury in April after an internal FBI investigation. The FBI began surveillance of employee Charmaine Moniz, wife of Eric Moniz, and her activities at work. They discovered she had been accessing a confidential database and reviewing documents relating to her husband's longtime friend Damien Kalei Hina, an alleged drug dealer in Waialua, as well as Jonathan Kimo Luna and Jess Lundgren.

Charmaine Moniz pleaded guilty earlier in federal court to accessing the FBI's database to obtain information about active investigations involving her husband's associates and warning her husband to stay away from them. She is awaiting sentencing.

Three police officers, including Bryson Apo, who also pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy, were among the people indicted in April.

In a plea agreement filed in court yesterday, Eric Moniz admitted that from 2002 until 2004, he agreed to hold "pound quantities" of methamphetamine for Hina.

He also admitted that during the same period he occasionally received lesser quantities of methamphetamine that he distributed to others, and also held onto Hina's drug proceeds.

In exchange for Moniz's plea and his willingness to cooperate and testify against others if asked, the government is expected to dismiss a drug possession charge against him that is contained in a second indictment, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni.

Moniz will be sentenced Aug. 6.

Spouse Of FBI Former Technician Pleads Guilty (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

HONOLULU (AP) _ The spouse of a former FBI technician pleaded guilty Friday to conspiring with others with the intent to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine.

Eric ``Babu" Moniz of Waialua, Hawaii, admitted to the charges in U-S District Court.

Moniz faces a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison when sentenced August 6th.

The F-B-I's investigation of Eric's wife, Charmaine Moniz, led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people.

The F-B-I had said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004.

In a plea agreement filed in court yesterday, Eric Moniz admitted that from 2002 until 2004, he agreed to hold ``pound quantities" of methamphetamine for an alleged drug dealer.

Police Officer Pleads Guilty In Gambling Scheme (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, February 10, 2007

A second Honolulu police officer has pleaded guilty in a scheme to protect an illegal cockfight and gambling operation in Waialua.

Bryson Apo, 31, admitted yesterday that he provided the operators information about when police would raid the illegal activities and also acknowledged that he would bet on the cockfights "from time to time" during the 2004 to 2005 cockfighting season.

"I did provide inside information to the gambling operation in Waialua," he told U.S. District Judge Susan Oki Mollway.

Apo, an eight-year veteran of the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiring to obstruct the enforcement of criminal laws, a charge that carries a prison term of up to five years. But federal advisory sentencing guidelines call for a lesser prison term.

Apo remains free on bond and is scheduled to be sentenced by Mollway on May 29.

Police officer Glenn Miram pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge last year and is scheduled to be sentenced this year.

The two are among three Honolulu officers charged last year in connection with the cockfight, card game and dice operation across the street from Waialua Elementary School. The charges were the result of a massive FBI wiretap operation into gambling, drug and other illegal activities.

Kevin Brunn, the third officer, is awaiting trial.

Others charged as a result of the FBI probe are officers Barry Tong, charged with illegal possession of a firearm, and John Cambra IV, who was charged with trying to prevent the FBI from recovering cockfight gaffs. They are awaiting trial.

Also charged in an extortion case were former Aloha Stadium security chief Herbert Naone and former Honolulu Liquor Commission inspector James Rodenhurst. Both pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing.

About 30 others also were charged with offenses ranging from gambling to drug violations.

Apo yesterday admitted to the case against him as outlined by Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni. The prosecutor told the judge that Apo conspired with Miram and the operators of the cockfight and gambling enterprise to help protect the activities by telling them when police would raid the place.

Apo admitted that on one occasion, in January 2005, he told one of the leaders to shut down the Waialua cockfights because he got the information "straight from the horse's mouth."

On another occasion, in December 2004, he learned that the gambling detail "would hit Wai'anae tomorrow" so the Waialua cockfights could be held without "law enforcement intervention," Apo acknowledged.

Apo declined to comment after the hearing.

Officer Warned Cockfighters (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, February 10, 2007

Apo pleads guilty to telling gamblers on the North Shore of likely police raids

A Honolulu police officer has admitted he warned operators of cockfighting and gambling operations in Waialua of impending law enforcement raids.

Bryson Apo, 31, pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court to conspiring with more than five others, including members of a large landowning family in Waialua and two other police officers, to obstruct the enforcement of state laws prohibiting illegal gambling, specifically cockfighting, craps and card games.

"As a police officer, I provided inside information to gambling organizations in Waialua," Apo said yesterday during questioning by U.S. District Judge Susan Mollway.

"I was not supposed to give out the information," he said, but did so to assist the activities and despite knowing that they were illegal.

Apo, a member of the Windward Crime Reduction Unit who is currently on paid administrative leave, was charged in an indictment along with co-defendants, Officers Kevin Brunn and Glenn Miram. The indictment stemmed from a two-year federal investigation that began in 2003 into illegal gambling and cockfighting in the rural North Shore town.

The illegal businesses flourished mainly on private property across from Waialua Elementary School on Waialua Beach Road that is owned by the family of co-defendant Charles Gilman.

According to a plea agreement, Apo admitted to receiving or obtaining "on a regular basis" between November 2004 and March 2005 information about when the gambling detail was going to raid the Waialua cockfights.

He provided the tips to operators of the cockfights and co-defendants Gilman, John Saguibo, Douglas Gilman Sr., Douglas Gilman Jr., Micha Terragna and William Gilman.

The information, which included dates of impending raids on Waialua and Waianae operations, was obtained from one or more gambling detail officers whom Apo did not identify.

Those officers knew, however, that Apo was going to provide it to the operators of the cockfights, which operated continuously for more than 30 days and had gross revenues of $2,000 in any single day, according to the plea agreement.

Had the case gone to trial, prosecutors would have presented evidence of telephone conversations obtained from wiretaps federal agents placed on the phone lines of Apo, Saguibo and Charles Gilman, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni.

Calls between Saguibo and co-defendant Terragna were also intercepted in which they discussed payment to Terragna and her husband, Officer Kevin Brunn, a 21-year police veteran, Nakakuni said.

Apo and his attorney, First Assistant Federal Defender Alexander Silvert, declined to comment further on the case.

Apo, the second officer to plead guilty in this case, faces a maximum of five years in federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine when sentenced May 29. He remains free while awaiting sentencing under bail conditions imposed earlier by the court.

Miram, who resigned last year after seven years on the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiracy in December. He will be sentenced April 2.

Colombia Receives Drug Suspect Sought By U.S. And Jailed In Cuba (NYT)

By James C. McKinley, Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 9 — The leader of a Colombian drug cartel that American prosecutors say flooded New York City streets with cocaine remained in custody in Colombia on Friday awaiting extradition, after Cuba turned him over to the authorities there.

Cuba's decision to send the suspect, Luis Hernando Gómez Bustamante, to Colombia surprised American authorities, law enforcement officials said. Cuba's government has no diplomatic relations with the United States, and some people charged with crimes on American soil have found a haven in Havana.

Not Mr. Gómez Bustamante. He arrived in Bogotá late Thursday on a Colombian Air Force plane after Cuban authorities handed him over to Colombian antinarcotics agents.

Mr. Gómez Bustamante, the reputed boss of the Norte del Valle cartel who is known as Rasguño, had been held in Cuba since 2004, when he was arrested on immigration charges. He is wanted in New York City on charges of money laundering, racketeering and drug smuggling.

During the 1990s, his organization was one of the most violent, lucrative and extensive cocaine-smuggling rings in the world, accounting for at least 30 percent of the cocaine being imported into the United States, Justice Department officials said.

Cuban officials gave no reason for their decision Thursday, and prosecutors in the United States declined to comment on the matter.

Last year, Mr. Gómez Bustamante told a Colombian reporter that he wanted to be released from his Cuban prison, even if it meant standing trial in the United States. Mario Iguarán, Colombia's attorney general, suggested that the extradition stemmed from the prisoner's wishes. A spokesman for the Justice Department confirmed that the United States was seeking to bring Mr. Gómez Bustamante to the United States for trial.

His extradition would be a major victory for federal investigators and prosecutors in New York City, who built a case against him over a decade. Investigators started out looking into businesses in Queens that wired money to Colombia.

Those modest inquiries eventually led to the indictment of Juan Alberto Monsalve, who prosecutors charge was the cartel's boss in New York. In May 2002, he pleaded guilty to drug trafficking and murder. He is now serving a life term.

Two years later, Mr. Gómez Bustamante was indicted on racketeering charges along with eight others, and Colombian authorities seized $100 million worth of Mr. Bustamante's assets. He fled to Cuba but never got past customs and immigration.

Investigators Hired By New York City For Out-of-state Gun Stings Could Be Breaking The Law (AP)

By Samantha Gross, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Private investigators hired by the city to conduct sting operations on out-of-state gun shops could be breaking the law, and the dealers they caught making illegal sales will not be prosecuted, federal officials said.

City officials have sued more than two dozen dealers after hiring investigators to pose as buyers attempting straw purchases, in which one person fills out the paperwork for the gun but is buying for someone else. The scam is often used by convicted felons and others barred from owning firearms.

The city argues that the shops - in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - are responsible for many of the illegal weapons that end up in New York, and the suits have led seven dealers to agree to more scrutiny.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced in May it was reviewing whether the city acted legally.

"Potential legal liabilities" arise when civilians do the work of law enforcers, Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said Thursday. The department has decided charges are not warranted against dealers in the sting cases, he said.

It was unclear whether the private investigators could face charges.

After the Justice Department decided not to base criminal prosecutions on the stings, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said that "the preferred solution" is getting legal agreements with the shops to monitor their sales practices but that the city also plans to retain its right to continue the operations.

Some of the gun sellers have asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuits, saying the city is out of bounds because the dealers are not doing business in New York.

Gun rights advocates have criticized the sting operations, and the Second Amendment Foundation issued a statement Thursday calling the Department of Justice's findings a "significant victory."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Gives Tour Of Family Detention Center That Critics Liken To A Prison (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

TAYLOR, Tex., Feb. 9 — Responding to complaints about conditions at the nation's main family detention center for illegal immigrants, officials threw open the gates on Friday for a first news media tour.

They portrayed the privately run converted prison, open since May, as a model facility "primarily focused on the safety of the children."

Once all the barbed wire comes down, Gary Mead, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement official, said, "it's going to look more like a community college with a very high chain-link fence."

Among other things, critics have complained about the prisonlike conditions, the food and the limited amount of schooling and recreation provided for children.

Inside the fluorescent-lighted corridors, plastic plants had been hurriedly installed and some areas repainted, lawyers for some detainees said, and officials acknowledged that pizza was on the lunch menu for the first time. The detainees could not be interviewed.

The facility, the T. Don Hutto Family Detention Center, is operated for the government by the Corrections Corporation of America, under a $2.8-million-a-month contract with Williamson County. It is named for a founder of the company, which runs 64 facilities in 19 states.

It now holds about 400 illegal immigrants, including 170 children, in family groups from nearly 30 countries, Mr. Mead said. He called it a humane alternative to splitting up families while insuring their presence at legal proceedings.

DOJ_NMG_0130904

There is only one other family detention center in the country, the smaller Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, a former nursing home, in Leesport, Pa.

Critics said the picture presented on Friday conflicted with what they had observed.

"At Hutto, we found prisonlike conditions imposed on families with no criminal background, including asylum seekers," said Michelle Brané, a lawyer for the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children and the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service who co-authored a report on family detention to be released on Feb. 22.

Barbara Hines, clinical professor of law at the University of Texas at Austin who runs an immigration clinic and has visited clients inside, said Friday that "I don't think children should be incarcerated at all."

The law required the government to hold families in the least restrictive conditions possible, Ms. Hines said, adding, "I was shocked, and I have been doing this 30 years."

The American Civil Liberties Union has also been studying conditions as it considers filing a lawsuit contending that the government was violating a 1997 settlement on the treatment of detained juveniles.

"To call it a family residential center is to mask what's going on," said Vanita Gupta, a lawyer with the A.C.L.U. "They may be cleaning up conditions, but at the end of the day it still begs the question of why they are using such a Draconian system ."

Another A.C.L.U. lawyer, Lisa Graybill, legal director, said after visiting, "I can't describe how depressed people are in there."

Outside the blocky buildings with thin slit windows, protesters from a local group called Texans United for Families held up signs saying, "Don't Jail Children for Profit."

"If they can put an ankle bracelet on Martha Stewart so she doesn't run off to Jamaica," said a protester, Jose Ortan, a computer technician, "they can find ways to do it for immigrant families."

Some of the harshest criticism of the center came last week from members of a Palestinian family held there for three months for overstaying a visa. They were released after an immigration appeals board unexpectedly reopened their plea for amnesty based on new conditions — danger from the Hamas takeover in the Palestinian territories.

Hamzeh Ibrahim, 15, said his father was sent to a facility in West Texas while his pregnant mother shared a cell-like room with the family's 5-year-old girl; two other girls, 7 and 13, shared another room. He said they had to clean their rooms and the communal shower. "I cleaned for me and my mom because she is pregnant and her back hurt," he said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials who traveled from Washington to lead the tour with company staff members showed off one of the 11 dormitory areas, or pods, lined by bare pastel-tinted detainee rooms, each with a metal bunk bed, a sink and a toilet.

The rooms are not locked at night, but a laser beam alerts guards if anyone leaves a room after bedtime — 9 p.m. for children and 10 for adults. The detainees wear outfits of green and blue, which Danny Coronado, a spokesman for the corrections company, likened to scrubs but critics described as prison garb.

Officials say stays at the center are now averaging a little more than a month.

In the dining area, which has plastic tables with stools attached, Mr. Mead said, "All of our meals are planned by dietitians with calories of 3,200 a day, 3,500 for children."

Disputing claims by some lawyers that many detainees had lost weight there, Dr. Leroy T. Soto, the chief physician on duty, said a study had actually documented weight gains. There is a medical staff of 20.

Lawyers said detainees were rushed through meals in 15 or 20 minutes. Mr. Mead acknowledged "they can't linger," but said it was because of classes or other activities.

Showing off a classroom with computers, Jean Bellinger, assistant administrator for programs, said children were divided into three age groups comparable to elementary, middle and high school for four hours' a day of instruction plus an hour's recreation and lunch. But she acknowledged that for several months a staff shortage limited class time to an hour a day.

That was far too little, said Scott Medlock, a prison rights lawyer for the Texas Civil Rights Project.

Media Gets Look At Immigrant Center (DMN)

By Paul Meyer

The Dallas Morning News, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130905

TAYLOR – It looks like a maximum-security daycare. Razor wire, strung high atop security fences, surrounds a "Backyard Adventures" swing set. Fake trees soften entrances to sunless cellblocks. And Sony PlayStations entertain immigrant children where Texas criminals once served hard time.

Depending on whom you ask, this former jail turned immigration detention facility is either a national human rights blight or the newest and most humane way to keep track of families facing deportation.

On Friday, amid mounting criticism, federal officials offered the media a first look inside Central Texas' T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, one of two detention centers in the country for immigrant families, mostly mothers and children.

The center, just northeast of Austin, has been home to three North Texas Palestinian families in recent months, including members of the Ibrahim family, whose controversial detention sparked a new round of criticism last week.

The federal government opened Hutto in May, responding to complaints about the government's "catch-and-release" policy that allowed illegal immigrants to remain free until their hearings. In many cases, they would skip the hearings and go unapprehended.

But human rights observers and civil rights advocates have condemned the decision to keep children in Hutto, citing abuses that include inadequate education, weight loss and psychological trauma. The government, they say, has a responsibility to find less-restrictive environments when the incarceration of minors is necessary.

The government denies the abuses.

"I think the criticisms are unfounded and based on limited anecdotal information," said Gary Mead, assistant director for the detention and removal operations of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Mr. Mead, who led Friday's carefully choreographed tour, painted a picture of a place far removed from a penal environment – a place where children receive five hours of academic education daily, use a computer lab, play in a gymnasium and receive attentive medical care.

The 512-bed Hutto center, run for the government by the privately owned Corrections Corp. of America, houses mostly Latin American families from countries other than Mexico.

AP / Department of Homeland Security Family detainees walk down the hall at the T. Don Hutto Residential Center in a photo provided by the Department of Homeland Security.

Others suggested that Friday's tour was nothing more than a staged charade, held after days of prettying up the former prison to make it seem less harsh.

"The Hutto facility in particular is still very much of a prison setting," said Michelle Brané of the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, a national advocacy group.

"It's a former prison, and it still looks like a prison. We don't believe that a prisonlike facility is appropriate for housing families."

Ms. Brané is co-author of a study, set for release on Feb. 22, critical of the government's new family detention practices and the Hutto facility specifically. She has visited Hutto and the nation's other family detention center, a former nursing home in Pennsylvania.

Barbara Hines, a University of Texas at Austin law professor and director of the law school's immigration clinic, confirmed this week that the clinic is exploring legal action to stop the detention of children in Hutto, in conjunction with the American Civil Liberties Union.

But on Friday, workers inside Hutto defended their attempts to provide a safe and humane environment, replete with certified teachers who work with nine classrooms of students from as far away as El Salvador, Iraq and Somalia.

"They care ... and they've been hurt by the press," said Jean Bellinger, assistant administrator of programs for CCA.

Irving resident Nazmieh Juma Hazahza said there is only one way to describe her experience at the Hutto facility where she lived with her 11-year-old son, Mohammad: like being in hell.

"A prison is a prison, no matter what. ... For me it was very hard, being there day after day, each day worse than the next one," said Mrs. Hazahza, who was released from the detention center Wednesday evening, after spending more than three months in custody.

DOJ_NMG_0130906

The Hazahzas are one of three Dallas-area Palestinian families recently detained inside Hutto. While one family has been deported to Jordan, the Hazahzas and the Ibrahims have been released.

AP Fake plants are among the items recently added to the facility.

Salaheddin Ibrahim, who was being held apart from his family at a facility near Abilene, was released Friday, a day after an immigration judge set his bail at $30,000, said his brother, Ahmad. Mr. Ibrahim's wife and fourchildren, ages 5 to 15, were released Feb. 3 from Hutto, where they had been held since their arrest Nov. 2.

"It's just ridiculous to hold young children," said the Hazahzas' attorney, Michelle Saez-Rodriguez. "No. 1, they're lacking education, and there's no way a facility like that can provide proper education for children."

"If you have one adult member of the family [detained], that should be enough leverage."

Mrs. Hazahza and her son were sent to Hutto on an outstanding deportation order after the family's political asylum request was denied. Like many others from Palestinian areas, they have been unable to obtain travel documents to leave the U.S.

Mrs. Hazahza's account of ill treatment inside Hutto is similar to that of other former detainees interviewed by The Dallas Morning News and by lawyers of clients inside the facility.

"The way we were treated is not good for any child or woman," she said. "I feel like I lost my mind. I could not eat the food , it was so bad."

Mrs. Hazahza said she had medical problems, with back and neck pain, but when she asked for assistance, all she got was over-the-counter pain medicine.

Thomas Hochberg, the U.S. Public Health Service administrator in charge of Hutto, defended the facility's medical care Friday, citing a staff that includes a doctor, full-time dentist and two mental heath professionals.

Mrs. Hazahza said that about two weeks ago, she started noticing efforts by the center officials to make the facility look better.

Mohammad said he now knows why: "The only reason they did it was because they were going to bring cameras in."

Mr. Mead said Hutto represented a well-thought-out effort to keep families together while better enforcing immigration laws. He said it also serves as a deterrent to smugglers using children as shields to escape arrest and deportation.

Hutto houses about 380 detainees. Less than 10 percent of the population is male and the average stay for immigrants not facing asylum cases is about 40 days, Mr. Mead said. One detainee seeking asylum has been in Hutto for 205 days, he confirmed.

"Everything we do here begins with the safety of children," he said.

Ms. Brané and others, however, say the human toll is greater than whatever immigration enforcement benefit the facility may represent.

"I think one of the primary things we're concerned about is the psychological effect [on children]", she said.

Immigration's Net Binds Children Too (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

TAYLOR, TEXAS — Khadijah Bessuges is confined by metal gates and razor wire. She wears a uniform. She sleeps in an 8-by-15 cell, and stands by her cot four times a day when the guards count heads. She has only two pairs of panties. Her favorite teddy bear was confiscated. But she has her father, Sebastien, who sleeps in the cell with her.

Khadijah is 9 years old.

She is one of 208 children being held with their parents at the T. Don Hutto family detention center, the Department of Homeland Security's answer to the problem of families caught living in or entering the country illegally.

"It's not a good place for people," Khadijah said in a recent telephone interview. "People here get sad, and they don't want to be here. They want to be with their families."

Hutto, which opened in May 2006, is a pillar of the Bush administration's effort to crack down on illegal immigrants and detain them until their appeals can be heard. It holds detainees who cannot easily be sent home, as Mexicans can. Hutto has families from 29 countries, most from South America.

DOJ_NMG_0130907

The center is touted by the Homeland Security Department as a major achievement, and may be a model for future facilities. Hutto also illustrates the administration's bind as its pursuit of border security collides with the reality that many illegal immigrants are minors.

On Friday, a majority of Hutto's 383 inmates were children.

Immigrant advocates and human rights groups ask why Khadijah and the others are jailed for their parents' actions.

"Children being in jail with their parents is what is morally and ethically wrong with this picture," said attorney Frances Valdez of the University of Texas Immigration Law Clinic, who has clients at Hutto.

A former prison northeast of Austin, Hutto is run by a for-profit company with a controversial record. And though the facility is meant for detention measured in days, many immigrants are detained for months.

The average stay is about 55 days for asylum seekers, 40 for others, officials said.

The longest any family has stayed is 205 days. At Immigration and Customs Enforcement's other family facility, in Pennsylvania, the average stay is 59 days, activists say.

Attorneys say children at Hutto lose weight because of substandard food and suffer from untreated medical problems. Adults and children are given an hour of recreation a day, and chances to venture outdoors are rare.

The adults may be seeking asylum or may have been charged with violating immigration laws, like Khadijah's father. They have not been charged with other crimes. Sebastien Bessuges, 30, a Frenchman who last year married an American, was arrested for overstaying his visa; Khadijah, a French and Mexican citizen from a previous marriage, had overstayed her visa too.

Immigrants make up the fastest-growing group of people incarcerated in the U.S., according to the American Bar Assn. The immigration agency holds more than 200,000 people over the course of a year at more than 300 sites.

For the administration and attorneys, family detention is largely uncharted territory. "Standards for family detention do not exist in the U.S.," said Michelle Brane of the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children. "That's just one of our concerns."

Immigration officials have asked Brane's group and others to discuss creating standards for family detention.

Congress did not have Hutto in mind when it directed Homeland Security in 2005 and 2006 to stop separating families and house them in nonpenal, homelike environments. It suggested methods such as electronic monitoring, which is being tested in eight cities. Advocates for immigrants point to a San Diego family shelter run by nuns as another possible model.

Concerns about Hutto are rising. A government commission issued a "report card" Thursday that gave Homeland Security a failing grade on its treatment of asylum seekers. A Texas legislator has introduced a resolution condemning the jailing of children, local groups have held vigils outside Hutto, the American Civil Liberties Union is considering a lawsuit, and a Latino advocacy group has demanded an investigation.

"We want to know what's going on there," said Rosa Rosales, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens. "Putting immigrants in concentration camps should not be happening in the United States."

Officials play down the complaints. "I don't think the criticisms are fair," said Gary Mead, assistant director for Immigration and Customs' detention and removal operations. "This is run as a family shelter; it's not run as a jail. There is medical care; the meals are nutritious. Do people complain? They probably do — they're being detained. They were here illegally and now they're facing, in some cases, certain removal."

In November 2005, Homeland Security officials announced the Secure Border Initiative, an effort to end illegal border crossings. Secretary Michael Chertoff had identified families as a particular problem because the department lacked facilities to detain them. Human rights groups protested separations.

"We could let families go or split them up," Mead said. "Hutto became very important to ending that."

The facility is run by the Corrections Corp. of America, a government contractor paid $95 per person a day. Watchdogs have found mismanagement at Corrections Corp. facilities, including inadequate medical care, failure to control violence, and substandard conditions.

In the two weeks since Sebastien and Khadijah Bessuges arrived, Homeland Security has upgraded Hutto. Razor wire has been removed from the entrance. Artificial plants camouflage the iron entry gates. Walls and doors are plastered in brightly colored paper, cheerful stickers and big letters. But the decor, installed before a media tour Friday, cannot disguise the fact that Hutto is a prison.

"We have tried to soften the facility as much as possible," said Mead, who led the tour.

The Homeland Security Department also has tried to improve the food, say immigrants' advocates, who attribute the changes to media attention. The department has expanded Hutto's academic programs from an hour a day to four, and plans to introduce a curriculum based on Texas standards.

Last week, inmates staged a hunger strike to protest the food and other conditions. Sebastien Bessuges said Khadijah had lost 4 pounds at Hutto.

Homeland Security officials countered Friday with a study showing that 81% of Hutto detainees gained weight during their stay.

Advocates and attorneys concerned about the facility say the medical care is insufficient and there is no pediatrician.

Lawyer Griselda Ponce said one client's untreated leg injury eventually required emergency surgery, and a 4-year-old girl's lips cracked and bled before medical staff would respond to her mother's requests for balm.

Children and parents can blow off steam an hour a day in a gym. The rest of the time, they are kept in pods of several cells. Some locks are disengaged, then armed at night with lasers and alarms.

Bessuges said Khadijah had quarreled with other children and guards had told him he must hold her in check or damage his chances of avoiding deportation.

"Yesterday, I … found out she was removed from school in Arizona because of all the time she's missed," he said, his voice quieting.

"But I can't tell her that. That would break her heart."

Bessuges had visited a federal immigration center last month to see what forms he needed to extend his stay in the U.S. The next day, immigration agents raided his suburban Phoenix home and detained him and Khadijah.

The following day, Bessuges said, immigration officials gave him a choice: He and his daughter could stay in Arizona in separate detention centers, or they could board a plane for the Texas detention center and be together.

"I would never leave her," Bessuges said. "It's fine to make me pay for the mistakes I have made. But … no child deserves this."

Policy On Asylum-Seekers Faulted (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom has issued a report that sharply criticizes federal immigration authorities for rounding up asylum-seekers at the border, detaining them for months in prisonlike facilities and quickly dispatching them back to the countries they fled.

Thursday's report by the bipartisan panel was a follow-up to one two years ago that reported similar findings about detention and expedited removal. It said the Department of Homeland Security and two of its agencies -- the U.S. Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement -- did not act on its recommendations and made little effort to help asylum-seekers.

In more than half of arrests, immigration officials did not advise asylum-seekers to ask for protection if they were afraid of returning home, even though they are required to do so, the report said. Sworn statements were often not verbatim but were used against asylum-seekers when they appeared before immigration judges. Asylum-seekers have a right to review their sworn statements to correct errors but were rarely given the chance, the report said.

"We're distressed that we gave the Department of Homeland Security some very good information two years ago and they've done virtually nothing to address the problem," said Mark Hetfield, a former researcher at the federal commission who recently joined the Hebrew Immigration Aid Society. "Homeland Security is not even following its own procedures. As a result, asylum-seekers are being mistreated."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the homeland security committee, pledged to introduce legislation that would force officials to follow procedures. In a statement Thursday, he and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) praised the report as detailed and thorough.

"The commission's timely report exposes the flaws and inconsistencies in the expedited removal process," the senators said. "We urge members of Congress to act on the commission's findings and the shameful abuses of the current system, and reject any proposals that would make it even more difficult for persons fleeing human rights abuses to seek safe haven in the United States."

The commission's report includes recommendations from two years ago and a report card that gives failing grades to the Border Patrol for not implementing them. The recommendations called on immigration officials to have testers verify that procedures are followed, to make sure that sworn statements are verbatim before immigration hearings and to not jail law-abiding asylum-seekers.

Last year, a three-member panel of immigration judges in San Diego ordered the release of a Sri Lankan asylum-seeker who had been detained since 2001 because the government said it had secret information that linked him to the Tamil Tigers guerrilla group. The decision was among the first to challenge the Bush administration's assertion that it may hold suspects indefinitely on terrorism charges.

In recent weeks, Homeland Security officials have come under fire for interpreting anti-terrorism laws in a way that hurts people seeking asylum and refugee status in the United States. People who were forced to aid terrorist groups, and were even abused in some cases, have been labeled as sympathizers and deported. The agency has since started reviewing individual cases and issuing waivers.

Homeland Security officials say they are following strict anti-terrorism laws created under the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, which place the burden on immigrants to prove that they were jailed or otherwise persecuted in their country of origin.

Stabler Selling Ono Island Home For Taxes (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 10, 2007

Former football great and University of Alabama broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed to put his longtime house near Orange Beach up for sale to pay off tax debts, court records indicate.

Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the U.S. Department of Justice asked a federal judge in Mobile this week to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell. Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. was out of the office Thursday and Friday and did not rule on the request, but judges typically grant such motions when none of the parties opposes it.

The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000.

Stabler's lawyer, Robert Galloway, said Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money. Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case.

"We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it," he said. "This is the time of the year that houses sell."

The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001. The federal government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000.

The civil action accuses Stabler of moving money from the company to his personal account to avoid paying corporate taxes. It states that he transferred nearly $1.4 million from the Stabler Co. to himself in the form of "loans" in 1998 and 1999. At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint.

"If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations," the suit states.

Galloway disputed that Stabler was trying to hide any assets. He suggested that confusion over income generated by the company caused the tax problems. Money essentially got taxed twice, once as business income and then again as personal income to Stabler, Galloway said. He added that he does not know why Stabler created the company rather than charge payments directly for his appearances.

Galloway said Stabler has not been accused of failing to file returns.

"He's been filing returns and didn't always have the money to pay the taxes," he said.

As the house sits on the market, Galloway said, he will continue to negotiate with the IRS over the precise amount of money his client owes.

Stabler, 61, graduated from Foley High School, earning the nickname "Snake" for a long, winding touchdown run he made for the Lions. He went on to lead Paul "Bear" Bryant's University of Alabama football team to the 1965 national championship. He later starred in the NFL for 15 seasons, earning the league's most valuable player award in 1974 and directing the Oakland Raiders to their first Super Bowl in 1977.

Stabler filed for divorce from his wife in 2002. Court records in the divorce, which remains pending in Baldwin County Circuit Court, list Rose Stabler's address as the home on Ono Boulevard that the parties have agreed to sell. Kenny Stabler's address is listed on North Joachim Street in Mobile. The government has placed liens on both properties. It named Rose Stabler as a defendant because she may have a claim on the Ono Island property.

Her attorney, John Crowley, said his client does have an ownership interest in the house. He joined the request to put the tax proceedings on hold but declined further comment.

"The motion speaks for itself," he said.

Kenny Stabler Selling Home On Alabama Coast For Taxes (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

Former football star and Crimson Tide broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed with the IRS to sell his Ono Island house on the Alabama coast to pay his tax debts exceeding $500,000, according to federal court records.

Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the Justice Department asked a judge in Mobile to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell.

Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. did not immediately rule on the request filed this week.

The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the 61-year-old former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island, near the Alabama-Florida border, and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000.

Stabler lawyer Robert Galloway told the Press-Register on Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money.

Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case.

"We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it," he told the Mobile newspaper for a story Saturday.

The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001.

The government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000.

The civil action accuses Stabler of moving money from the company to his personal account to avoid paying corporate taxes. It states that he transferred nearly $1.4 million from the Stabler Co. to himself in the form of "loans" in 1998 and 1999.

At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint.

"If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations," the suit states.

Galloway disputed that Stabler was trying to hide any assets. He suggested that confusion over income generated by the company caused the tax problems. Money essentially got taxed twice, once as business income and then again as personal income to Stabler, Galloway said.

The attorney added that he does not know why Stabler created the company rather than charge payments directly for his appearances.

Galloway said Stabler has not been accused of failing to file returns.

"He's been filing returns and didn't always have the money to pay the taxes," he said.

In his playing days, Stabler earned the nickname "Snake" for a long, winding touchdown run he made for the Foley High School Lions. He went on to lead coach Paul "Bear" Bryant's Alabama team to the 1965 national championship.

Judge Rips Prosecutors Over Plea Deal (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 10, 2007

Tax preparer faces prison time, even after the U.S. Justice Department's tax division called for none

A federal judge says prosecutors ignored their own policy when they gave a lenient plea bargain to a Bountiful accountant who prepared fraudulent tax returns.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell refused to go along with the deal, which called for no incarceration and no restitution for Lance W. Mercer. Cassell instead ordered Mercer to spend five months in home confinement, then five months in prison and pay $11,378 to the Internal Revenue Service.

Cassell scolded the U.S. Justice Department's tax division for agreeing not to ask for any enhanced sentences under federal sentencing guidelines.

Mercer, a tax preparer with a master's degree, had a special skill that he used to cheat the government, Cassell wrote in his order. The accountant used his knowledge of what figures would appear reasonable to make returns "fly through" IRS processing, Cassell wrote.

However, prosecutors not only declined to request a sentence enhancement based on the special-skill circumstance, they actually objected to any increase, Cassell said.

The judge noted that in 2003, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said any sentencing recommendation by the Justice Department "must honestly reflect the totality and seriousness of the defendant's conduct and must be fully consistent with the guidelines."

About the same time in 2003, Cassell noted, the Justice Department argued to Congress that judges' failure to comply with the guidelines had resulted in reduced sentences and an erosion of the deterrent value of federal sentencing policy.

“The court firmly agrees with the generally stated position of the department that a sentencing system that involves ignoring the obvious facts is 'neither desirable nor capable of sustaining long-term public confidence,' ” Cassell said.

He stressed his criticism is not aimed at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah or the trial attorney assigned to defend Mercer's plea bargain.

Assistant Attorney General Eileen J. O'Connor said Thursday that the tax division adheres to "principles of federal prosecution, including DOJ policies concerning sentencing."

According to court records, the IRS became suspicious of Mercer Consulting Group because so many clients were receiving refunds or claiming an earned income credit, but had little net income.

In May 2002, one undercover agent met with Mercer and another met with his father, Lynne F. Mercer, the firm's operator. The agents allege the two prepared inaccurate tax returns for them and they launched an investigation that led to charges against the men.

Father and son both entered plea bargains. Lynne Mercer was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge David Sam to 18 months in prison. Lance Mercer was sentenced Jan. 10 by Cassell.

California CPA Accused Of Misrepresenting Facts (NPLT)

By John Lindenberger, The North Platte Telegraph

North Platte (NE) Telegraph, February 10, 2007

Lowell Baisden, the California accountant currently under investigation for tax fraud, is being accused of misrepresenting facts in his opposition to a preliminary injunction from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Court documents filed by Baisden's attorneys in December indicated that IRS attorney Kathryn Meyer had verified the legality of Baisden's actions and that she informed IRS agents Baisden had done nothing illegal.

However, Meyer's official declaration, which was filed Feb. 2 by Justice Department attorney Jacqueline Brown, indicate Meyer never made any statement or suggestion that Baisden's scheme was legal.

"To the contrary ... I determined that Mr. Baisden's scheme is without merit, results in a substantial understatement of his clients' federal income tax liabilities, and that an injunction against Mr. Baisden's continued use of this scheme is essential," Meyer stated in her declaration.

Thomas Cheung, the IRS agent assigned to investigate Baisden, also stated in an official declaration filed last week that he never told Baisden his tax methods were correct. Yet, Baisden has allegedly hindered the IRS investigation by telling others that Cheung and Meyer had agreed Baisden's methods were proper.

In a reply to Baisden's opposition to the preliminary injunction, Brown said Baisden has admitted to the IRS in prior interviews that he has never requested a formal determination as to the validity of his tax plan. Furthermore, Brown said the IRS has notified Baisden on several occasions that his methods are inaccurate.

"Despite such notification and rather than researching the validity of his tax promotion, he obstinately continues to advocate positions in direct contradiction with the internal revenue laws," Brown said.

Baisden has also provided false information on the tax returns he has prepared, according to Brown. Court documents indicate Baisden has filed numerous returns from 2000 to 2006 using an invalid Employer Identification Number. So far, the IRS has been unable to find any individual or company with the EIN used by Baisden.

Brown claims Baisden continues to provide false advice to his clients, as well, resulting in material harm to the clients because they, not Baisden, are the ones who are subject to penalties, interest and additional tax.

"Despite Baisden's arguments, an IRS investigation does not constitute reasonable cause for a taxpayer's complete failure to file required income tax returns, and Baisden's tax advice is incorrect," Brown states.

In response to Baisden's claim that his clients have continued to pay their estimated tax deposits even though their tax returns have not been filed, Brown said Baisden is the one who determined how much his clients should be paying. Brown said that amount is well below what his clients actually owe.

"The IRS is unable to determine whether any customers have made all of their required deposits of their actual tax liability because Baisden has not filed their tax returns, and failed to provide requested documentation," Brown said.

Even if the estimated tax deposits are correct, Brown said Baisden's clients will nevertheless owe penalties for failing to file their tax returns. These penalties can be up to 25 percent of their actual tax liabilities.

Finally, Baisden has argued that the corporations he has established for his clients have been properly created under state law and are therefore valid. Brown said the legality of these corporations is not being disputed.

"Yet, even if a corporation is validly created under state law, it must nevertheless pay all federal taxes due and cannot be used as a means by which to unlawfully underreport one's individual income," Brown said.

In the end, Brown said it is apparent from the tax returns Baisden has prepared that his goal was to create as many deductions as possible in order to unlawfully reduce his clients' reported tax liabilities.

The hearing to determine whether to grant a preliminary injunction against Baisden has been scheduled for Friday, March 2 in U.S. District Court.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Oversight Hearings Rankle Republicans (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman's oversight committee spent the week delving into government waste that ranged from spending in Iraq to federal drug program pricing -- inquests Republicans say mainly provided entertainment but no legislative action.

Some of the hearings of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform were strictly "a show," said Rep. Darrell Issa, a California Republican on the panel.

He cited the hearing Wednesday with tearful testimony by family members of three civilian security workers killed and mutilated by a Fallujah mob in a widely televised attack in March 2004.

The families, who are pursuing a wrongful-death lawsuit against security contractor Blackwater USA, accused the firm of "war profiteering" and poorly equipping its bodyguards.

Mr. Issa said he hoped the committee would move beyond these hearings and make proposals to curb wasteful government spending, such as rewriting contracting and procurement rules.

But the initial hearings -- including one focusing on criticism of how U.S. officials accounted for Iraqi money spent after the fall of dictator Saddam Hussein -- rankled Republicans.

"So far it has been fairly polarizing along ideology lines," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. "This stuff gets so polarized so fast."

He said he was ready to "enter a serious discussion" with Mr. Waxman about revising government contracting standards, issues he has worked on for years and where he said the government has made significant improvements since the 1980s.

"There is still a lot of waste that goes into the government business model," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and the committee's chairman, has promised to continue the probes for the next two years, and yesterday at the hearing into accusations that drug companies overcharge Medicaid, Medicare and other federal health programs, he said the findings had set the stage for even more hearings.

"This committee will have an aggressive oversight agenda when it comes to pharmaceutical manufactures and other companies that engage in wasteful, fraudulent or abusive tactics that affect federal health care programs," Mr. Waxman said.

"This testimony we hear today will help us establish additional investigative priorities for the next two years."

Mr. Davis cautioned that the Democrat's persistent call for "more transparency" in government contracting could produce more bureaucracy and more inefficiency that further squanders taxpayer dollars.

Rep. John L. Mica, Florida Republican, said the committee was conducting a "bash-and-dash" hearing Thursday that focused on errors in a $24 billion Homeland Security contract for a new U.S. Coast Guard fleet -- problems revealed by a government audit in 2003.

He said Democrats were making a case to replace private contractors with more bureaucracy.

"The government is more effective than the private sector, that's what I'm hearing from the other side," Mr. Mica said. "I can't believe it."

Several Republicans requested proposals for corrective action from those testifying about contracting deficiencies, proposals that may be the subject of future hearings.

Rangel, McCrery Introduce Small-business Tax Cuts (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.) said Friday they have reached a deal on a package of tax cuts for small businesses that could smooth the path of a federal minimum wage increase to $7.25.

"This bill strengthens opportunities for small businesses and serves as a symbol of what can happen when Democrats and Republicans work together," Rangel said in a joint statement. "This tax relief will help small businesses continue to grow and hire new workers to keep our economy strong. This is a bipartisan bill providing critical momentum for the bipartisan effort to raise the minimum wage."

The revenue-neutral bill would provide nearly $2 billion in tax relief, McCrery said.

"I believe it is important to couple a minimum wage increase with tax cuts to help businesses that will be hurt by higher costs," the lawmaker said, adding that "unlike in the Senate bill, much of that relief will be immediate - helping business when costs are rising, not just down the line."

Reacting to the announcement of the deal, Senate Finance Committee ranking member Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) said he is happy that "House Democratic leaders changed their minds about getting a minimum wage/small business tax relief package passed.

"Now we need to make sure their bill actually does something at the same time the minimum wage is increased," he added.

In January the House passed a "clean" minimum wage increase, and the Senate passed an increase with a small-business tax package that was much larger than what Rangel and McCrery have now proposed.

House Bill Would Prevent Rich From Shifting Assets To Kids (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- To help fund legislation giving small businesses more than $1 billion in tax breaks, House tax writers propose blocking wealthy people from shifting income to their children.

But the House bill would give a pass -- at least for now -- to big deferred-compensation plans and corporate tax shelters that have been targeted by a similar, but more expansive, Senate bill that would also boost the federal minimum wage.

The House bill, scheduled for consideration in the Ways and Means Committee Monday, is likely to pass the full House this coming week. It would extend for one year a tax credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and extend a provision allowing small firms to more quickly write off store upgrades and technology purchases.

The bill is a step toward breaking a logjam with the Senate over a phased-in, $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage that passed both chambers. The Senate's minimum-wage bill included small-business tax breaks that totaled more than $8 billion over 10 years, and until now House Democrats have been reluctant to do the same in combination with the minimum-wage boost.

In a provision aimed at helping restaurants, the House bill would increase a credit that businesses receive in exchange for paying payroll taxes on income from tips. Without such a change, a higher minimum wage would reduce the value of the existing credit. The bill also would end limits under the alternative-minimum tax that prevent many small businesses from claiming credits for hiring disadvantaged workers and taxes paid on cash tips.

The bill would pay for the changes -- as required under new House budget rules -- by denying the dependent children of wealthy people the lowest capital-gains and dividend rates, 5% this year and falling to zero next year. The low rates, available to people in the 10% and 15% tax brackets, "presumably" were meant to benefit low-income people, according to a House Ways and Means summary. But because they also are available to children of wealthy people, those parents can reduce their own taxes by shifting assets to their children.

DOJ_NMG_0130915

The House bill also would give the Internal Revenue Service more time to notify taxpayers about violations even while interest and penalties mount. The value of each of the tax breaks and offsets weren't yet available.

House Republicans Take To The Airwaves (HILL)

By Jeremy Jacobs

The Hill, February 9, 2007

House Republicans are taking to the airwaves, hoping that a weekly radio address will help them spread their message.

Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) officially announced Friday that House Republicans will be taping an address this week that will be distributed to hundreds of local and national radio stations across the country.

"A weekly radio address will give House Republicans yet another opportunity to communicate directly with the American people," they said. "This represents a broad-based effort to engage the millions of Americans who listen to the radio on their way to work, on their lunch hour or on their way home to their families."

GOP leaders will use the radio address to outline House Republican positions and respond to the Democratic agenda. Each week, a member of the Republican leadership will tackle a different issue facing Americans.

"We're going back to what we did so well in the mid-1990s by communicating common sense and fiscally responsible solutions directly to American families and tax payers," a spokesman for the Republican Conference, Ed Patru, said.

"Having a direct dialogue with Americans that live outside the Beltway will be a refreshing change from a few elite Democrats in the House passing legislation behind closed doors, shutting everyone out of the process," he added.

Boehner is using the inaugural radio address to support President Bush's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal.

"Republican pro-growth policies have strengthened our economy, and the federal deficit is declining rapidly. Congress must make an important choice: We can use the increased revenue from economic growth to balance the budget, keep taxes low and begin to address the long-term challenge of runaway entitlement spending," Boehner said. "Or we can blow it by squandering the money on pork, unnecessary new programs and bigger government."

He also empathized with Americans who are disappointed that the U.S. has not made more progress in Iraq but stressed that cutting off funds for U.S. troops is not the answer.

"Next week, the House will debate the issue of Iraq, and the president's new strategy. All Americans are frustrated we haven't seen more success in Iraq more quickly, but one thing is clear: We must oppose any effort to cut off funds our troops need to succeed in their mission," Boehner said.

Traditionally, the president gives a weekly radio address every Saturday and the opposition party airs a rebuttal afterward.

Pelosi Airliner Tempting Target For Miffed GOP (WT/AP)

By Darlene Superville

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

For most of the past five weeks, House Republicans could do little else but watch as majority Democrats passed major legislation without giving them a chance to propose changes or offer alternatives.

So when they finally got a chance Thursday to vent pent-up frustrations over how Democrats were running things, the Republicans decided to make some noise -- and how.

They aimed high, all the way to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

The California Democrat went before the House Science Committee in the morning to champion her commitment to do something about global warming, a rare appearance for a leader of the House.

She did so as reports swirled on Capitol Hill that she had requested a bigger, swankier government airplane than her Republican predecessor had used for trips back to her home district when Congress isn't meeting.

For Republicans, feeling muzzled and still down over losing control of the House, the irony was too good to ignore.

A waste of the taxpayers' money, some said, estimating that her trips would cost $15 million a year if she used planes such as the military version of the Boeing 757-200. In its commercial configuration the 757-200 usually seats 175 to 190 passengers.

DOJ_NMG_0130916

Mrs. Pelosi should lead by example, others argued, because a bigger plane consumes more fuel and contributes more to the global warming she expresses concern about.

"The jet that Pelosi has produces 10,000 pounds of carbon dioxide an hour, far more than the previous speaker used," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican. Mrs. Pelosi's predecessor was Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"By commandeering a huge government plane for her personal transport to California, this is totally contradictory to the alarm bells we heard her ringing in the Science Committee just a few hours ago," said Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican.

Democrats said the debate about the plane, which occurred during a Republican amendment to a bill to promote ethanol and other alternative fuels, was "silly." White House spokesman Tony Snow also weighed in, also calling the plane controversy "silly."

The Republicans' amendment to the alternative fuels bill amounted to a dig at Mrs. Pelosi; it specifically mentioned passenger planes "capable of transcontinental flights."

"I do not question the imperative of providing for the safety of the speaker of the United States House of Representatives," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "On the subject of whether this is a silly debate, I think it is silly to question the right of the minority to question public expenditures."

And so it went for nearly two hours. The bill passed 400-3, with the amendment included.

During the hubbub, House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood, who is charged with the speaker's security, issued a statement saying it actually was he, not Mrs. Pelosi, who had requested that the military provide the larger plane so Mrs. Pelosi could fly nonstop to San Francisco.

After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the Pentagon agreed to provide the House speaker, who is second in the line of presidential succession behind the vice president, with a military plane for added security during trips home. Mr. Hastert flew in a commuter-size Air Force jet.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," Mr. Livingood said in a statement. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

The Pentagon informed Mrs. Pelosi's staff this week that she would get a plane, based on availability, and that nonstop service could not be guaranteed.

Mrs. Pelosi said Thursday that she would be happy to fly commercial.

"We never asked for a larger plane. This is a myth that [the Republicans] are talking about on the floor," she said. "They have nothing to say to the American people about the war, the economy, global warming and the rest. So they have this game they're playing."

Back on the House floor, 83-year-old Rep. Ralph M. Hall, Texas Republican, offered that it probably would be cheaper if he rode the bus home to Dallas every weekend, but that issue could be debated some other time.

"The only airplane I'm thinking about," he said, "is the one I wanted to be on at 12:30, heading for Texas."

FBI Probes California GOP Congressman's Land Deals (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 -- A Republican congressman from California defended his reputation this week, as FBI investigators look into charges that he improperly delayed paying taxes on several lucrative land deals.

Rep. Gary G. Miller told fellow House Republicans behind closed doors Tuesday that he "has done nothing wrong, his business dealings have all been above-board and that these allegations are baseless and have no merit," his spokesman Scott Toussaint said.

The FBI investigation follows an article in the Los Angeles Times and a complaint from the nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics alleging that Miller, a wealthy real estate developer, unlawfully avoided paying taxes on a land deal.

According to the newspaper's account, confirmed by Miller, he sold 165 vacant acres to the city of Monrovia, Calif., in 2002, after trying for years to build housing on it. He then delayed paying taxes on $10 million in profit by claiming that he sold under threat of eminent domain.

Miller used money from the sale to buy two other pieces of land in nearby Fontana, Calif., from a campaign contributor. He sold both to the city of Fontana, and once more delayed paying taxes by claiming the city threatened to take the land.

The threat of eminent domain allows a landowner to invoke Section 1033 of the federal tax code, which delays the payment of capital gains taxes if profits are reinvested within two years.

For all three of the land deals, Miller requested and obtained a letter from the city referring to eminent domain, a spokesman for the congressman said. But city officials later said the letters were meaningless because they did not actually threaten to take Miller's land.

"Eminent domain was not initiated," Monrovia Mayor Rob Hammond said in an interview, referring to the land deal in his city. "Was it discussed? Yes. Do you make a decision [about whether to sell the land] based on what was discussed? That's a question for the IRS."

"All I do is real estate transactions, and I've never heard of anything like this ever happening. It doesn't make a lot of sense," Los Angeles real estate and taxation lawyer Stephen Fainsbert said of Miller's multiple 1033 exemptions. "Even once it's something. But to see it three times -- well, as they say, the smell test is violated."

FBI investigators have interviewed current and former Monrovia officials, and reviewed video of a City Council meeting in which Miller asked the city to buy his land, city officials have said.

Last week, Miller sent a letter to Monrovia officials threatening a lawsuit for telling reporters that the city never intended to use eminent domain to take his land. "He felt that city officials had been speaking out of both sides of their mouths" by giving him a letter referring to eminent domain, then denying to the news media that they planned to take the land, Toussaint said.

Toussaint said Miller paid taxes on all three land deals in quarterly installments over 2005 and 2006. He did not say how much Miller paid, and did not provide documentation of payment.

Miller has not been contacted by the IRS or the FBI, Toussaint said. Miller voluntarily turned over documents related to his business to the House ethics committee and to Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

A spokesman for Boehner, Brian Kennedy, said he did not know whether Boehner reviewed the documents.

In response to a question, Kennedy said: "I don't know that there's been any discussion of removing" Miller from his seat on the Financial Services Committee, in which Miller is the ranking GOP member of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics, said Miller is "doing what Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney did before him. He's going to the Republican Conference and proclaiming his innocence."

"This is just the last thing in the world" House Republicans want, said Barbara Sinclair, a University of California at Los Angeles political science professor.

"The whole ethics business did play a part in the Republicans' disastrous performance in the 2006 elections. That makes it even more of an important story. Clearly Republicans do not want this to be an ongoing problem and continue on to 2008."

Follow That Lobbyist (NYT)

By Randy Evans

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

THE Democratic majority in Congress has made ethics reform a centerpiece of its agenda — and not a moment too soon. The list of members of Congress from both parties who have either pleaded guilty to or are under F.B.I. investigation for crimes involving their offices is embarrassing.

Unfortunately, the latest reforms (some adopted in the House by rule and others proposed by the Senate in legislation) tighten restrictions without actually addressing the real reasons that Congressional ethics rules have been ineffective in the past. The result is tougher rules that will rarely, if ever, be enforced. Here's why.

First, regardless of what anyone might claim, there remains no mechanism for policing those at the heart of Congress's ethics problems: lobbyists willing to violate the rules.

Under the new ethics reforms (as well as under the previous rules), the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the Senate Ethics Committee and the Federal Election Commission do not have the jurisdiction to detect, investigate and punish lobbyists who give prohibited gifts to representatives, senators or their staffs.

The Congressional ethics committees can regulate the conduct of, and punish, only lawmakers and their staffs. Lobbyists can be investigated by the Justice Department, but only under restrictive bribery statutes that require proof of a direct link between payments or gifts by lobbyists and actions by public officials. Consequently, unethical conduct by lobbyists that does not reach the point of bribery or an illegal campaign contribution (which does fall under the Federal Election Commission's jurisdiction) will remain unregulated.

Second, even with the new rules, only members of Congress or someone with a member's permission can file a complaint with the House ethics committee. But limiting who can file a complaint effectively precludes any meaningful enforcement.

Whenever a Congressional ethics scandal erupts, Americans wonder why nobody said anything. Why, for example, did someone like Randy Cunningham, the disgraced representative from California, routinely violate Congressional gift rules with seemingly little concern about an ethics investigation? The answer, in my experience, is that most members of Congress are so afraid of being accused of taking (knowingly or unknowingly) banned gifts themselves that they would never allege that a colleague had done so — no matter how clear the violation. No one wants to set the standard by which he might someday be judged.

This problem will persist even under tighter restrictions like the new gift ban. After all, the problem in recent years wasn't that the gift limit — $50 per gift — was too high; it was the absence of effective oversight and enforcement of that limit. As long as these new rules, like the old ones, rely only on lawmakers to report violations, nothing will change.

Simply put, there will continue to be an unchecked circle of improper gifts by lobbyists (who cannot be punished) to lawmakers (who have no incentive to report them). As in the past, only when gift-giving reaches the level of a crime will the F.B.I. or the Department of Justice step in and start an investigation. Nothing in these touted ethics reforms solves this problem.

So what's the solution?

Ultimately, the most effective deterrent against ethics violations is public scrutiny, based on accurate and timely information. That's why it's imperative that ethics reform begin with full disclosure by lawmakers, their staffs and lobbyists.

Each member of Congress should keep a log of every gift received by his office and file it electronically at least quarterly. The same requirement should apply to Congressional staffers. Lobbyists should electronically file monthly public disclosures of all lobbying expenses, specifying who used what tickets, who ate what meal, who played how many rounds of golf. All these disclosures should be posted on the Internet.

Along with transparency, the best way to prevent, detect and punish corruption is to enforce rules against all violators, whether they work inside the Capitol or on K Street.

It is therefore imperative for Congress to establish an independent commission, akin to the Federal Election Commission, with jurisdiction to regulate the conduct of lobbyists just as the Congressional ethics committees regulate the conduct of members and staffs. The commission must be responsible for enforcing the new gift ban, ensuring that all disclosure requirements are met, and setting and imposing penalties for rule violations.

But even an independent commission empowered to investigate violations won't be effective without significant modifications to the reporting process. It will have nothing to investigate.

Thus, any person should be able to file a complaint. (Subject to some time restriction, of course — say, 60 days before an election, in order to prevent abusive filings for political gain. Anyone who files a complaint found to be frivolous should be subject to a penalty.) Complaints should be acted on promptly, and either be dismissed or investigated.

Effective ethics reform in Congress requires real changes in the reporting requirements for lawmakers and their staffs, enhanced disclosure requirements for lobbying activities, better transparency, public participation via the Internet, and an independent commission to enforce the rules against both the donor and the recipient of improper gifts. Anything less is just cosmetic.

Marine Corps Grounds V-22 Osprey Aircraft (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Marine Corps said yesterday it was temporarily grounding its fleet of V-22 Osprey tilt rotors after discovering a glitch in a computer chip that could cause the aircraft to lose control.

The order affects 54 of the helicopter-airplane hybrids -- 46 owned by the Marines and eight belonging to the Air Force -- and could last weeks, Marine Corps officials said. It was an unexpected setback for the program; the military last grounded the fleet in 2000 after two fatal crashes that killed 23 Marines.

While none of the aircraft has been sent into the combat despite more than 20 years in development, the Osprey has regained support in the military in recent years. The Marine Corps expects to declare its version combat-ready this summer, and the Air Force version is expected to reach that point in early 2009.

The latest glitch should not affect those plans, said James Darcy, spokesman for the program.

The aircraft's contractors, Bell Helicopter and Boeing, notified the government of the problem on Tuesday after an onboard diagnostic computer pointed to an issue with a chip in the flight control computers, which control all of the aircraft's moving parts. Testing showed that in below-freezing temperatures, the computers could lose their redundancy features -- a safety net if one of the computers is damaged by enemy fire, according to the Marine Corps. That could cause the pilot to lose control of the aircraft.

"It's unacceptable," Darcy said. "This aircraft has to be able to go anywhere in the world." The Marine Corps wants an aircraft that can operate in temperatures as extreme as 65 degrees below zero, he said.

It is unclear how much it will cost to fix the problem, Darcy said.

"Bell and Boeing will work together to get the issue resolved as quickly as possible so the aircraft can return to flight," said Jack Satterfield, a Boeing spokesman. "We expect to be able to do that quickly."

The military plans to buy 360 of the aircraft for the Marine Corps, 50 for the Air Force and 48 for the Navy. The price per aircraft ranges from about $70 million to $89 million, excluding development costs.

Despite recent progress, including flying across the Atlantic Ocean this summer, the program continues to have its critics. "This plane has been in production for over 25 years, costs more than $100 million each, and is scheduled to go into combat this summer," said Todd Bowers, defense investigator for Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog group. "I guess we are seeing the results of the extremely weak testing done on this aircraft, which is disconcerting since it will possibly be carrying troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. If it can't stand a little cold weather how can it handle a war zone?"

Air Force Academy Probes Alleged Cheating By Cadets (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Air Force Academy is investigating allegations of cheating by 28 freshmen and has restricted all 4,300 cadets to campus over the weekend, asking them to meet in small groups to consider "their self-image and the image of the institution," Air Force officials said yesterday.

In addition to the cheating, the academy's superintendent, Lt. Gen. John F. Regni, cited other recent disciplinary problems in a stern speech this week to the entire student body, faculty and staff.

Forty-three cadets lost their Internet privileges in January because they had downloaded pornography or visited pornographic Web sites, and there have been recurring incidents of alcohol abuse, academy spokesman Johnny Whitaker said.

Nineteen percent of the freshman class was failing academically at the end of the fall semester, giving it the lowest collective grade-point average in 20 years, he added.

Regni's speech on Wednesday challenged the cadets "to get introspective about this, to look in the mirror -- 'Is this the kind of institution that we want to be?' " Whitaker said. "He told them he was disappointed with them, that honor is the heart of what we do."

Several members of Congress were briefed on the cheating investigation Thursday during a teleconference with the academy's 15-member Board of Visitors.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) said there have been bigger cases of mass cheating at other military academies, including a 1992 incident involving 134 seniors at the Naval Academy, which resulted in the expulsion of two dozen midshipmen.

But Allard said the Air Force Academy is determined to act quickly and firmly, having learned a lesson from two scandals in recent years, one involving sexual assaults on female cadets and the other stemming from incidents of religious intolerance on the Colorado Springs campus. The academy began mandatory training on religious diversity in 2005 after complaints that evangelical Christian faculty members, staffers and students had pressed their beliefs on cadets of other faiths.

Restricting all cadets to campus and requiring them to discuss the recent disciplinary problems is "good preventive medicine," Allard said. "That's how we got in trouble with the sex harassment scandal -- they just kept sweeping it under the rug and not dealing with it. This time, they're trying to catch the problems early."

In a brief statement this week, the academy said that 19 cadets, so far, have admitted cheating on a Jan. 31 "fourth-class knowledge test," a routine exam on military affairs given weekly to all 1,200 freshmen. Among the 28 cadets under suspicion of cheating are 19 intercollegiate athletes, the academy said. None of their names has been released.

Whitaker said the disproportionate number of varsity athletes is an issue in the investigation. But the 19 athletes play for four different teams, and at this point "it does not appear that there was any conspiracy by a particular group," he said.

The 1992 cheating scandal at Annapolis also involved a large number of athletes. Of the 24 expelled, six were varsity football players. In the wake of the expulsions, some members of Congress questioned whether the recruitment and preferential treatment of academically lackluster athletes was a contributing factor.

Some Air Force cadets pointed in a different direction this week. They noted that the cheating took place on a weekly test that typically includes questions about the chain of command and military jargon. If a student fails one of those tests, he or she is required to stay in the dorm over the following weekend. A second failure can result in the grounding of the upper-class cadet who is the designated leader of a group of freshmen, putting intense pressure on students to pass, they said.

The cheating was reported by classmates, and the investigation is being led by cadets, a standard procedure under the academy's honor code. Academy officials said the punishment has not been determined, but Allard said "it wouldn't surprise me if a fair number got dismissed" from the academy.

Cadets said they have been ordered to go through their computer files this weekend and erase any improper data, including illegally acquired music and videos as well as pornography. They said they will also be required to attend a luncheon discussion and hear a speaker. The academy had originally planned to cancel regular activities on Monday, but that order was rescinded, cadets said.

"I called my parents last night to tell them they would hear some bad publicity on the academy, and my father said, 'You just keep your nose clean,' " one freshman said.

Another cadet said Regni's speech landed hard. "He said 99 percent of us are doing our job, but a few bad apples can ruin it for the rest of us," the cadet said on the condition of anonymity because he had not received clearance to speak to a reporter.

Regni, who has been superintendent since 2005, said in a brief interview that he was confident the number of students implicated in cheating would not rise above the 28 already under investigation.

He declined to discuss his speech, saying only: "We talk to the cadets, and we make sure the cadets understand that actions have consequences."

Air Force Cadets Grounded Over Cheating (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

AIR FORCE ACADEMY, Colo. (AP) — All 4,000 Air Force cadets will be confined to campus this weekend following a scandal in which 28 freshman are suspected of cheating on a test, school officials said Thursday.

The entire corps will remain on school grounds to reflect on the Air Force Academy's honor code, which forbids lying, cheating, stealing or tolerating those who violate it. Plus, the only bar there will be closed.

"This is a pretty disappointing time for us," said Superintendent Lt. Gen. John Regni, who ordered the lock down and bar closure.

DOJ_NMG_0130921

The alleged cheating was reported on Feb. 2 on a basic-knowledge test that does not count toward cadets' grade point average, but is required for first-year cadets. Some cadets admitted obtaining answers to a test and forwarding them through an Internet social group and private computer messages.

Cadets caught cheating can be expelled or placed on probation. No individual punishments have been handed down.

Bad Faith On Social Security (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

In 2005, President Bush put his political capital where his mouth was, and lost. He went all-out to convince Congress and the American people that privatizing Social Security would be good and necessary. It's neither — and his plan was justifiably and soundly rejected. This year, with his political capital on empty, Mr. Bush is talking about a bipartisan effort to reform Social Security. But his actions suggest that he has no intention of making any serious compromises.

In his new budget, Mr. Bush allocates $29.3 billion to establish private accounts in 2012, totaling $637 billion through 2017. That suggests that either Mr. Bush still hasn't figured out that private accounts are a political nonstarter, or he's hoping to use them as a bargaining chip in future negotiations. Either way, that attitude virtually ensures that Social Security reform will stall in this Congress, just as it did when the Republicans were in charge.

Mr. Bush is proving similarly tone-deaf when it comes to choosing members for the Social Security board of trustees.

There are six trustees, four of them administration officials and two outsiders. The job of the two outsiders — nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate — is to represent the public's interest in decisions about the program. Last year Mr. Bush nominated the same two men who had served in his first term. That violated the rationale for having public trustees, which is to bring fresh perspectives. So Congress refused to consider the nominees, but Mr. Bush appointed them for another year while Congress was in recess. He has now renominated them for new four-year terms.

Mr. Bush won't get his way. But he is alienating Congress and creating delays that will make it harder for the next two public trustees — whoever they are — to participate fully. Given all that, it's not surprising if the public and Congress decide that Mr. Bush is not to be trusted on Social Security.

Three Steps To Better Healthcare (LAT)

By Henry J. Aaron

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

HEALTHCARE analysts have long deplored the linkage between health insurance and employment. It makes no sense for one's health insurance to end if one leaves a job. Various state reform plans, including that of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, deal with the healthcare system as a whole. But President Bush's proposed fix does not go far enough.

The workplace-healthcare connection arose primarily because of a tax quirk. Premiums paid by the employer are excluded from the employee's personal income and payroll taxes. If employees buy the insurance themselves, they pay for it with income that has been taxed. The president proposes to eliminate that differential and replace it with a deduction for insurance, however it is financed. If coverage meets certain standards, the worker would receive a tax deduction — $7,500 for singles, $15,000 for couples and families.

This change is a step toward "leveling the playing field." But is it an improvement if that is all that is done? The answer is no. To replace employment-based health insurance, it is necessary to have something else that works. In particular, it is necessary to have a well-functioning market in which individuals can buy insurance at a reasonable price. Currently, the individual health insurance market is a disaster.

It's a mess because it does not adequately pool risks. Pooling risks means grouping people with high and low expected health outlays. Premiums are then based on the average of the group. When people seek coverage as individuals, an insurer that wants to stay in business has to charge a premium that covers the costs each particular customer is likely to generate, plus enough extra to cover selling costs and profits. For healthy 30-year-olds, those costs are very low. For the cancer patient in remission or the 60-year-old whose parents died in their 40s from heart attacks, those costs are dramatically higher. The premiums for the latter may be so high that few can afford them.

Pooling makes health insurance affordable for the average person. The workplace serves that function — not ideally but adequately. Workplace pooling works best for large companies, for those with relatively high average wages and for those with stable labor forces. For a small company, one very sick employee can drive up costs. High turnover raises administrative costs. And where wages are low, typical premiums for family coverage equal the total earnings of a full-time minimum-wage worker.

So, what is right and what is wrong with the president's plan? What is right is that it would extend to individually purchased insurance a tax break similar to the one now available only on employer-financed coverage. It would do so in a way that would not add to the federal deficit measured over 10 years, although it would boost deficits initially. Unfortunately, the plan would continue the incentive of bigger tax breaks for high earners even though most of the uninsured are low earners.

A better plan would be a tax credit that offered the same tax relief per dollar of insurance to people at all income levels. Better still would be offering larger credits to low-income households, which need help, rather than to high-income households, which don't.

The bigger problem with the Bush plan is that it would not ensure that people would be able to find insurance at a reasonable price. The plan would produce millions more such shoppers because it would make it much easier for employers, bedeviled by rising premiums, to stop sponsoring coverage. Generous employers might give employees a raise equal to what the employer had been paying for insurance, but employees would still have to find a plan they could afford.

To be sure, the Bush plan would permit states to shift some funds to help subsidize high-risk patients. But it does not ensure that high-risk individuals would be able to find an affordable plan. As a result, it is likely to leave some older and sicker people, who now have insurance by grace of employer coverage, uninsured and unable to afford care.

The Bush plan could have provided that assurance by allowing working-age Americans to buy insurance from the plans offered to federal employees at the same prices that federal employees pay. Or it could have permitted them to buy Medicare coverage at a premium determined on a communitywide basis. To make insurance affordable for low earners still would have required additional help. However, the plan enacted by the Massachusetts legislature and Schwarzenegger's proposal clearly show that there are ways to do this.

If Bush's one-step plan were enacted, the nation would step into a very deep hole. Two additional steps are necessary for genuine reform: measures to make the individual health insurance market work, and assistance to low-income households that makes insurance affordable. The nation should not be satisfied with one step that makes things worse when two more would make them so much better.

Judgment Pay (WSJ)

By Paul A. Volcker

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Anyone appearing before a judge in a federal courtroom -- plaintiff, defendant, juror -- will feel apprehensive. There are big issues at stake. Personal reputation and family fortunes, even imprisonment, may be at risk. Business practices can be questioned. The actions of government itself, even the constitutionality of its laws, can be challenged.

What we have a right to ask -- what we must demand -- is that the cases be decided fairly, by capable judges acting in a context of high professional standards and personal independence. It is those qualities that the framers of our Constitution sought to protect by providing lifetime appointment for federal judges and forbidding reduction in their compensation. Yet those qualities can also be eroded, not consciously, not by design, but by an insidious neglect. The simple fact is that judicial compensation has not kept pace with reasonable requirements.

The historical pattern is unambiguous. The last comprehensive review of government salaries, including the judiciary, took place in 1989. Twenty years after the previous full-scale realignment of federal salaries in 1969, the concept and goal set out were clear: the substantial past shortfall -- relative to the cost of living and private-sector pay over the previous 20 years -- would be at least partly corrected. Thereafter, pay was to be annually adjusted based on increases in private-sector wages in order to keep pace with those changes and inflation.

The approach has failed. Congress has simply refused to make good on its expressed goal, and has not even provided cost of living adjustments. It has now been 16 years since this last judicial pay raise took full effect. Since that time, average American workers' wages, when adjusted for inflation, have risen 18.5%. During that same period, federal judges' real, inflation-adjusted pay has declined 10.8%, while the pay of most other federal workers, when adjusted for inflation, has risen by 15.1%. The decline in real pay of district judges has dropped by 25% since the earlier 1969 review.

Political inhibitions over time, gradually and for a while imperceptibly, exact a real cost. Specifically, a judicial system designed to attract men and women of broad experience and independence of judgment will be weakened by the reality of strained personal economic circumstances. And now there is evidence from many of the 100 federal judges who have left the bench in recent years that financial considerations were factors in their decisions.

The force of that concern was brought home to me a few years ago. Instead of feeling any apprehensiveness about appearing before a federal judge, I found myself in a reversal of roles. I was chairman of the National Commission on the Public Service -- a group of men and women with long service in both Democratic and Republican administrations deeply disturbed by the strong evidence of eroding trust in government. In that capacity, I received a request from then Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Associate Justice Stephen Breyer to appear before the commission. They urgently wanted to express their concern about the erosion in judicial compensation and the impact it was having on recruiting and keeping federal judges. Now, that concern has been forcibly reiterated and amplified by present Chief Justice John Roberts in his annual report on the judiciary.

No one, not the two chief justices, not their judicial associates, not I, not my fellow commissioners, certainly not the American public or its elected representatives, argue that judicial salaries need to approach those of successful legal practitioners in the private sector (it has recently been reported that remuneration of partners in the nation's large law firms now typically exceeds $1 million a year). At the other extreme, it is surely anomalous that federal district court judges make less than the salary plus bonuses of newly minted lawyers in those same prestigious firms in New York, Washington and other big city firms.

The judiciary should -- and historically has -- drawn upon distinguished academics or lawyers serving in different branches of government. Others, over a long career in private practice, have attained financial independence while family responsibilities have diminished. But even among those groups, compensation has become a relevant consideration. More acutely, there are the active practitioners in private law "at the top of their game" -- men and women potentially attracted to public service but with families to raise -- unable or unwilling to accept so small a fraction of their current and potential earnings. And, in fact, the number of appointees from those ranks has been declining.

So what is the reasonable level of judicial compensation? Consider the district courts where the greatest number of judgeships are. While judges cannot expect to equal the salaries of partners in large law firms, the National Commission determined that their compensation should be comparable to that of law school deans, senior professors and other nonprofit leaders. Today, at $165,200, district judge salaries fall more than 50% below what many law school deans or their top professors make. Moreover, unlike those academics and the leaders of nonprofit institutions, there is very limited possibility of earning other income.

And consider this: if the salary of district court judges had increased from their actual salary in 1969 by the same percentage as the total percentage change in American worker wages from 1969 to 2006, district judge compensation would be $261,300. That number is consistent with the recommendation of the National Commission on the Public Service.

Three years ago, the National Commission on the Public Service pointed to judicial pay as "the most egregious example of the failure of federal compensation policies." That failure was not been repaired; Congress did pass legislation in 1999, effective Jan. 20, 2001, to double the president's salary to $400,000 from $200,000. Now, at long last, my sense is that Congress and the president may finally be prepared to take a new look at judicial salaries, to deal with the political resistance and to recognize what is ultimately at stake.

The truth is there should be no shortage of men and women interested in federal judgeships. Those positions satisfy an urge for public service. They convey (or should convey) a sense of honor and prestige in the community. They can (or should) provide along with intellectual stimulus a sense of independence conveyed by lifetime appointment and financial stability.

The authors of the Constitution took care to protect those qualities by providing a reasonable assurance of financial security for our federal judges. Plainly, the time has come to take heed of the deep concerns of two chief justices and to honor the constitutional intent.

Mr. Volcker was chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1979-1987 and twice chaired a National Commission on the Public Service.

ABA Should Keep Judges Clean (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSN. is having some sound second thoughts about weakening a key provision of its Model Code of Judicial Conduct, which traditionally has served as a guide to state court systems in setting their own ethics rules.

An ABA drafting panel had been criticized — including by this editorial page — for proposing changes that would have diluted a provision saying that judges should avoid even the "appearance of impropriety." But now the panel is expected next week to accept a "friendly amendment" to its own proposal at an ABA meeting in Miami, one that would undo the damage.

Canon 2 of the current ABA code says that judges "shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities." The panel's proposed revision would have kept the admonition about avoiding the appearance of impropriety, but it would have added language suggesting that a judge could be disciplined only if he committed an actual impropriety. The effect would have been to make the "appearance" provision nonbinding.

Advocates of the proposed change had argued that "appearance of impropriety" was too spongy and subjective a standard. But the current code makes it clear that "the test for appearance of impropriety is whether the conduct would create in reasonable minds a perception that the judge's ability to carry out judicial responsibilities with integrity, impartiality and competence is impaired."

That language is adequate to protect judges from being punished for behavior that only an eccentric or self-interested individual would find suspicious. It tracks language in California's Code of Judicial Ethics saying that "a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities."

Critics of the proposed rule change, such as the American Judicature Society, acknowledge that judges are usually removed or disciplined for conduct that goes beyond creating an "appearance" of impropriety. But the "appearance" language has served the additional purpose of making judges think twice about potentially compromising situations and err on the side of preserving public confidence in the court.

Avoiding the appearance of impropriety should remain a commandment for judges, not be demoted to a mere suggestion. The ABA should make clear next week that it has gotten that message.

OTHER NEWS:

Investors Are Showing Unease About The Climb In Blue Chips (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Investors have been floating in a steadily rising sea of tranquility for seven months.

That is what the stock market has looked like since July, and, in some ways, since the spring of 2003.

But investors, a nervous lot, are getting uneasy. They are worrying that things have been too good for too long, which helps explain why the market turned a little jittery this past week.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back 72.66 points, or 0.57%, to 12580.83 in the week that just ended, including a decline of 56.80 points, or 0.45%, Friday. The blue-chip average still is up almost 1% for the year.

Despite the week's small decline, the Dow hasn't shown much weakness in months. It remains less than 95 points below its latest record close, 12673.68, hit Feb. 1. It is up 17% since July 14, and has seen 27 record closes since the start of October.

What really has startled market analysts is that, since last summer's turbulence, neither the Dow nor the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has fallen as much as 2% from a high. That seven-month period is the Dow's longest without a 2% pullback since 1954. In fact, it is the second-longest since the average was launched in 1896, according to Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. It is the third-longest such period ever for the S&P 500.

By other measures, this resilience has been a characteristic of the current bull market. Neither the Dow nor the S&P has fallen as much as 10% from a high since the spring of 2003. That is the second-longest period either has gone without a 10% "correction." (The longest was during the 1990s.)

The current bull market -- defined as a period without a 20% decline -- dates from 2002, making it the sixth-longest in history for either index.

Such resilience is a sign of strength, but it can't last forever. That is why many analysts think the market is overdue for at least a 10% correction. The market's unnatural calmness "is a cause for concern, but it is not in and of itself a reason to get out of the market," said Tim Hayes, Ned Davis's chief investment strategist.

The S&P 500 Friday fell 0.71%, or 10.25 points, to 1438.06, still up 1.4% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 1.16% Friday, or 28.85 points, to 2459.82, ahead 1.8% in 2007.

Weighing on the market Friday, Micron Technologies said it was hurt by a decline in memory-chip prices. BMC Software issued a profit forecast that disappointed analysts.

Another problem was the continuing rise in crude-oil futures. After breaking $60 a barrel during the day, they settled in New York up 18 cents at $59.89, the highest finish this year.

Treasury-bond prices fell, and yields rose, after the presidents of the Federal Reserve Banks of St. Louis, Dallas and Cleveland suggested that inflation probably is under control, but didn't rule out the possibility of an interest-rate increase later.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.3% to 248.82.

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 14/32, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.784%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 121.68 yen, up from 121.08. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.3006 from $1.3039.

Fed Officials Still Wary Of Inflation Pressures (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Inflation pressures have clearly not moderated enough to quell Federal Reserve officials' repeated warnings they may yet have to raise rates again.

Several policy makers said Friday that while they are optimistic inflationary pressures will wane this year, they nonetheless stand ready to cure too-high price pressures with rate increases, if needed.

The Fed officials spoke ahead of testimony by Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who will go before committees of the Senate on Wednesday and the House of Representatives on Thursday, to deliver the central bank's semiannual report on the economic outlook and monetary policy. That highly anticipated address is likely to prove a defining event in shaping financial markets' expectations for interest rates over the next several months.

The Fed officials who spoke Friday counted one voting member of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee -- St. Louis Fed President William Poole -- and two who are not -- the Dallas Fed's Richard Fisher and the Cleveland Fed's Sandra Pianalto.

Mr. Poole told a group in St. Louis that he believes the current level of the Fed's overnight target rate is "well positioned." He said inflation "is likely to fall into a reasonable range this year."

But the veteran Fed official also said that "if we get an upside surprise on [gross domestic product] growth, then monetary policy may have to be tightened somewhat."

Meanwhile, Mr. Fisher said in Dallas, "I am pleased with the current direction of inflationary impulses." But he warned, "I wouldn't rule out further increases in the federal funds rate if inflationary winds gain the upper hand."

DOJ_NMG_0130926

Cleveland's Ms. Pianalto was also hopeful on inflation, saying the recent cooling in price pressures is an "encouraging sign." Still, she cautioned, "I am not yet convinced that the inflation trend is shifting down," adding, "some additional policy firming may be needed."

To a modest degree, Friday's speeches mark a small evolution in the thinking of the Fed. Through much of the final months of last year, policy makers argued that inflation remained the chief threat and that if it did not fall, monetary policy would need to be tightened. But over the past couple of months, price pressures have finally waned to a degree the Fed has felt comfortable in acknowledging that development.

Still, for observers, the implications of Friday's addresses for monetary policy are minimal. "The main take away is that Fed rhetoric isn't preparing the way for a shift to a neutral policy stance," said Michael Feroli, economist with J.P. Morgan Economics.

Bies Quits Fed, Gives Bush Second Vacancy (WSJ)

By Benton Ives-Halperin

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Federal Reserve governor Susan Bies, who has held her position since 2001, announced Friday that she will leave at the end of March.

The Fed said that she will not attend the March 20-21 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee.

Ms. Bies joined the board of governors in December 2001, and headed various committees at the Fed, including head of the Committee on Supervisory and Regulatory Affairs. She also spearheaded the Fed's efforts to update and modernize the Basel capital-management standards, dubbed Basel II.

Ms. Bies said she plans to spend more time with her family.

"Sue's invaluable contributions to both monetary and regulatory policy at the Federal Reserve have been aided by her unique perspective as both an economist and a banker," said Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, in a statement.

"I will miss her counsel and wish her all the best in her new endeavors," he added.

Ms. Bies, 59 years old, served in various capacities at First Tennessee National Corp. before joining the board. She also taught economics at Rhodes College and Wayne State University.

She is married and has two adult sons.

President Bush, who appointed all current members of the board, now has two vacancies to fill. Mark Olson stepped down from the board last summer to become chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Congressman's Imam Is Taking A Lead In Interfaith Efforts (NYT)

By Samuel G. Freedman

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS — On the evening after Minnesota's Democratic primary last September, Makram El-Amin picked up his ringing cellphone to hear the raspy, exhausted voice of Keith Ellison. The men had known each other for a decade, long enough for Mr. El-Amin to become the imam of a mosque in their North Minneapolis neighborhood and Mr. Ellison to win a seat as the area's state representative.

Now Mr. Ellison had survived a bruising campaign for the Democratic nomination for Congress and was headed into a general election. It was bound to include even more scrutiny and vitriol from opponents, based on his past in the Nation of Islam and his present as a Sunni Muslim.

So Mr. Ellison was calling, as Mr. El-Amin recounted the other day, not as a politician but as a congregant, seeking pastoral counsel.

"Be the person you've been all along," Mr. El-Amin recalls telling Mr. Ellison in the 20-minute conversation. "Be a public servant, not an Islamic spokesman. Keep the interest of all the people in the forefront. That's what Muhammad himself would do."

Two months later, Mr. Ellison won election, becoming the first Muslim member of Congress, and doing so in an overwhelmingly non-Muslim district. As for Mr. El-Amin, he was transformed into a congressman's imam, putting an Islamic imprint on the role of spiritual adviser played by such figures as the Rev. Billy Graham for Richard M. Nixon and the Rev. Jesse Jackson for Bill Clinton.

In his own public life, Mr. El-Amin has espoused a combination of liberal positions on affordable housing and the minimum wage and social conservatism in terms of self-help. These stances reflect his personal history, which like Mr. Ellison's includes a conversion from the Nation of Islam's black pride and black separatism to the color-blind, egalitarian theology of a traditional Muslim. And as an African-American, born and raised in this country, completely at home in its language and culture, Mr. El-Amin feels no timidity in joining the public discourse.

"We've always expected to be respected and accepted, and we've always been prepared to fulfill our responsibilities as citizens, as taxpayers," Mr. El-Amin, 36, said in a recent interview here. "If there's something we're uncomfortable with, we're going to say it. We're going to be involved in the political process. We say, 'This is the system and this is the way we get engaged.' "

In Minneapolis, Mr. El-Amin has also made a reputation for engaging across racial and denominational lines. He participated in several prominent interfaith events after the Sept. 11 attacks, becoming the visible face of Islam in a city whose religious landscape had long been dominated by Lutherans.

The imam went on to build an especially durable and important relationship with Rabbi Marcia A. Zimmerman of Temple Israel, a large Reform Jewish congregation. The pair jointly taught lessons on the linguistic similarities of Hebrew and Arabic, using etymology as a symbol of a shared Abrahamic heritage. When ground was broken last fall for an expansion of Mr. El-Amin's mosque, Masjid An-Nur, he invited the rabbi to say a blessing.

During the divisive election campaign last fall, as Mr. Ellison was being attacked as supposedly condoning anti-Semitism and international terrorism, Rabbi Zimmerman made a point of inviting Mr. El-Amin to the temple to lead a study session about "understanding our neighbors." It took place, quite deliberately, on Yom Kippur, the most sacred holiday on the Jewish calendar.

"He has always been insistent about being a peacemaker," Rabbi Zimmerman said of Mr. El-Amin. "He has a real desire to know people in other traditions. He has a true interest, and he asks questions with integrity. In our conversations, we're able to acknowledge our differences and our similarities."

Mr. El-Amin was born into a family and culture that emphasized segregation. His father, Charles, was not only a minister in the Nation of Islam — the movement colloquially known as the Black Muslims — but for a time was also one of the Fruit of Islam bodyguards for Elijah Muhammad, the sect's leader.

About the time in the late 1970s that the Nation of Islam sent Charles El-Amin to lead a mosque in Minneapolis, Mr. Muhammad died and his son, Wallace Deen Muhammad, left the separatist faith to embrace conventional Sunni Islam. The El-Amin family was one of thousands across the nation to follow that example.

Mr. El-Amin, though, retains his respect for the Nation of Islam's doctrine of black self-sufficiency. A married father of three children, he owns and operates a fish restaurant in North Minneapolis and helped raise $1.5 million from his congregation for the current mosque expansion. Several of his siblings work in real estate, and one brother, Khalid El-Amin, plays professional basketball in Europe after having starred at the University of Connecticut.

"We've hung on to the discipline we had, the sense of self-reliance," Makram El-Amin said. "We grew up hearing our father say, 'We have to have our own.' "

What he has disavowed is the Nation of Islam's theology, with its view of whites having been created by an evil doctor. Like Malcolm X, the most famous figure to break away from Elijah Muhammad, Mr. El-Amin made the hajj to Mecca among Muslims of every conceivable pigment.

None of that, it must be said, has stopped him from receiving pointed questions about Islam and terrorism or Islam and pluralism when he speaks to the Rotary Club or the Veterans of Foreign Wars or a local country club.

"I'm not offended that the American people want to know what we believe and why we believe," he said. "That's sensible. It's the mischaracterization that's irresponsible. If someone asks me why the reward for martyrdom is heaven with unlimited virgins, I have to tell him that's a complete myth."

On N.H. Trail, Bigger Is Better (BOS)

The Boston Globe, February 10, 2007

MANCHESTER -- New Hampshire has long cherished its role as the place where presidential hopefuls test the political waters by campaigning in diners and living rooms. This year, the candidates are choosing instead to go for the big splash.

The huge crowd that showed up to see Senator Barack Obama of Illinois in December -- an event that helped mark Obama as a political phenomenon -- may have pressured other hopefuls to prove their own appeal by drawing standing-room-only crowds.

Following big-extravaganza appearances last month by onetime senator John Edwards of North Carolina and a former New York mayor, Rudolph Giuliani , Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York is scheduled to speak today at a gymnasium-sized "town meeting" in Concord -- an event that filled up two days after it was announced and drew so much advance media attention that Democrats this week offered up interviews with people making signs for the event.

Meanwhile, Obama's town meeting scheduled for Monday in Durham is at capacity, with 2,500 free tickets handed out in eight hours. About 850 standby tickets have been given to those hoping to take the place of no-shows.

By contrast, Clinton's husband, former president Bill Clinton, drew small crowds during his early visits to the Granite State in late 1991 and was so unknown that he could stretch before a morning run outside a Manchester hotel without attracting much attention.

It may be partly the celebrity status of some of the candidates, fueled by an unusually high vigor among voters eager to find a winning candidate for 2008. But with almost a year to go before the first votes are cast, candidates in both parties are campaigning as though the primary were next week, not 11 months away.

"This is a campaign on steroids," said Peter Fenn , a Democratic consultant not affiliated with any of the presidential candidates. "These are things you do in the closing days of a primary or caucus, not a year ahead. It's like the arms race."

New Hampshire party officials and activists say they are pleased that so many voters are interested in seeing the candidates, a factor some said is pushing the contenders to hold huge events. But they worry that the trend could undermine the special nature of the primary, which has historically served as a testing ground by weeding out candidates who cannot win over voters by answering direct questions in small, intimate settings.

"Nothing can replace the small-town feel New Hampshire offers," said Representative Paul Hodes , Democrat of New Hampshire. Granite State voters take their role in the election process very seriously, preferring to meet candidates several times before making a decision, he said, and "you don't reach those people through advertising and hype. You reach them by talking to them."

Kathy Sullivan , chairwoman of the New Hampshire Democratic Party, acknowledged that the party itself is promoting some big events where candidates are invited to speak, including a large dinner next month. But she said she is concerned about the way the campaign appears to be changing.

"It's no way to elect a president," Sullivan said of the big-ticket appearances. "The thing about New Hampshire is that people really do want to take the time. They really do want to see all of the candidates."

Representative Carol Shea-Porter , Democrat of New Hampshire, said she cannot fault the candidates for wanting to connect with as many voters as possible. But she said candidates will eventually have to do the diner and barbershop circuit. "That is what has been such a good vetting process" for presidential hopefuls, Shea-Porter said.

In previous presidential cycles, candidates sat in New Hampshire living rooms discoursing, often in mind-numbing detail, about their plans for a host of problems. Former president Clinton and former senator Bob Kerrey of Nebraska were adept at citing nuances of their plans for universal health insurance. Former senator Paul E. Tsongas , a Massachusetts Democrat, would read from his treatise "A Call to Economic Arms," which laid out his approach to global economic competitiveness.

The current crop of candidates has focused largely on touting standings in the polls and the endorsements snagged -- a message Sullivan said would not be enough for New Hampshire voters.

"If I actually was going to ask [a candidate] a question, I would not ask, 'How are you going to win?', and '[Do you] have enough money?' " to campaign, but " 'Why do you want to take this job, considering how bad things are and how much worse they will be a year from now?' " Sullivan said.

DOJ_NMG_0130929

Such questions may get asked at a large event, by one of the few attendees lucky enough to reach a microphone after the candidate has stopped speaking. But they don't trigger the kind of conversations that Arkansas' former governor, Mike Huckabee, whose campaign for the Republican presidential nomination has gotten little media attention, was having yesterday at the Merrimack restaurant in Manchester, a traditional setting for retail politics.

"What's good about New Hampshire is you're not going to let someone buy themselves the presidency," Huckabee said between chats with diners.

Spokesmen for the campaigns planning the big events said they have been driven by unusually high interest from the media and the voters. The novelty of a female candidate and an African-American candidate has also attracted attention, they said, making it harder to keep events small.

Clinton, for example, is attending several "house parties" tomorrow, and just a few reporters will be permitted inside.

But even at a large town meeting, voters can ask questions, fulfilling the Granite State's tradition, said Jim Demers , a New Hampshire-based adviser to Obama. And the candidates say they plan to move on to smaller crowds after the initial flurry of post-announcement campaign activity wanes, their spokesmen said.

"There's tremendous energy among the grass roots" that is attracting huge crowds early on, said Phil Singer , a Clinton spokesman. But "Senator Clinton wants to get up close and personal," conducting a more traditional New Hampshire-style campaign, he said.

Would Obama Be "The Black President"? (LAT)

By Peter Wallsten

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

CHICAGO — Illinois state Sen. Rickey Hendon served eight years alongside Barack Obama in the state Capitol and plans to endorse him today when Obama launches a bid for the White House. But that does not mean Hendon has set aside the long-simmering doubts that he and other black leaders hold about a man who could become the first African American to occupy the Oval Office.

"I can endorse someone now and change my mind next week," Democrat Hendon said from Springfield, Ill., where U.S. Sen. Obama (D-Ill.) will kick off his campaign at the old state Capitol. "I'm going to look at how he runs his campaign. I'm going to look closely to see if he raises the issues that are important to my people."

For many black activists in Obama's adopted home state, who might be expected to form the core of his political base, a central question still looms about the man who has risen speedily over 11 years from state lawmaker to U.S. senator to a sensation in the 2008 presidential campaign: As he works to appeal to voters across the nation, will Obama stand firm for black people and black causes?

Some of the questions arise from Obama's upbringing in Hawaii, remote from the urban struggles of Chicago's black neighborhoods, and from his heritage as the son of a white American mother and black Kenyan father.

Obama is like a "plaid quilt" in which people of different races see themselves, said Eddie Read, chairman of the Black Independent Political Organization. He fears this may leave Obama insufficiently committed to fighting for the black community.

"He would not be the black president. He would be the multicultural president," said Read. "A black president would fight for black economic and political power."

Obama's appeal to white voters leaves some black activists questioning the depth of his links to the black community, said Conrad Worrill, director of inner-city studies at Northeastern Illinois University.

"When white folks begin to put their arms around a black person, there's always suspicion," he said. "The question is: Will this generation of new, college-trained beneficiaries of the black political power movement in America fight for black political interests?"

The debate over how to regard Obama was on display in Washington last week, on the sidelines of Democratic National Committee's winter conference. One of Obama's closest black supporters called a meeting of African American activists to encourage support for him.

DOJ_NMG_0130930

Illinois Senate President Emil Jones Jr., a longtime Obama political patron, told the crowd of about 80 that they should support "our son" and that they did not "owe anything to anyone" — a comment widely viewed as aimed at Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), whose husband, President Clinton, remains intensely popular in the black community.

In a later response, the Rev. Al Sharpton questioned why blacks should back Obama simply because of his race. Sharpton argued that Obama himself recently endorsed Chicago's white mayor for reelection, over at least two black challengers.

"You really don't want to nationally say that blacks should do something for Obama that he himself is not doing at home," Sharpton told CNN. He continued: "I think what is intelligent and respectful to our community, as in any community, is to talk our interests and our issues."

In an interview to be broadcast Sunday, Obama acknowledged that he had become the "focal point" of a national discussion on race. He rejected the suggestion that he had not lived the black experience.

"If you look African American in this society, you're treated as an African American," he told CBS' "60 Minutes." "It's interesting, though, that now I feel very comfortable and confident in terms of who I am and where I stake my ground."

Obama has written extensively about his struggle with racial identity. In his bestselling memoir, "Dreams From My Father," he reflected on his feelings as an outsider when he first arrived in Chicago in 1984, just after the mass movement that made Harold Washington the city's first black mayor.

"Had to be here before Harold to understand what he means to this city," Obama recalled an older black barber telling him.

Obama went on to work in the black community, as an organizer, voter registration worker and civil rights lawyer. But tensions between Obama and black leaders in Chicago date to his earliest days as a politician, in 1996, when he angered many in the community by elbowing aside a popular leader in his successful bid for the state Senate.

He began that race as the favored candidate, a charismatic young civil rights lawyer armed with the endorsement of the incumbent state senator, who was leaving to run for Congress. But when that incumbent, Alice Palmer, a beloved fixture in Chicago's South Side, changed her mind about leaving the Illinois Senate, Obama refused to end his candidacy.

Tensions ran high when some of Chicago's most influential black leaders confronted Obama and pressed him — unsuccessfully — to bow out.

"It was not a pleasant meeting," recalled Timuel Black, a political activist who at the time opposed Obama but now supports his presidential bid. "There were those, and I was one of them, who felt that this young man should let Alice continue on, since she had the seniority."

When Palmer tried to collect signatures to retain a slot on the ballot, Obama supporters challenged her petitions, and she was forced to fold.

Worrill, of Northeastern Illinois University, said he and others viewed Palmer's departure as "a loss" that many black leaders remembered vividly as they watched Obama's rise.

"We didn't know Barack Obama," said Worrill, who is also chairman of the National Black United Front, an activist coalition that calls itself part of the "black liberation movement." "Alice was a great legislator and an example of an activist out of the '60s and '70s and '80s who came out of all the fights we had been through."

Obama arrived in the state capital, Springfield, to a cool reception from his colleagues in the black caucus. Tensions simmered again four years later when he ran against another stalwart of the old guard of African American leadership, U.S. Rep. Bobby L. Rush, a former official in the Black Panther Party.

Rush crushed Obama that year. But, according to Jones, Obama learned a crucial lesson: He needed a patron.

With Jones' blessing, Obama took a leading role on legislation viewed as important to blacks. He wrote a bill requiring Illinois law enforcement agencies to collect data about the race and ethnicity of all motorists pulled over for violations, an effort to monitor racial profiling. He also pushed legislation requiring police to videotape homicide interrogations, a move designed to protect the innocent from forced confessions. Both became law.

When Obama ran for the U.S. Senate, he reached out early to Jones, who lobbied skeptical members of the black caucus to back Obama's bid and asked some of Chicago's wealthy black business leaders to give money.

As for Obama's initial rocky start in the state Senate race of 1996, Jones said he was glad his friend remained in the race.

"If he had dropped out, we wouldn't be in this position today to do something great," he said.

Obama's Path To Power Typical Of New Generation Of Black Political Leaders (AP)

By Sharon Cohen

AP, February 9, 2007

CHICAGO — Roger Wilkins was there at the dawn of the civil rights movement. He was there, fighting for the Voting Rights Act of 1965, marching in Washington with the Rev. Martin Luther King and so many other black heroes.

Barack Obama wasn't there. He was just a child in 1965.

But that's OK with Wilkins. In Obama and a new generation of black political leaders — a generation that never fought off Bull Connor's dogs, or desegregated lunch counters — Wilkins sees a promise fulfilled.

"They are what we wanted to happen," said Wilkins, a professor at George Mason University, as Obama prepared to launch his presidential campaign on Saturday.

"You're getting some of the real fruits of the civil rights movement. I don't view them as in opposition to us, but people born in 1961 see the world differently than people born in 1931 — and it should be that way."

Obama, 45, offers a portfolio — lawyer, educator, state lawmaker, U.S. senator — that reflects both a shifting landscape and a changing of the guard for black political leaders in America.

Decades ago, many black politicians shared similar roots: They studied at historically black colleges, became ministers, teachers and activists and made their names fighting racial injustice — braving death threats, police dogs and water hoses along the way.

These days, many black political leaders have similar resumes: They have Ivy League degrees and have worked as lawyers and legislators. They know their way around the towers of high finance and can raise money everywhere from Hollywood to Wall Street.

Their ranks include Cory Booker, mayor of Newark, N.J., a former Rhodes Scholar, Yale Law School graduate and Stanford football star; Deval Patrick, the new governor of Massachusetts who was the Justice Department's top civil rights official in the Clinton administration and counsel for Texaco and Coca-Cola; and Artur Davis, an Alabama congressman and Harvard law graduate, who like his former classmate, Obama, is eyeing higher office.

"What you're getting is black people who come into politics the way most of the white guys do — you're interested in public affairs, you go to law school, you do some local stuff, you run for office," Wilkins said.

Add to that "juniors" who've taken up the family business. They include Rep. Jesse Jackson Jr., the 41-year-old son of the civil rights activist and two-time presidential candidate, and Harold Ford Jr., who followed in his father's footsteps to the House. After losing a Senate race in Tennessee last year, Ford, 36, recently took the helm of the centrist Democratic Leadership Council.

Both men, incidentally, are products of St. Albans School, where Washington's mandarin families have been grooming their sons for leadership for decades. (Former Vice President Al Gore also is a graduate.)

PHOTOS: New generation of black political leaders

This younger generation is not without its own civil rights bona fides: Jackson Jr. — born while his father was in Alabama demonstrating for voting rights — spent his 21st birthday in jail after being arrested in an anti-apartheid protest. Obama was a community organizer registering minority voters in Chicago. Patrick worked for the NAACCP Legal Defense and Education Fund.

But when it comes to issues, younger black leaders don't always march lockstep with those who preceded them.

"They're less liberal than the earlier generation of black politicians," said David Bositis, an analyst at the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a black think tank. "That doesn't mean they're conservative."

Bositis said the younger leaders tend to be more business friendly. Some, including Booker, also are more receptive to programs such as school vouchers. The idea is attractive to many black constituents disappointed by the failures of big-city public schools.

Ron Walters, a political scientist at the University of Maryland, doesn't see any great generational split on issues but does sense friction on who speaks for the black community.

"Is it going to be members of Congress or civil rights leaders?" he asks. "That tension is going to be there as long as there's a black leadership class."

DOJ_NMG_0130932

Perhaps the biggest difference for younger black politicians is in the growth of opportunity.

"For an African-American politician born in the 50s or the 40s, Congress was the highest aspirational level," said Davis, the 39-year-old Alabama congressman. "That was the most that you could be if everything went well in your career, or possibly the head of a Cabinet office like HUD."

Civil rights hero John Lewis, brutally beaten during the "Bloody Sunday" voting rights march in 1965 in Selma, found a home in Congress, where he has served Georgia for two decades. Andrew Young, a minister and lieutenant of the Rev. Martin Luther King, became mayor of Atlanta and ambassador to the United Nations.

Julian Bond, a civil rights activist, was a longtime Georgia legislator. With his telegenic looks and mellifluous voice, he seemed destined for higher office — he did lose a congressional bid — but he said he sensed there was a limit to his political ambitions.

"I had no expectation — none at all — I could aspire to the U.S. Senate," said Bond who teaches civil rights at American University and the University of Virginia.

Bositis, the think tank expert, said some young black politicians now feel they have the experience and skills to reach beyond Congress.

"In terms of House races, the situation is 'been there, done that,'" he said. "They want to win statewide office. They want to be governor, senator and eventually president. ... They think that the opportunity is there."

But few have made the leap.

Michael Steele, the first black statewide elected official in Maryland, lost his Senate bid last year. But the 48-year-old former Republican lieutenant governor said younger black politicians are not going to "wait in line" to seek office.

"We're going to step outside of our comfort zone and push the envelope," he said.

Obama, from Illinois, is the only black member of the Senate and just the third in modern history, following Carol Moseley Braun, also of Illinois, and Edward Brooke of Massachusetts.

Patrick of Massachusetts is the second elected black governor; L. Douglas Wilder served a term in Virginia in the 1990s.

But the number of black members of Congress has grown dramatically in recent decades, largely because of redistricting that followed the 1990 and 2000 censuses.

Before that, most black members of Congress represented overwhelmingly minority districts in the North; the South had just a handful of black lawmakers on Capitol Hill.

The Congressional Black Caucus has tripled in size since the 1970s — it has 43 members — and Davis, the Alabama congressman, said in nearly half those districts, the constituencies are less than 60% black.

"As a practical matter," he said, "to get re-elected, you have to develop an appeal broader than just your race."

Cory Booker, who won the top job in Newark last year, said that's just as true in his heavily minority city. Nearly 40 years ago when Kenneth Gibson became Newark's first black mayor, he said, the feeling among many blacks was: "Let's get somebody who looks like us."

That attitude has disappeared, he said. "The black-white American landscape is no longer. We're representing more diverse constituencies," said Booker, who learned Spanish so he could converse with many Newark residents.

Mayors face tight budgets, shrinking job bases and demands that make skin color irrelevant, he said. "Even my black constituents are now saying we're not electing you because you're black," Booker said, "we're electing you because we want very specific things."

Black mayors also are nothing new: Over the decades they have presided in cities including New York, Chicago, Los Angeles and Philadelphia.

But City Hall and the White House are worlds apart.

Ever since Obama started mulling a presidential campaign, pundits have raised the inevitable comparisons to the Rev. Jesse Jackson's bids for the White House in 1984 and 1988.

But there's a vast difference in the two candidacies beyond the generation that separates them.

Jackson had never held political office before his campaign. Obama has served as a lawmaker on the state and national level.

DOJ_NMG_0130933

As a civil rights activist, no one expected Jackson to be the Democratic nominee, Bositis said, but Obama "is not going to be running to make a statement. He is going to be running to win."

Can he?

Race alone won't harm Obama's chances, Bositis said. "I wouldn't say the playing field is even but it is even enough," he said, "and if he's the exceptional candidate that many people think he is, he could be elected."

Obama Ready To Throw Hat (CHIT)

By Rick Pearson, Ray Long

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2007

SPRINGFIELD -- The last time Barack Obama delivered a formal address in Illinois' state capital, it was to mark the opening of the Abraham Lincoln Presidential Library and Museum where he hailed the 16th president as a man who "did not equivocate or duck or pass the challenge on to future generations."

Nearly two years after that address, and using the home of Lincoln's famed "House Divided" speech as a backdrop, Obama was expected Saturday to make formal his historic entry into the 2008 presidential campaign, presenting himself as a symbol for a new generation of leadership and politics.

The circumstances surrounding the announcement by the state's 45-year-old junior Democratic senator--launching a three-day wave of campaign events in Iowa and New Hampshire with a Chicago fundraiser in between--are heavily tinged in symbolism for the first black candidate with a realistic chance of obtaining the broad-based support necessary for securing a major party presidential nomination.

Most immediately, to counter complaints he lacks experience with only two years in the U.S. Senate, Obama planned to open his campaign not far from where he served for eight years in the Illinois General Assembly, where his tenure was notable for his comity and willingness to reach across the aisle.

But in a larger sense, Obama's formal announcement, scheduled for a chilly outdoor makeshift stage at the Old State Capitol on the weekend before Lincoln's birthday, was aimed at assimilating the greater imagery of Lincoln that looms over Springfield, of a man who sought to heal a nation at war with itself, its populace sharply divided.

"At a time when image all too often trumps substance, when our politics all too often feeds rather than bridges division, when the prospects of a poor youth rising out of poverty seem of no consequence to the powerful, and when we evoke our common God to condemn those who do not think as we do, rather than to seek God's mercy for our own lack of understanding--at such a time it is helpful to remember [Lincoln]," Obama said in helping to open the Lincoln museum in April 2005.

While the hype leading up to Obama's announcement has grown exponentially during the past two years, even he recognized in that speech that "Lincoln reminds us that our essential greatness is not the shadow of sophistication or popularity, or wealth or power or fleeting celebrity. It is the tree that stands in the face of our doubts and fears and bigotries, and insists we can do better."

But celebrity has been beneficial to Obama's political aspirations, an outgrowth of the national stage that beckoned following his keynote address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention. A recent CNN/WMUR poll of New Hampshire Democratic primary voters found 67 percent of them holding a favorable impression of him--slightly below the 74 percent favorable ratings held by better-known rivals, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina.

With predictions that as many as 5,000 people would attend the Springfield announcement, along with 500 members of the media, Obama's entry into the race would represent a heady personal and political evolution for a man who just over two years earlier handled mundane constituent inquiries while pushing a largely liberal-inspired social agenda as a lowly state senator from Chicago's South Side.

Obama, whose lone political loss was in a 2000 congressional bid before winning the U.S. Senate seat four years later, addressed his aggressiveness in seeking higher political office in his recent book, "The Audacity of Hope." He said he had the flaw of "chronic restlessness," something that was endemic to Americans but "nowhere more evident than in the field of politics."

Illinois Senate President Emil Jones (D-Chicago), who has played an acknowledged political mentoring role from Obama's days as a community organizer in Chicago's Roseland neighborhood and the Altgeld Gardens public housing project, said he felt "like a father would feel about his kids" over Obama's presidential aspirations.

"He's able to bring people together, and that's what's going to be very important--to bring people together for a common goal," Jones said. Noting the intangible quality of charisma that every candidate seeks to possess, Jones said, "Some people have it and some don't, you know? And he has it."

Some Republicans who served in the Illinois Senate with Obama credit him for his pragmatic and diligent work ethic, particularly under the confines of a GOP majority that worked to stifle Democratic-backed legislation during much of his tenure in the legislature.

"While Barack had principles, he was, importantly, practical and realistic," said state Sen. Kirk Dillard (R-Hinsdale), who also is the GOP chairman of DuPage County, long the home of one of the state's highest Republican vote totals.

"Many of the same qualities that make Sen. Obama a national superstar--intelligence, charm and an ability to get along with all types of factions--were put to the test in Springfield in his early years," Dillard said. "Barack had tremendous respect from Republicans as well as Democrats, and for those of us who were lucky enough to work with him before he became a national celebrity, none of how America's media has characterized him surprises us."

Obama scored successes on key, and controversial, pieces of legislation, taking on such issues as requiring reform of the state's problem-fraught death penalty system, tracking and combating racial profiling by law enforcement, imposing tougher governmental ethics rules and mandating the videotaping of criminal confessions.

Though Obama has sought to downplay the role of race in a presidential candidacy, his decision to announce his intentions in Springfield represented an attempt to capture some of the state capital's history beyond its obvious connections to Lincoln and the racial strife associated with the Civil War.

The nation's reaction to the city's race riots of 1908, in which two blacks were lynched and scores of others were injured or fled Lincoln's hometown, led to the founding of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The city's housing stock remains largely segregated and racial problems persist.

"In my mind, this is the culmination of a lot of young people's dreams, seeing a man of color stepping forward to run for president who actually has a realistic chance of winning," said Springfield Ald. Frank McNeil, an African-American. "Just like Lincoln, he's saying there is a brighter future out there if we can all come together."

In using the Old State Capitol to embark on his race for the Democratic nomination, Obama would seek a link to its history as the site of the state Republican convention of 1858, where Lincoln warned that the issue of slavery that wracked the national conscience threatened the country's future.

A century and a half after Lincoln noted that "a house divided against itself cannot stand," Obama finds himself attempting to lead a country torn by the moral and political conundrum of war.

Harold Holzer, a nationally renowned Lincoln scholar and a co-chairman of the federal panel charged with commemorating the bicentennial of Lincoln's 1809 birth, said he did not believe it a daunting risk for Obama to try to appropriate from one of the nation's greatest presidents. Instead, Holzer said he believed an Obama candidacy, as well as those of Clinton and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson, represent a "manifestation of what Lincoln called 'unfinished work.'"

"Lincoln's design for a better society is manifesting itself with a Latino, a woman and a person of color running for the presidency of the United States," Holzer said. "It sends the message, 'We've come a long way, baby.'"

Obama To Announce 2008 Plans In Illinois (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. (AP) - Democratic Sen. Barack Obama plans to stand outside Illinois' Old State Capitol on Saturday, a building indelibly linked to Abraham Lincoln, and tell the world about his 2008 presidential plans.

In a video preview announcement on his presidential exploratory committee's Web site, Obama said he's humbled by the enormity of the task ahead and urged supporters to get involved. "Tomorrow, we begin a great journey. A journey to take our country back and fundamentally change the nature of our politics," Obama said.

DOJ_NMG_0130935

For Obama, it will be the start of a long weekend of rallies and events that will take him from Springfield to Iowa and then on to Chicago before he wraps up Monday in New Hampshire.

Obama will be able to evoke a long list of positive images during his speech. He could remind people that Lincoln served as a legislator there. He could note Lincoln's role in ending slavery and ultimately making it possible for a black politician to run for president.

Obama might mention his own eight years as a state senator in Springfield, or talk about the city's Main Street values and common sense.

But don't expect him to mention some other pieces of the city's heritage: a race riot, government corruption, even a brush with cannibalism.

Still, Obama's decision to make his presidential announcement in Illinois' capital city - instead of another location like Chicago, where he lives, or in Washington - earned him accolades Friday.

It also continued to feed the comparisons between Obama and Lincoln, the nation's 16th president. Lincoln served eight years in the Illinois legislature and two years in Congress. Obama served eight years in the state Senate and now has spent two years in the U.S. Senate.

"There is a terrific Lincoln aura around that site and the city," said local historian and author Taylor Pensoneau. "By picking Springfield as opposed to Chicago, it goes along with the attempt to push this almost fairy tale aspect of the whole Obama political explosion."

Even some of Springfield's biggest fans admit that Americans know little about the city beyond its Lincoln connections. If they have any impression, it's probably of a pleasant, nondescript midwestern city.

"It's Every Place," said Curtis Mann, manager of the local library's Sangamon Valley Collection.

Still, Springfield has had dark moments, including its share of Illinois' famously corrupt politics.

When one state official died, a shoebox was found among the personal items in his Springfield hotel room - inside was $800,000 in cash. A state auditor embezzled at least $2.5 million. The last Illinois governor was convicted on a variety of corruption charges in 2006.

Springfield also has struggled with race.

Its police department is embroiled in a discrimination lawsuit right now. City government was overhauled in the 1980s because of a voting rights case.

Most famously, though, it was the scene of lynchings and rioting in 1908 that helped inspire the creation of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People.

A black barber was shot and hanged from a tree, where his body was riddled with more bullets. An 84-year-old shoemaker had his throat slashed and, still alive, was hanged. Black-owned homes and businesses were burned. The Illinois National Guard had to restore order.

"The outrage was tremendous," Mann said. National activists concerned about this and other incidents met in New York and ultimately formed the NAACP.

Obama may want to avoid thinking about another historic quest that began in Springfield, a westward expedition known as the Donner Party. Their wagon train became trapped in California's Sierra Nevada mountains.

Nearly half the party died, and some of the rest survived only through cannibalism.

Obama To Announce Run For Presidency (FT)

By Caroline Daniel

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

Barack Obama, the fresh face of the Democratic party, will formally announce his candidacy for the 2008 presidential nomination in Springfield, Illinois on Saturday.

Mr Obama's recruits there will pale in comparison with his virtual support group of devotees who have signed up to his cause on Facebook, the social networking site that has spread like wildfire among college-going youth since 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0130936

In the three weeks since Mr Obama created his exploratory presidential committee on January 16, a spontaneous online community group on Facebook "Barack Obama (One Million Strong for Barack)" has enlisted 244,225 members.

That makes it not only the fastest-growing Facebook group but also perhaps the most instantaneous creation of a political community of supporters for any presidential candidate.

Farouk Olu Aregbe, 26, a graduate of Missouri Western State University who created the group, said: "Quite frankly I have been surprised at how fast it has been. It has now become a hub." He aims to reach 1m by April 21.

The success of this spontaneous, viral, effort – which comes alongside another Facebook group, "Barack Obama for President in 2008", with 60,000 members – has sparked comparisons with Howard Dean's 2004 pioneering, internet-driven campaign of 2004.

At the heart of it was Meetup.com, an internet tool for community events. Yet it took Mr Dean 11 months for his group on Meetup to attract 140,000 members rather than three weeks to recruit 250,000.

Jerome Armstrong, an architect of Mr Dean's campaign, sees networking sites such as Facebook, the seventh most trafficked site in the US, as an untapped resource. "It wasn't around in the last presidential cycle...I've seen websites to get in touch with youth, but this is about spontaneous organising amongst themselves instead of relying on a campaign to reach out to them," he said.

Yet he still sees similarities between the Dean and Obama campaigns. In January 2003, Mr Dean e-mailed a group of 140 people from Meetup. "By sending them an e-mail, he validated it and encouraged the effort to happen. Obama just did a similar thing," he said, referring to how Mr Obama addressed 3,500 students at George Mason University at an event last week organised via the Obama for President group on Facebook.

Mr Obama told the student crowd that grassroots activism could help him reshape the political environment. But challenges remain in translating online enthusiasm into wider action. Online networking groups are prone to fads. There are also doubts about how helpful they might prove to a campaign since members' contact details are often not volunteered by participants.

Mr Armstrong said: "The barrier to entry is pretty low. You get online and within two clicks you have joined. It takes five seconds. The question is how to mobilise them beyond the two clicks thing." Even so, he said: "It can translate into something. Youth voted in the last two elections in higher percentages."

Other Democratic candidates have borrowed ideas from Mr Dean. John Edwards has sought to be the voice of the netroots, the progressive activists who organise through blogs. He announced his plans for 2008 with a video on YouTube.

Hillary Clinton is using slick webcasts to announce her campaign and the internet for fundraising. Peter Daou, her internet director, says 100,000 people signed up at the site in the first 48 hours. "We want to target certain nodes where information moves around, bloggers who are opinion leaders on certain issues. You will see more webcasts and see us working more with social networking sites."

Republican candidates have been slower to embrace the net. Rudy Giuliani's official website does not always work, offers a few press releases and no video.

While the online world matters, it still cannot compensate for personality. Mr Aregbe says he might drive four hours to watch Mr Obama make his announcement speech today.

Obama To Launch White House Bid (BBC)

By James Coomarasamy

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

Democratic Senator Barack Obama is set to officially launch his presidential campaign with a speech in Springfield, Illinois.

The 45-year-old is widely considered to be the first African-American candidate with a realistic chance of winning the presidency.

It is just two-and-a-half years since Mr Obama burst on to the national scene.

He delivered a stirring keynote speech at the Democratic party convention.

DOJ_NMG_0130937

His declaration that there was no white or black America, but a United States of America helped the son of a Kenyan father and a white Kansas mother win a seat in the US Senate that year.

And as it has turned out, it set him on a fast track to a run at the White House.

State senator

With his youth and mixed race background, Barack Obama promises a new type of politics.

He has pointedly chosen to launch his campaign on the very spot where Abraham Lincoln once denounced the divisions in America caused by slavery.

Unlike previous black presidential candidates, Mr Obama was not part of the civil rights movement, which makes some African-Americans wary of him.

His was an unconventional upbringing in Hawaii and Indonesia before he went to study law at Harvard and became the first black president of the prestigious Harvard Law Review.

Later on, after community work in Chicago, he entered Illinois state politics, serving in the senate there for several years.

Yet, with relatively little national experience and formidable opponents, not least Hillary Clinton, many question whether he can really secure the Democratic nomination, whether he has the depth of policy to match his undoubted charisma and ambition.

Mr Obama has tried to answer critics in recent weeks, introducing a bill that calls for the phased redeployment of US troops from Iraq.

But his speech here in Illinois will be closely watched for both its policies and its passion.

Undoing Obama: Inside The Coming Effort To Dismantle A Candidate (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 9, 2007

Barack Obama's free ride is ending.

The charismatic Illinois senator has enjoyed a lifetime of hagiography, starting with an 800-word story in The New York Times the day after his election as the first black president of the Harvard Law Review.

Now, Obama's about to endure a going-over that would make a proctologist blush. Why has he sometimes said his first name is Arabic, and other times Swahili? Why did he make up names in his first book, as the introduction acknowledges? Why did he say two years ago that he would "absolutely" serve out his Senate term, which ends in 2011, and that the idea of him running for president this cycle was "silly" and hype "that's been a little overblown"?

In interviews, strategists in both parties pointed to four big vulnerabilities: Obama's inexperience, the thinness of his policy record, his frank liberalism in a time when the party needs centrist voters and the wealth of targets that are provided by the personal recollections in his first book, from past drug use to conversations that cannot be documented.

Beginning with his announcement for president on Saturday, the long knives will be out for Obama from three directions: Reporters, perpetuating the boom and bust cycle of a ravenous media culture, will try to make up for fawning coverage of the past. Democratic rivals want to get him out of the way. And some top Republicans think the party would have a better chance with Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., as the nominee, since she is a known quantity while Obama can try to define himself as anything he wants.

Officials at the top of both parties calculate that Obama has risen too fast to sustain his popularity in the cauldron of a presidential campaign. Democrats talk of "vapid platitudes" that could produce a "soufflé effect" – an implosion as journalists and activists begin probing for substance behind Obama's appealing promise of "a different kind of politics" and "a new kind of politics."

"With a couple of pinpricks here and there, the whole thing could fall apart," said a Democratic strategist familiar with the plans of Obama's rival campaigns.

Says another top Democrat: "Once the shooting war starts, he's not going to be able to get away with these grand pronouncements."

DOJ_NMG_0130938

Obama's friend Donna Brazile, who has known him since 2002 because of their work together on children's issues, is staying neutral in the Democratic contest but says he's ready for the onslaught, contending that his press has already become more mixed. "He's laying a foundation and a framework," she said. "People are responding to his message and are tuning out all the polarization."

Even his name offers fodder for the critics. When he was growing up, his family, friends and teachers called him "Barry." Then as a young man, he started insisting on "Barack," explaining in a memoir published in 1995 that his grandfather was a Muslim and that it means "blessed" in Arabic. His dad, who was Kenyan, had gone by "Barry" -- probably trying to fit in when he came to the States, his son figured. On the campaign trail during his 2004 Senate race, Obama told reporters that "Barack" was Swahili for "blessed by God."

Whatever its origins, the exotic, multicultural name – so open to interpretation that some Irish folks he ran into assumed "O'Bama" must be one of theirs – is just one of the tools Obama has used to create a captivating narrative about himself as a post-partisan messiah for a nation weary of Potomac combat. The idea of Obama has created dizzying expectations for a senator who draws the largest spontaneous crowds of any American public figure since Colin Powell went on book tour. A cartoon doctor in The New Yorker even diagnoses a patient with "Obamania."

Obama was the crowd favorite at the Democratic National Committee meeting in Washington last weekend, offering remarks so lofty that most of them could have come from either party. "Our rivals won't be one another," Obama said as part of the parade of presidential hopefuls who spoke to the crowd. "And I would assert it won't even be the other party. It's going to be cynicism that we're fighting against."

But that is surely wishful thinking, because his rivals are getting ready to dig into him at public debates and forums, beginning with a labor-sponsored session in Carson City, Nev., on Feb. 21. Obama has said he'll leave Nevada three days before the event.

Obama, whose two massive books (both New York Times bestsellers) make it clear he is wise beyond his 45 years, knows what's coming. He writes presciently in the one published last year, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream": "Precisely because I've watched the press cast me in a light that can be hard to live up to, I am mindful of how rapidly that process can work in reverse." He recalls President Bush warning him privately during their first meeting in the White House: "When you get a lot of attention like you've been getting, people start gunnin' for ya."

Here's a capsulized look at the opponents' plans for undoing Obama:

1. Inexperience

It was only about two years ago, during a meeting with reporters at his Illinois campaign headquarters after his election to the U.S. Senate, that he ridiculed as "a silly question" whether he would run for president or vice president before his term ends in 2011. "I've never worked in Washington," he said. "I can unequivocally say I will not be running for national office in four years, and my entire focus is making sure that I'm the best possible senator on behalf of the people of Illinois."

As he told NBC's Tim Russert on "Meet the Press" after his election in 2004, "I don't know where the restrooms are in the Senate." Then last October, on the same show, he backed away from the pledge, saying it reflected his "thinking at the time" but that he had not thought about the idea "with the seriousness and depth that I think it required."

Asked on ABC's "Good Morning America" last month if his lack of foreign policy experience would hurt him in his White House bid, Obama replied: "My experience in foreign policy is probably more diverse than most others in the field. I mean, I'm somebody who has actually lived overseas, somebody who has studied overseas. You know, I majored in international relations."

Jim Wallis, the progressive theologian who founded Sojourners/Call to Renewal, says the senator has "a different kind of experience" than a typical candidate and said he has listened to Obama talk knowledgably and passionately about youth, the arts, politics, religion and business in small-group settings since he was an Illinois state senator and few people knew who he was. "There's an intellectual depth and personal depth and moral depth," Wallis said. "He's didn't say, 'Let me try these ideas.' He's been talking about them since he was the least famous person in the room."

2. Anemic Policy Record

DOJ_NMG_0130939

At the DNC meeting, Obama surprised some in the audience by seeming to scoff at the intricacy of public policy. “There are those who don't believe in talking about hope," he said. “They say, well, we want specifics, we want details, we want white papers, we want plans. We've had a lot of plans, Democrats. What we've had is a shortage of hope."

A former Democratic official in close touch with several of the campaigns said: "Downplaying the importance of specific plans and ideas seems like a really strange strategy from somebody who is clearly very smart, policy-wise, but hasn't established that with the broader public yet."

Aides to Obama say that his weekend’s three-day announcement tour in Illinois, Iowa and New Hampshire – including town-hall meetings, rallies and a house party – will focus on the broad, uplifting themes that were a hit at the DNC meeting.

He has said the nation must have “the will to pass health care for all by the end of the first term of the very next president of the United States,” and that is likely to be among his early proposals. “Audacity of Hope,” named for a sermon Obama heard back when he owned only one suit, sketches a possible health care overhaul designed to save money through lower administrative and malpractice costs so that a subsidy could be offered to low-income families. Immediate coverage would be mandated for uninsured children. The senator has also talked about an energy plan to “wean ourselves off Middle Eastern oil,” which could be an early proposal.

3. Liberalism

The senator is unabashedly more liberal than the centrist path charted by President Bill Clinton. Back in 1996, a Cleveland Plain Dealer reporter wrote that Obama – then the Democratic nominee from his state Senate district – sighed when asked about the fall election. “Bill Clinton?” Obama was quoted as asking. “Well, his campaign's fascinating to a student of politics. It's disturbing to someone who cares about certain issues. But politically, it seems to be working."

“Audacity of Hope” advocates civil unions for gay people (a position held by most national democratics), declaring tartly that Obama is not “willing to accept a reading of the Bible that considers an obscure line in Romans to be more defining of Christianity than the Sermon on the Mount.” He says he doesn’t “believe we strengthen the family by bullying or coercing people into the relationships we think are best for them – or by punishing those who fail to meet our standards of sexual propriety.”

He writes that Bill Clinton and conservatives turned out to be “right about welfare as it was previously structured.” He adds, “But we also need to admit that work alone does not ensure that people can rise out of poverty.”

4. Disclosures in His Books

A little-noticed disclaimer at the front of his 442-page memoir of his youth, “Dreams from My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance,” says: “For the sake of compression, some of the characters that appear are composites of people that I’ve known, and some events appear out of precise chronology. With the exception of my family and a handful of public figures, the names of most characters have been changed for the sake of their privacy.”

The disclosure calls into question the pages and pages of years-old dialogue that Obama recalled when he was writing the book, a frank and searching account of his effort to come to terms with issues of race in America, at age 33. Lynn Sweet, the dogged Washington reporter for the Chicago Sun-Times, spotted the disclaimer in 2004 and wrote one of the few critical stories every printed about Obama. “I say in the book it is my remembrances of what happened,” he told her in an interview. “I don’t set it out as reportage … read the book for what it is worth.”

It is immensely valuable as a Rosetta stone to a man who wants to lead the free world and who wrote rawly about his shame when he had referred to a Beaver Cleaver-like, argyle-sweater-wearing black friend as an Uncle Tom in order to try to ingratiate himself to more radical friends. But Obama, who would start his career in politics as a community organizer in Chicago, wrote that he also found solace in the autobiography of Malcolm X, with his “unadorned insistence on respect.”

The book also contains the admission about his youth: “Pot had helped, and booze; maybe a little blow when you could afford it.” He also uses a slang term to refer to casual sex, and quotes a vulgar term from a bull session about Malcolm X. His campaign says voters will appreciate the honesty and support him. The challenge for Obama will be to survive long enough for voters to have that chance.

Hillary: I Didn't Vote For War (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

DOJ_NMG_0130940

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 10, 2007

MANCHESTER – New York Sen. Hillary Clinton said yesterday her 2002 vote for a resolution authorizing the invasion of Iraq was "not a vote for a pre-emptive war," but instead a show of support for further United Nations weapons inspections.

The Democratic Presidential front-runner, who has been criticized by hard-line anti-war groups for not apologizing for the vote, emphasized that distinction in a telephone interview from Washington.

While fellow candidate John Edwards, a former senator, has apologized for his vote on the October 2002 resolution, Clinton again did not.

"I will let others speak for themselves," she said. "I have taken responsibility for that vote. It was based on the best assessment that I could make at the time, and it was clearly intended to demonstrate support for going to the United Nations to put inspectors into Iraq."

She said that when she explained her vote four years ago, "I said that it was not a vote for pre-emptive war."

A Clinton campaign spokesman later noted that on the Senate floor on Oct. 10, 2002, Clinton stated that her vote for the resolution "is not, however, a vote for any new doctrine of pre-emption, or for unilateralism, or for the arrogance of American power or purpose -- all of which carry grave dangers for our nation, for the rule of international law and for the peace and security of people the throughout the world."

In the interview, the former first lady said the Bush administration forced an end to the final round of weapons inspections and invaded prematurely. The administration is responsible for the current status of the war, she said, and for being "grossly misinformed" or for having "twisted the intelligence to satisfy a preconceived version of the facts" before the invasion.

"Either interpretation casts grave doubt on their judgment," she said. "If they were so intent on pursuing military action, a pre-emptive action, which I said at the time I opposed, against Saddam Hussein, then why on earth were they not better prepared and more competent in its execution?"

Clinton said Bush and his administration "have performed a great disservice to our men and women in uniform, to our country, to our vital national security interests in the region and to the ongoing struggle against Islamic extremists."

Clinton spoke with the New Hampshire Union Leader on the eve of her first campaign visit to the first-in-the-nation primary state. She is scheduled to talk to voters today in Berlin and Concord and tomorrow in Manchester, Nashua and Keene. She last visited the state in 1996.

Also yesterday, Clinton said she would campaign in New Hampshire even if the primary date set by Secretary of State William Gardner under a state law does not comply with the Jan. 22, 2008, date written into a new party rule by Democratic National Committee (see related story).

Clinton said she has proposed capping the U.S. military force in Iraq at the Jan. 1 level and has "voted for more than a year and a half to begin redeploying our troops out of Iraq."

She does not "at this time" support a cut in funding for American troops in Iraq. She backs instead a cut in funding for Iraqi troops.

"We have got to get their attention," she said of the Iraqi leadership. She said they "do not fulfill their promises" and make "worthless" assurances.

She predicted that if Congress were to approve a funding cut, Bush would veto it.

"I hate to say that," she said, "but I think that shows the level of stubbornness and rigidity that we are confronting with this President."

And what may have been veiled criticism of at least some of her Democratic opponents, Clinton said, "This is a very difficult situation we find ourselves in, and anyone who thinks there are easy answers or flip rhetoric that can be used is not fully appreciating the challenge that those of us confront who are trying to set up circumstances that will persuade the President to do what we all expect and want him to do."

Clinton did not say how she would have voted on New Hampshire Republican Sen. Judd Gregg's proposed nonbinding Senate resolution simply opposing any cuts in troop funding. She said she backed a resolution by Republican Sen. John Warner and Democratic Sen. Carl Levin to oppose the Bush troop "surge" while also opposing a funding cut.

Bush, she said, "has proven impervious to the election results, so we are trying to get the political support we need in the Congress" to pass a strong anti-escalation statement in a nonbinding resolution.

She said the breakdown of efforts in the Senate this week to pass the Warner-Levin resolution was the result of "a Republican strategic decision to try to divert attention from doing that very straightforward task of sending a clear message to the White House."

She supported even stronger measures, saying, "The President should have to get a new congressional authorization if he is going to move down this path."

Clinton said that after the United Nations Security Council supported sending inspectors into Iraq in November 2002, "Saddam Hussein was contained and there was no reason not to let the inspectors finish their job to find answers to the questions many people had."

She said Congress' authorization a month earlier "did not necessarily require the President to short-circuit the process to launch the invasion," adding, "The abrupt conclusion of the inspection process, I think, was a mistake."

She said an earlier Bush mistake came when he "diverted attention from Afghanistan and the war against al-Qaida and the opportunity to build a strong international alliance against extremism and terrorism" and focused on Saddam.

She said had she been President, "I think I would never had asked for" authority to invade Iraq because she would not have begun the war.

Elaborating, she said: "But once a President asks for such authority, you either vote to give it to him or vote to withhold it from him. If you look at the options that were available, giving the President authority to make it very clear to the security council, to Iraq and to the world that we were serious about forcing Saddam Hussein to comply with his obligations under various United Nations' resolutions and the agreement he entered into at the end of the first Gulf War was a reasonable policy.

"What was not reasonable was manipulating the intelligence, which we now know occurred, and refusing to allow the inspectors under the edict of the United Nations to do their work."

The Washington Post reported yesterday that a Pentagon inspector general had found that intelligence provided by a former undersecretary of defense to buttress the White House case for the invasion included "reporting of dubious quality or reliability" that supported the political views of senior administration officials.

"This unfortunately confirms what we've been discovering in the last three years," Clinton said, "that the administration never intended to let the inspectors complete their work despite assurances to the contrary and that they gilded the lily on the intelligence they had."

Clinton said, "If we had known then what we know now about both the allegations concerning Saddam's intentions and capacity and about our own government's intentions, we would never have had a vote, and if there had been a vote, I certainly would never have voted to give the President authority," she said.

Clinton To Compete In NH Primary, "Whenever It's Held" (NHUL)

By John DiStaso

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 10, 2007

Sen. Hillary Clinton said yesterday she will ignore her own national party's rules and campaign in New Hampshire even if the first-in-the-nation primary is set for a date that does not comply the party's predetermined calendar.

"I am going to compete in the New Hampshire primary whenever it's held," she said. "I'm excited about it. I want to be part of it. I want to do it the New Hampshire way."

The Democratic Presidential front-runner spoke to the New Hampshire Union Leader yesterday in a telephone interview from Washington on the eve of her first campaign visit to New Hampshire. Today, she is scheduled to hold town hall meetings with hundreds of prospective voters in Berlin and Concord. Her schedule for tomorrow includes house parties in Manchester and Nashua and a town hall meeting in Keene.

Clinton is sure to draw hordes of media from throughout the nation and overseas, just as Illinois Sen. Barack Obama did when he campaigned here in December.

DOJ_NMG_0130942

Obama today is scheduled to formally announce his candidacy in Springfield, Ill., and to visit New Hampshire on Monday. Clinton has set up a Presidential exploratory committee and has said "I'm in" the Presidential race. But she has not yet made a formal announcement.

New Hampshire Democrats battled with the Democratic National Committee last year as it pushed through a new rule to hold a caucus in Nevada five days after the leadoff Iowa caucuses and three days before the New Hampshire primary.

The DNC has a new rule effectively cautioning candidates they will lose delegates earned in any state that does not comply with its preset schedule. But New Hampshire's secretary of state has sole authority to set the primary date in accordance with state law, and he has made it clear he will not be swayed by any political party rule. He has indicated that because of the insertion of Nevada's caucus between the Iowa and New Hampshire events, he may set the primary date earlier than the Jan. 22, 2008, date set out by the DNC.

If he does that -- and he won't set a date until the fall of this year -- the DNC apparently expects its candidates to abruptly pack up and leave New Hampshire.

Clinton won't do that. "Whatever New Hampshire decides, I'll be there," she said.

Last summer, former President Bill Clinton said the DNC made the wrong decision and should "leave New Hampshire alone." He said the former first lady "has exactly the same feeling I do."

But Hillary Clinton would not say yesterday whether she agreed with the DNC's decision, which was based on an effort to give a strong early voice in the nominating process to a racially diverse state in the West.

"I'm not going to comment on that," she said. "I don't have any control over that. I'm just going to run the best campaign I can everywhere I have to run it."

Clinton has accepted an invitation to a Presidential forum in Nevada later this month, but she did not commit to appearing at an early April debate in New Hampshire co-sponsored by CNN, WMUR and the New Hampshire Union Leader. She said her schedule has not been set "that far in advance."

"This has started way too soon," she said. "I think it would be better for everybody to get a chance to take a deep breath, to get their feet on the ground.

"Most people aren't paying much attention to what's going on now," Clinton said. "I understand there is a lot of momentum to getting everybody out there and making this process speed up. But I think we should let the people catch up to the process, and we should let candidates get their sea legs."

Clinton was expected to fly directly to Berlin early this morning and then, after a town meeting at the city hall, fly to Concord for a town hall at the high school.

She also has private meetings planned with officials and activists. Tomorrow, she is scheduled attend house parties in Manchester and Nashua before hosting another town hall, at Keene High School.

Hillary Clinton Plans Visit To S.C. (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

NEW YORK (AP) -- U.S. Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton will make her first South Carolina presidential campaign stop on Feb. 19, state Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin said Friday. "We don't have any of the specific places yet," Erwin said.

Clinton's campaign did not answer its media line Friday evening and did not respond to a message left Thursday about scheduled trips for the New York senator.

Anticipation about visits from Clinton and Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois has taken attention away from other Democrats in this first-in-the-South primary state, including favorite son John Edwards, the former North Carolina senator who won the 2004 South Carolina primary.

News of Clinton's visit comes as Obama's plans to come to South Carolina became public. Obama will make stops in Columbia and Orangeburg Feb. 16 and 17, said Anton Gunn, Obama's new state political director.

Their arrival on the political scene creates problems for other candidates.

DOJ_NMG_0130943

U.S. Sen. Chris Dodd, D-Conn., will be in Columbia on Feb. 17 talking to Richland County Democrats before heading off to the state's rural eastern counties to campaign. But it's a safe bet much more attention will be paid to Obama speaking in Orangeburg, where 62 percent of the registered voters are black.

And it would be little surprise if Clinton draws more attention than Republican presidential candidate and Arizona Sen. John McCain, who will also be in the state Feb. 19 campaigning on Hilton Head Island.

For Lawyers, No Clear Favorite (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

In the last presidential election, John Edwards had the powerful support and deep pockets of the nation's trial lawyers behind him. But when the lawyers gather for their winter conference today in Miami Beach, it will be Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) delivering the meeting's keynote speech.

Edwards, a trial lawyer who became a senator and now a presidential candidate, will be there, too. But the North Carolina Democrat no longer has a lock on the backing of the lawyers. This time around he will be battling it out with others in the Democratic field, who are seen as sympathetic to plaintiffs and their attorneys.

"John is certainly respected by every trial lawyer in the country," said Joseph W. Cotchett, a lawyer from the San Francisco area who helped raise more than $33,000 for Edwards in the 2004 cycle. "Many people though are looking at the bigger picture here."

Thomas V. Girardi, a Los Angeles personal injury lawyer who helped raise more than $230,000 for Edwards as finance co-chairman of his 2004 bid, agreed. Girardi hosted a luncheon last month for Biden and said he intends to do the same for Edwards and for Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

In the last election, Girardi said, "Senator Edwards was a much better candidate for the issues we care deeply about." Now, Edwards, Biden, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Clinton "all are very positive in terms of the philosophical view," he said. "So you have a different situation with respect to our support."

Edwards continues to work hard to win over trial lawyers. "He's getting good support from them," campaign spokeswoman Jennifer Palmieri said. "I wouldn't read too much into the leanings of any one person."

Winning the backing of trial lawyers is a significant coup for Democratic candidates. The 55,000-member American Association for Justice, which advocates for trial lawyers, ranks fifth on a list of the nation's 100 largest donors since 1989, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. The group's members gave more than $27 million to political candidates during that period, with 90 percent going to Democrats.

Fred Baron, a Dallas-based trial lawyer who leads Edwards's fundraising efforts, as he did in the last campaign, said this year may be different, but support from the legal community has not softened.

"When we started four years ago, we really did rely very heavily on trial lawyers," Baron said. Now Edwards "has a much broader base of support than that one community."

Other Democratic candidates have worked hard to win support from trial lawyers. Obama has recruited Julianna Smoot, who served previously as Edwards's finance director and on the staff of the lawyers association. Biden's finance director, Chris Koerner, has also worked for the group.

Edwards was a principal beneficiary of the group's giving in the 2004 campaign. Lawyers' contributions accounted for almost two-thirds of the money he raised during the first quarter of 2003, when he surprised pundits and rivals by outraising the rest of the field. By the end of the campaign, more than $10 million had flowed to Edwards from lawyers, many of whom were plaintiffs' attorneys.

They were giving to one of their own. In the mid-1980s, Edwards developed a reputation as a skilled attorney who won significant damage awards for his clients. A North Carolina legal journal calculated that, in the two decades before he joined the Senate, Edwards won $152 million in 63 lawsuits.

His legal career made him a target for Republicans, especially when he became Sen. John F. Kerry's running mate in the 2004 presidential campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0130944

This time around, Edwards's aides say, he is expanding his base of support, also focusing on unions, antiwar activists and others. Baron said Edwards has seen an increase in donations from Wall Street, Hollywood and Silicon Valley.

"Money is coming from all areas," Baron said.

But the quest for lawyers' money has continued. Four years ago, Baron shuttled Edwards around the country on his private jet to introduce him to other lawyers. Now, Baron is working to reinforce Edwards's standing with some of his backers from the last campaign.

One of those is Greg Allen, who said he was won over by Edwards four years ago. Contributions to Edwards by members of Allen's Alabama law firm totaled more than $50,000 in the last cycle, and Allen remains an avid supporter.

"I like him and I trust him," he said.

But others, such as Todd Smith, a Chicago trial lawyer, say they are looking around. Smith's firm raised more than $12,000 for Edwards and donated $50,000 to his leadership committee in 2004. But Smith said he simply cannot ignore the work Biden has done on the Senate Judiciary Committee to fight proposals that aimed to shield health-care providers and other businesses from legal liability.

"Because of that long-standing, clear, unwavering approach, he's deserving of support," Smith said.

John Cooney, another Chicago lawyer whose firm directed more than $50,000 to Edwards's PAC, said none of the candidates "has demonstrated more loyalty to my clients" than Biden.

"In some years, there is one candidate who draws everyone's attention," Cooney said. "This year, there seems to be a plethora of very good candidates."

Former Iowa Governor Sees Organization Surpassing Rivals (AP)

By Mike Glover

AP, February 9, 2007

DES MOINES, Iowa - Former Gov. Tom Vilsack, trailing in most polls for the Democratic presidential nomination and even in his home state, said Friday his grassroots organization surpasses his rivals and will give him an edge in Iowa's leadoff caucuses.

"This is a marathon," Vilsack said in a conference call with reporters. "In essence you have to peak at the right time."

Vilsack said he's collected the backing of more than 1,100 key activists from throughout the state, and that it's such organizing that pays off come caucus time.

"As of today, we are the only campaign in Iowa that has field offices operating," said Vilsack, listing offices in Des Moines, Ames, Cedar Rapids, Davenport, Waterloo, Sioux City and Council Bluffs.

"They are fully staffed and fully operational," said Vilsack.

Jerry Crawford, a Des Moines lawyer and veteran Democratic activist, joined Vilsack's conference call. Crawford said he has supported the last five candidates who have won the Democratic nomination and that he's learned to ignore early polling in Iowa.

"The fact is that early momentum in the Iowa caucuses is fool's gold," said Crawford, noting that Howard Dean dominated polling and media attention leading up to the last caucus, only to fall flat on caucus night.

Crawford said Vilsack is focusing less on attracting attention and more on signing up real backers.

"It means going out and doing the heavy lifting of building up your organization and signing up supporters one at a time," said Crawford.

Vilsack's conference call came less than two weeks after New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton drew large crowds on her first visit to Iowa since announcing she'd run for president. And this weekend, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama will hold several events in Iowa after announcing his presidential plans in Springfield, Ill.

Clinton and Obama have far more money at their disposal and garner much more media attention than Vilsack. But Vilsack reiterated that his organizing will pay off, saying his backers come from all of Iowa's 50 state Senate districts and 94 of the 100 House districts.

"He's dramatically ahead organizationally, which is all I think that matters," said Crawford.

Congress Must Act On Iraq (WP)

By Tom Vilsack

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Think of the last time you were in a public place with 1,000 people -- a sports event, a Fourth of July parade, a concert.

Now imagine all 1,000 of those people dead.

If the number of American military deaths in Iraq in recent years is any guide, that's how many Americans will die in that country in the next year if Congress doesn't act immediately to take our troops out of harm's way in Iraq's civil war.

Now imagine the 5,000 more Americans likely to be wounded and maimed if Congress doesn't fulfill its duty to get our young men and women out of Iraq's war zone.

In each of the past three years, more than 820 American soldiers have been killed in the war. Given the increased violence this year, America is on pace to lose more than 1,000 soldiers in Iraq. Over 23,000 American soldiers have been wounded since the war began, nearly 6,000 each year. It is time for us to clearly say that our troops must be brought home now.

Military commanders in Iraq, the Iraq Study Group and the American people have all said the status quo is wrong. Further, the president's closest intelligence and military advisers state in the latest National Intelligence Estimate that Iraq is in the throes of a civil war and that the capacity of U.S. troops to influence the outcome is severely limited. This war will end only with a political solution -- not a military one.

Members of Congress have a constitutional and moral obligation to exercise their authority to stop funding President Bush's failed policy in Iraq. Not eventually, but immediately.

The war in Iraq and the president's mismanagement of our military resources have recklessly endangered our national security and depleted our military and National Guard units across America. By nearly every standard, the homeland security of our country has been weakened and compromised by the president's policies and a lack of congressional oversight.

It has been said that all our options in Iraq are bad, but some options are worse than others. Leaving American troops in harm's way while acknowledging that they have little to accomplish is the worst-case scenario. Congress has the ability to pull our combat brigades out of the most violent areas, maintain a strategic military presence in northern Iraq and bring the rest of our troops home now.

Nearly a year ago, I went to Iraq to hear firsthand from U.S. troops, military leaders and Iraqis.

This is what I heard from our military commanders: If the Iraqi government can't provide better security for its people in six months, U.S. troops in central and southern Iraq should leave. That time has now come and gone -- and so should our servicemen and women who are needlessly in danger.

Unfortunately, this administration refuses to listen to our military leaders or our citizens. So the question is: What will Congress do?

Congress has the constitutional ability and the moral responsibility to pass legislation cutting off funding for the status quo.

Not one soldier will or should be deprived of ammunition or armor.

A modest number of peacekeeping troops would temporarily remain in northern Iraq, protect civilians against sectarian violence, discourage Iran from border incursions and help maintain regional stability -- without recklessly endangering American lives.

As governor, I called 43 Iowa families after their loved ones had been killed in Iraq or Afghanistan. These soldiers and their families made a tremendous sacrifice to protect our freedom and help keep America safe. Make no mistake, our soldiers have done the job they were asked to do, and they have done it well. But too many of these patriots have made the ultimate sacrifice.

Supporting a cap on troops is really just support for staying the course with a failed policy. A toothless congressional resolution is meaningless. And a delay in congressional action will guarantee that more American soldiers will die.

Those who voted for the war, those who voted to continue to support the war and those who voted to continue funding the war can all surely vote to stop the war and do what's right for our military personnel and nation.

Not in 2008 or 2009, but now.

The writer, a former governor of Iowa, is a Democratic candidate for president.

Giuliani Shifts Abortion Speech Gently To Right (NYT)

By Ray Rivera

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

As he prepares for a possible run for president — a road that goes deep into the heart of conservative America — Rudolph W. Giuliani takes with him a belief in abortion rights that many think could derail his bid to capture the Republican nomination.

But in recent weeks, as he has courted voters in South Carolina and talked to conservative media outlets, Mr. Giuliani has highlighted a different element of his thinking on the abortion debate. He has talked about how he would appoint "strict constructionist" judges to the Supreme Court — what abortion rights advocates say is code among conservatives for those who seek to overturn or limit Roe v. Wade, the 1973 court ruling declaring a constitutional right to abortion.

The effect has been to distance himself from a position favoring abortion rights that he espoused when he ran for mayor of New York City, where most voters favor abortion rights.

"I hate it," he said of abortion in a recent interview with Sean Hannity of Fox News. "I think abortion is something that, as a personal matter, I would advise somebody against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose. I think you have to ultimately not put a woman in jail for that."

For Mr. Giuliani, a Brooklyn-born Roman Catholic who once considered entering the priesthood, the issue has been a source of discomfort throughout his political career, especially during his first bid for mayor of New York nearly two decades ago.

Now, as he courts voters in more conservative areas, Mr. Giuliani is turning to the same nuanced approach he used back then to explain how he can be both for abortion rights, while being morally opposed to abortion.

While Mr. Giuliani also faces obstacles for his stands favoring gun control and gay rights, perhaps no social issue resonates as deeply in the hearts of Christian conservatives as abortion.

In his recent travels, he has directed questions on the issue toward a discussion about judges, saying he would appoint jurists who believe in interpreting, not making, the law: judges, he said, like Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justices Antonin Scalia and Samuel A. Alito Jr., who he has said he believed would place limits on Roe v. Wade.

"On the federal judiciary I would want judges who are strict constructionists because I am," he said last week in South Carolina. "I have a very, very strong view that for this country to work, for our freedoms to be protected, judges have to interpret, not invent, the Constitution.

"Otherwise you end up, when judges invent the Constitution, with your liberties being hurt. Because legislatures get to make those decisions and the Legislature in South Carolina might make that decision one way and the Legislature in California a different one."

On the issue of a disputed abortion procedure called "partial-birth abortion" by opponents, he told Mr. Hannity that a ban signed into law by President Bush in 2003, which the Supreme Court is reviewing, should be upheld. And on the issue of parental notification — whether to require minors to obtain permission from either a parent or a judge before an abortion — he said, "I think you have to have a judicial bypass," meaning a provision that would allow a minor to seek court permission from a judge in lieu of a parent.

"If you do, you can have parental notification," he said.

Both appear to be shifts away from statements he made while he was mayor and during his brief campaign for United States senator in 2000. Asked by Tim Russert on "Meet the Press" in 2000 if he supported President Bill Clinton's veto of a law that would have banned the disputed abortion procedure, Mr. Giuliani said, "I would vote to preserve the option for women." He added, "I think the better thing for America to do is to leave that choice to the woman, because it affects her probably more than anyone else."

And on a 1997 candidate questionnaire from the National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League of New York, which Mr. Giuliani completed and signed, he marked "yes" to the question: Would you oppose legislation "requiring a minor to obtain permission from a parent or from a court before obtaining an abortion."

Mr. Giuliani's campaign aides say his positions on abortion have not changed, and that his stand on what critics call partial-birth abortions has been mischaracterized, saying he opposed a ban only if it failed to include an exception to protect the life of the mother. But the ban vetoed by President Clinton did include such an exception.

DOJ_NMG_0130947

Those who have followed Mr. Giuliani's career say he is unlikely to undergo a radical shift in his views in the manner of Mitt Romney, a Republican rival and former Massachusetts governor who advocated abortion rights until about two years ago.

Fred Siegel, author of "Prince of the City: Giuliani, New York and the Genius of American Life," said Mr. Giuliani would likely be careful to avoid anything perceived as a flip-flop on the issue.

"Part of his appeal is that he doesn't bend in the wind," he said.

But Richard Land, head of the public policy arm of the Southern Baptist Convention, said Mr. Giuliani's position was even more offensive than that of someone who believes abortion is morally acceptable.

"To say I think it's morally wrong, but I think it's a woman's choice is like saying I'm opposed to segregation but it ought to be left up to the store owner to decide," Mr. Land said. "That's a preference, not a conviction."

Rancor coming from both sides of the abortion debate is nothing new to Mr. Giuliani. When he made his first bid for mayor in 1989, he was widely considered anti-abortion. His stance immediately proved problematic in a city heavily in favor of abortion rights. New York was the first state to legalize elective abortions, three years before Roe v. Wade.

Early in the 1989 campaign, he told the city's Conservative Party leaders he was personally opposed to abortion and was for overturning Roe v. Wade, except in cases of rape or incest. At the same time he said he opposed criminal penalties and ultimately saw it as an issue of "personal morality."

The distinctions he drew were subtle to the point of producing conflicting news accounts in which he was alternately described as favoring abortion rights and anti-abortion.

The issue took on more importance that summer after a Supreme Court decision allowed states to put new restrictions on abortion. As criticism mounted, Mr. Giuliani remained silent for weeks after the decision. Finally, in late August of that year, he issued a statement seeking to "clarify" his position.

Where he previously asserted that he would stay away from efforts to protect or overturn the state abortion law, he now said he would fight moves to make it illegal.

Critics ascribed his switch to political opportunism. Chief among his critics were his rivals for the mayor's post, the incumbent, Mayor Edward I. Koch, and the eventual winner of that election, David N. Dinkins, both of whom accused him of heeding the advice of his campaign strategists over his conscience.

Mr. Giuliani defended his change, saying it was the result of deep introspection, not political expediency. "I had to spend time not only thinking about it, but talking about it with my wife and people close to me to focus on it in a closer way than I have in the past," he told The New York Times in an interview at the time.

"This is a guy who is a Catholic, who thought about going into the priesthood, he has close friends who are priests," said Mr. Siegel, "when he realizes he can't get elected in New York if you're anti-abortion and he begins to modify his position, and eventually he goes all the way to being in favor of later-term abortions."

Fran Reiter, who was a deputy mayor under Mr. Giuliani and played key roles in two of his campaigns, believes his acceptance of abortion rights was heartfelt, not a political move. After winning the mayor's office in 1993, he supported and strengthened legislation protecting women's access to abortion clinics.

The National Abortion and Reproductive Rights Action League of New York was so convinced, it remained neutral in the 1993 and 1997 mayoral races, and did so again when he briefly ran against Hillary Rodham Clinton for United States in 2000 before dropping out of the race.

"That tells you how strongly we felt, that we would actually remain neutral when he's running against the first lady of the United States," said Kelli Conlin, the state organization's president, who served on Mr. Giuliani's 1993 transition team and on several mayoral commissions.

Now Ms. Conlin and other abortion rights advocates, including Ms. Reiter, say Mr. Giuliani clearly appears to be distancing himself from his former positions.

"The term strict constructionists has become a transparent code word for nominating judges who would overturn Roe, and both sides know it," Ms. Conlin said. "I think this is a troublesome wink and a nod to the far right of the Republican Party, and that's not the Rudy Giuliani I know."

DOJ_NMG_0130948

Buddy Witherspoon, Republican National Committeeman from South Carolina, said Mr. Giuliani's recent appearance with party leaders there shifted his and some others' perceptions of the candidate, though not enough to satisfy the most socially conservative among them.

"All I'd heard from the media is that he was a moderate in support of abortion," Mr. Witherspoon said, "then I heard him say he did not support abortion, however he also said he did not think a woman should go to jail for having had an abortion."

State's Republicans Vet "America's Mayor" (SFC)

By Carla Marinucci, John Wildermuth

San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2007

Former New York Mayor Rudolph Giuliani has all the qualities of a Republican who could appeal to voters in blue-state California: He is pro-choice, pro-gay rights and a defender of stricter gun-control laws.

But those moderate positions on social issues rankle the GOP conservatives who represent the backbone of his party's activists here -- and who could pose a formidable roadblock as Giuliani begins a serious effort this week to expand his appeal in the nation's most populous state.

Giuliani is scheduled today to address hundreds of delegates at the California state GOP convention at the Hyatt Regency in Sacramento, marking his first major address since he announced the establishment of an exploratory committee for president.

In a three-day swing through the state, he will visit Silicon Valley for lunch with business leaders on Monday and will travel to the Central Valley for the opening of an agricultural expo in Tulare on Tuesday.

But his toughest assignment could be today's keynote before grassroots true believers of his own party. California's most active Republicans -- those who vote in primaries and, as importantly, provide the critical volunteer effort for campaigns -- are much more conservative than the former New York mayor.

Giuliani's early efforts to establish a base of support here come as California legislators have fast-tracked a bill that would move California's presidential primary earlier in the campaign, to Feb. 5, 2008. The move would cost an estimated $90 million, but is expected to give the state far more clout in deciding the presidential nominees.

"With an early primary, it's more than likely California will play a part in deciding the GOP nomination ... and Giuliani could have California as a bulwark," says Rick Jacobs, who heads the Courage Campaign, a grassroots political activist organization that supports the early primary.

Giuliani, 62, a consultant since leaving office, has not yet formally announced his presidential bid, although he has filed a candidacy statement with the Federal Election Commission and has been putting a campaign organization in place.

Outgoing California Republican chairman Duf Sundheim suggested in a roundtable with reporters this week that the former New York mayor could be a formidable candidate in California -- especially given the populist support for Republican Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, who has similar views on social issues such as same-sex marriage and abortion.

"Quality candidates win in California and candidates who can successfully appeal to a broad cross-section of people," Sundheim said. "We need on a statewide basis to develop candidates who can appeal to these broad coalitions.

"(The election of) 2006 shows that Arnold Schwarzenegger was able to develop a coalition that included 90 percent of the Republican vote. That shows you can take the positions (he) holds and be successful in California," Sundheim said.

In Giuliani's case, leadership issues such as national security and the war could trump social issues among grassroots voters.

Giuliani, who became known as "America's mayor" because of his inspiring performance after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks, "is popular among conservative voters because he has been shown to be a strong leader," Sundheim said. "Many soccer moms have turned into security moms, and Giuliani has tapped into that."

To expand his base, Giuliani has reached out to some key California conservatives, including Bill Simon, a former Republican candidate for governor and longtime friend who was at breakfast with Giuliani near Wall Street on Sept. 11 when the first plane struck the World Trade Center.

Giuliani also has won the support of other conservatives such as Steve Frank, publisher of California Political News and Views, a conservative Web site. Frank said Giuliani is the GOP candidate with the best chance of winning the White House against Democratic Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who increasingly appears to be the most formidable candidate on the Democratic side.

In talking with conservative groups, Sundheim has found that "there has been openness to Giuliani, and the degree of openness surprised me. Sometimes people are bigger than the issues. He's an authentic American hero, and people respond to that."

Bruce Cain, UC Berkeley professor of political science, said Giuliani has a chance to win a California GOP primary because of "the numbers of decline-to-state voters and independents here" who might decide to cast ballots in that race. "They could end up making the difference."

But Jon Fleischman, the publisher of the influential FlashReport.org, a GOP Internet publication that reaches many Republican insiders, said Giuliani will have to please conservatives in Sacramento first on the key issue of immigration.

"It's the No. 1 issue (for Republicans) in California by far, and if he comes out in support of a (President) Bush-(Sen. Edward) Kennedy immigration plan, he will be viewed with a lot of concern by conservatives," said Fleischman, campaigning Friday in the cavernous convention hall for the position of party vice chairman.

But "conservatives in the party are judging all three front-runners" -- Giuliani, Arizona Sen. John McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney -- "based on the fact that none of them really reflect the base," Fleischman said.

In California, mainstream and activist Republicans know that no matter whom their party picks as a nominee, "they will have to compromise," Fleischman observes, "because nobody wants Hillary Clinton."

Giuliani Fares Well For GOP Social Moderate (LAT)

By Michael Finnegan

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

As he dashes across California over the next few days, Republican presidential hopeful Rudolph W. Giuliani has more on his agenda than just raking up campaign money.

Today, he plans to work crowds of Republican activists at a state party convention in Sacramento. On Monday, he speaks to executives in the Silicon Valley. On Tuesday, he stops at a giant farm expo near Fresno. Along the way, he expects to announce new supporters, including former Los Angeles Mayor Richard Riordan, a Republican.

For the former New York City mayor, who met privately with GOP Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on Friday night, California plays an increasingly large part in his calculus for winning the Republican nomination. It is one of several big states on the verge of advancing their 2008 presidential primaries to Feb. 5, a shift that enhances the election climate for Giuliani.

Among other effects, the calendar change heightens the importance of celebrity, giving an edge to Giuliani and his best-known Republican rival, Sen. John McCain of Arizona.

Also, earlier contests outside the Bible Belt — most notably in California and New Jersey — could open the way for Giuliani, the only socially moderate GOP candidate, to gain momentum in the crucial opening weeks of the primaries. In other key states — particularly in the South — his liberal stands on abortion, guns and gay rights trouble many of the social conservatives who dominate Republican primaries.

Beyond geography, another dynamic working in Giuliani's favor now is the emerging mix of top-tier Republican candidates. Both of his chief opponents, McCain and former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, have their own frictions with social conservatives. And neither has focused on the moderates most likely to gravitate to Giuliani.

Giuliani's overall task still remains far from easy, but his candidacy is looking more plausible than just a few months ago.

"It's always going to be an uphill battle for a social moderate in a Republican primary, but there hasn't been a better opportunity for a candidate like Giuliani in decades," said Dan Schnur, who was communications director of McCain's presidential campaign in 2000 and is now unaligned.

Giuliani, who filed his statement of candidacy Monday, has already signaled his strategy: The former prosecutor casts himself as a tough-on-crime national-security hawk whose record of cutting taxes in New York shows a commitment to fiscal restraint.

DOJ_NMG_0130950

In a Fox News interview this week, Giuliani took credit for the sharp drop in New York homicides while he was mayor. Best known nationally for his steady command of New York after the Sept. 11 attacks, Giuliani vowed to stay "on offense against terrorism." And like McCain and Romney, he voiced support for President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq.

But Giuliani showed less willingness than his rivals to backpedal from positions that rile social conservatives, opting instead just to accent opinions that might ease their concerns.

"Where I stand on abortion is, I oppose it," he said on Fox. "I don't like it. I hate it. I think abortion is something that, as a personal matter, I would advise somebody against. However, I believe in a woman's right to choose."

He went on to praise three conservative Supreme Court justices: Samuel A. Alito Jr., John G. Roberts Jr. and Antonin Scalia.

Asked about gun control, Giuliani said it made sense in big cities but a "different set of rules" might suit suburban or rural areas. As for same-sex marriage, he acknowledged his long-standing support for gay-rights laws, but said three times: "Marriage should be between a man and a woman."

A twice-divorced Roman Catholic, Giuliani, 62, has a personal history that complicates his quest for support among culturally conservative Republicans. He announced his split from his second wife, Donna Hanover, to television crews without warning her, and she, in turn, accused him of infidelity in a wrenching news conference outside the mayor's mansion.

Giuliani's combative temperament, often an asset in New York politics, could also prove problematic on the national stage. In 1992, the year before he was elected mayor, Giuliani stunned many New Yorkers by shouting an obscenity at a raucous police-union rally to denounce policies of Democratic then-Mayor David N. Dinkins.

"Set your watch: He'll snap and he'll lose his cool before the primaries start," said the Rev. Al Sharpton, a Giuliani nemesis and a 2004 Democratic presidential candidate.

Former New York Mayor Edward I. Koch, a Democrat who voted for Giuliani twice, compiled a book of columns that he titled "Giuliani: Nasty Man." "There is a mean-spirited quality to him that comes out when he feels somehow or other he's not given his due," Koch said.

Giuliani advisors say his tough disposition shows strength of conviction, which they describe as an advantage in a presidential race for a candidate emphasizing the leadership skills that voters witnessed after the terrorist attacks.

"He's a straight shooter, and sometimes people aren't going to like what he has to say," said Mike DuHaime, executive director of Giuliani's exploratory campaign committee.

Historically, the job of New York mayor has been a dead-end for politicians aspiring to higher office. In Giuliani's case, his two terms as mayor create a "target-rich environment" for rivals rummaging for damaging material, said Chris Lehane, who was press secretary to Democrat Al Gore's 2000 presidential campaign.

"Issues that would have been just basic, accepted mainstream issues in New York City are not going to be seen the same way when you get to a living room in Sioux City," he said. "Did your Health Department give out needles? Did it give out condoms?"

Also posing risks for Giuliani are a tangle of business deals by his consulting and law firms, along with his close ties to former New York Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik, who pleaded guilty to accepting tens of thousands of dollars in gifts as a city official.

For now, Giuliani leads many polls of Republican presidential primary voters. But key questions remain. Most of all, will conservative voters turn their backs when reminded of his stands on social issues? Or have they already decided that fiscal and security matters outweigh their other differences with Giuliani?

"Whoever can figure out … how a cultural liberal, a center-left candidate, plays in the Republican nomination contest is going to get the political gold-star award," said Rich Bond, a former Republican National Committee chairman who supports McCain. "We've never seen it."

McCain Releases Financial Disclosure Report (WP)

By Matthew Mosk

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130951

Some land owned by Republican presidential candidate John McCain slipped in value last year, but the senator from Arizona remains a wealthy man, largely because of investments and holdings controlled by his wife, Cindy, his latest financial disclosure report showed.

All presidential candidates must file an up-to-date accounting of their finances with the Federal Election Commission. McCain released his forms late yesterday, and they show that little has changed since his last disclosure, issued in May. The forms allow him to report the value of holdings within broad ranges, making his net worth difficult to calculate with confidence. Previous reports have put it at roughly $15 million.

Most of that money stems from his wife, the millionaire daughter of an Arizona beer magnate. One tract of land McCain owns in Sedona, Ariz., was worth between $500,000 and $1 million in May, but now is listed as being worth between $100,001 and $250,000, the report showed. A McCain spokesman could not be reached last night to explain the disparity.

McCain also listed as income a 2006 deal to write a nonfiction book that is timed for release late this year. The book, whose working title is "Hard Call," is to explore "historically significant decisions" and the qualities that distinguished successful decisions from failures.

McCain Opens State HQ (GRPRESS)

By Dave Murray

Grand Rapids Press, February 10, 2007

GRAND RAPIDS -- Some of Michigan's best-known Republicans, including Attorney General Mike Cox and U.S. Rep. Fred Upton, threw their support Friday to U.S. Sen. John McCain's potential presidential bid.

Politicos in town for the Republican State Convention appeared at the opening of the state headquarters for McCain's exploratory committee, at 282 Leonard St. NW.

Cox, state chair for the committee, said all of the Republican party's presidential candidates are impressive. But he thinks McCain has a better chance at drawing national support than former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani or former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney.

Romney and Kansas Sen. Sam Brownback are scheduled to address the convention today. McCain and Giuliani are sending representatives.

Cox said he supported President Bush in 2000, when McCain handily won the state's primary. But he said the Arizona senator is the best person to replace Bush in the White House.

"Sometimes it's a matter of the right time and the right person," he said. "McCain is a scrapper, and the people of Michigan like someone who is scrappy."

Cox said Giuliani appears to be McCain's main challenger for the nomination at this point but said the former mayor is likely to the left of many Republicans, and he expects Romney, son of the former Michigan governor, to emerge.

"We can say that Giuliani is a great American, and he is," Cox said. "But he's not the guy who will carry us in 2008 to beat Nancy Pelosi and the rest of the Democrats."

Cox was joined by Ruth Johnson, the Oakland County clerk who ran for lieutenant governor last year, as well as state Sen. Wayne Kuipers, R-Holland; state Sen. Michelle McManus, R-Lake Leelanau, and former representatives Joanne Vorhees and Barbara Vander Veen.

Upton said McCain would help other candidates on the ticket, possibly restoring Republicans to a majority in the U.S. House of Representatives.

"I've been in the minority, then in the majority and now back in the minority," he said. "And let me tell you, it's not very fun."

John Yob, the exploratory committee's state director, said supporters were boosted by a new poll from the Lansing-based Epic-MRA that showed 59 percent of 600 likely voters had a favorable opinion of McCain, scoring higher than Giuliani and Romney.

Candidates To Flock To Va. For Money (RICTD)

By Peter Hardin

Richmond Times-Dispatch, February 10, 2007

The two leading contenders for the Republican presidential nomination will be in Richmond next week seeking financial support for their campaigns.

Arizona Sen. John McCain will hold finance meetings at The Jefferson Hotel on Monday. Later in the day he will travel to Norfolk to meet with business executives there, according to his exploratory campaign.

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani will come to Richmond on Friday for a private fundraising event at the Omni Hotel. Former Attorney General and gubernatorial candidate Jerry W. Kilgore will be host for the event.

Kilgore is expected to lead Giuliani's campaign in Virginia.

In Virginia's 2000 presidential primary, McCain was defeated by George W. Bush in a vote that gave Bush's struggling presidential campaign a boost.

McCain may have been hurt then by certain public stands, including a proposal to boost cigarette taxes by $1.10 a pack. He also opposed a submarine that would be built in Virginia.

Last year, McCain mended fences with the Rev. Jerry Falwell, whom he had sharply criticized in 2000. McCain addressed the commencement last May at Falwell's Liberty University in Lynchburg. Last November, Falwell said McCain would make a good president.

A third presidential contender, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, will be in Richmond next Saturday to address the Democratic Party of Virginia's Jefferson-Jackson Day dinner.

Democrats have sold 4,000 tickets -- almost twice as many as usual -- to the dinner, their main annual fundraising event.

Mitt Romney Makes Stop In Montgomery (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

Former Massachusetts Governor Mitt Romney brought his presidential campaign to Alabama Friday night, and he sought to dispel any concerns about his past views on social issues.

Romney told Republicans in Montgomery that he's opposed to same-sex marriage because children have a right to have a mom and a dad. Romney also said the Roe versus Wade mentality cheapens the dignity of human life. Romney previously supported choice, but changed his views two years ago. Governor Riley attended the event and called Romney the "quintessential candidate."

Romney, like Riley, was elected in 2002. Both inherited budget deficits and both had budget surpluses four years later. Riley, however, has not yet endorsed any of the Republican candidates who've been to Alabama.

The state is drawing a steady stream of candidates because Alabama has moved up its presidential primary to be second in the South.

Huckabee Describes Iraq As Our "World War III" (NHUL)

By John Whitson

New Hampshire Union Leader, February 10, 2007

NASHUA – Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee told a small lunch crowd at Daniel Webster College yesterday the next President has to recognize the war in Iraq's true gravity.

"We need to understand that this is, in fact, World War III," said Huckabee, a Republican, who announced co-chairmen of his Presidential exploratory committee in New Hampshire.

Former gubernatorial candidate Fred Bramante and former Manchester Republican committee chairman Cliff Hurst will lead Huckabee's early efforts here.

Huckabee delivered a wide-ranging speech to about 40 people, many of them business leaders, at what was billed as the first National Leaders Forum, a newly created series designed to give Presidential hopefuls another avenue to reach New Hampshire voters.

Former Congressman Charlie Bass and several state politicians also turned out to hear Huckabee's message.

Huckabee, who served 10 years as governor, spun tales from his childhood in Arkansas and showed a smooth comedic touch while hitting on topics ranging from Iraq to health care to education reform.

DOJ_NMG_0130953

The speech was billed in advance as Huckabee's response to a national anti-tax group's recent report criticizing his record on taxes and government regulation as "mixed."

But Huckabee touched only briefly on the issue, saying he cut taxes 90 times as governor and adding that he advocates a national tax structure that is "flatter, fairer, more finite."

Bass said he came out to the forum because Huckabee "has an exciting message." But the six-term congressman who was defeated in November stopped well short of offering his endorsement.

"I'm remaining uncommitted at this point," he said.

Bramante, a member of the State Board of Education who was a strong supporter of Arizona Sen. John McCain in 2000, said he's switched camps because Huckabee shares his passion for school reform.

"I love McCain, but I think Mike Huckabee will transform this country," said Bramante, citing another former Arkansas governor when asked about Huckabee's chances of being elected President.

"New Hampshire has a habit of turning nobodies into somebodies," said Bramante.

Huckabee drew his first laugh of the day when telling the crowd to beware of politicians who have ready answers for everything.

"We need people like me," he said, adding, "I'm sure that's my YouTube moment for the week."

Huckabee said jihadists in Iraq are enemies that mask themselves in a "perversion of piety" and said their goal is "the utter destruction and annihilation of those of us who sit in this room today."

The country needs to reduce health care costs, he said, by turning the system upside down and focusing on wellness and prevention instead of disease and treatment.

"We don't have a health care crisis," said Huckabee, "we have a health crisis."

On education, Huckabee lauded the effort New Hampshire has recently adopted to shape courses and methods of study around individual student needs.

Gaining credit for life experience, like earning music credits for playing in a high school rock band, is an idea that should be adopted throughout the country, he said.

Deanna Galligan and Jennifer Staretorp, both Daniel Webster sophomores, were among the few students at yesterday's forum.

"As a first-time voter," said Galligan, "I basically just wanted to get as much information as possible."

Huckabee Defends Traditional Marriages (AP)

By Philip Elliott

AP, February 9, 2007

NASHUA, N.H. -- Republican Mike Huckabee said Friday that marriage shouldn't be treated as an experiment in response to questions about whether Vice President Dick Cheney's lesbian daughter should have the right to wed.

The former Arkansas governor, who is seeking the GOP presidential nomination, said heterosexual marriages face enough challenges without adding new configurations to the mix.

"Taking on a new definition doesn't make sense right now," Huckabee said in an interview with The Associated Press after speaking to business leaders in New Hampshire.

Mary Cheney, 37, announced in December that she and her partner of 15 years, Heather Poe, were starting a family. She has not said how the child was conceived. The baby is due in the spring and will be the vice president's sixth grandchild.

Huckabee declined to comment on Mary Cheney's decision.

"I wouldn't get near specific cases," he said.

But when pressed, he said the historic definition of marriage has worked for so long for a reason.

"People have a right to decide how they live their lives. But they have to respect not changing the definition of marriage," said Huckabee, who served as a pastor in Baptist churches before becoming governor in 1996.

DOJ_NMG_0130954

In 2004, the year Arkansas approved a constitutional amendment to ban gay marriage, Huckabee said the ban was needed to quiet activists looking to rewrite the nation's social code. But Huckabee also said it was OK to say a person's sexual preference was nobody's business, "even though it's not consistent with the Biblical norm of male and female."

In 2006, when the Arkansas Supreme Court rejected a ban on gay foster parents that had been put in by a state board, Huckabee said through a spokeswoman: "I'm very disappointed that the court seems more interested in what's good for gay couples than what's good for children needing foster care."

Consultant Nixes Rumors Of Perry's National Ambition (HC)

By Janet Elliott

Houston Chronicle, February 10, 2007

AUSTIN — Gov. Rick Perry has no interest in national politics and may seek re-election in 2010, his chief political consultant said Friday.

Dave Carney said speculation that recent decisions by Perry, including his mandate that middle-school girls be inoculated against a sexually transmitted virus linked to cervical cancer, are designed to raise the governor's profile nationally is "one of the most retarded things about the political observers in Texas."

"He hates Washington. He doesn't like to go there," Carney continued.

Perry also isn't worried about his legacy, Carney added. The 56-year-old governor, who has served since 2001, is on track to be the longest-serving governor in Texas history.

"He's one of the few politicians in the world who doesn't care about what people write, what editorials say. That's why he's been so successful. He doesn't put his personal ego and reputation ahead of doing the right thing," Carney said.

Higher profile recentlyThere's no question that Perry's national profile has been raised by the decision to make Texas the first state to require administration of the human papillomavirus vaccine. And the furor it has caused in Texas shows no signs of abating.

The issue will be picked up Wednesday as Health and Human Services Commissioner Albert Hawkins appears before the Senate Nominations Committee for confirmation to a term to end Feb. 1, 2009. Hawkins has been commissioner since January 2003.

Sen. Glenn Hegar, a member of the Nominations Committee, said Friday that he will withhold support for Hawkins until he gets some questions answered. He said in a press release that he wants to ask how health officials intend to insure that girls aren't pregnant before they are vaccinated.

Hegar, R-Katy, said the manufacturer of the vaccine says it cannot be given safely to someone who is pregnant.

"Does that mean the commissioner intends to require a pregnancy test for each of these young children before they receive the Gardasil HPV vaccine or does he intend to put these children at undue risk instead?" Hegar asked.

Hegar has filed a bill to preempt Perry's order so the vaccine would not be a requirement for girls to enroll in sixth grade.

Perry's press secretary, Robert Black, scoffed at Hegar's concern about 11- and 12-year-olds being pregnant. Federal health authorities recommend the vaccine be administered at a young age before girls become sexually active.

Opportunity for comment"I would argue that if the senator believes there is an overabundance of 11-year-olds becoming pregnant in the state of Texas, we have a much bigger issue to deal with than whether someone gets a vaccine or not," Black said.

Hawkins' office said that he anticipates there will be full opportunity for comment from all interested parties during the rule-making process. Perry's order requires the commission to write rules for the new vaccine, effective September 2008.

In addition to the vaccine order, some of Perry's recent statements have fueled speculation that he may welcome an invitation to be the vice presidential candidate on the 2008 GOP ticket. In his inaugural address last month, he made brief references to international problems, including the situation in Iraq, the war on terrorism and the "anti-American appeals" of some European and Latin American leaders.

His calls for more spending on health care and pre-kindergarten in his State of the State speech Tuesday drew more enthusiasm from Democrats than from Republicans.

DOJ_NMG_0130955

Black said the only role the governor wants to play nationally is to support the GOP ticket in 2008. He said that because Texas is such a large state, actions the state takes can have a ripple effect on the country.

"What Texas does matters nationally. The governor's really cognizant about that," Black said.

Critics of Perry's vaccine order have said they think the governor is trying to help the manufacturer, Merck, which has been lobbying nationally to get the drug on state lists of vaccines required for school enrollment. Perry's office has denied that and noted that a second HPV vaccine is expected on the market next year.

The manufacturer of the second vaccine, GlaxoSmithKline, gave $10,000 to Perry last year through its political action committee. Merck has donated $6,000 to Perry since 2005.

Democratic strategist Glenn Smith said Perry has taken advantage of a lull in the legislative session to make some high-profile announcements, including a proposal to sell the state lottery to a private bidder.

"He would be much smarter to vaccinate himself against the 61 percent of Texans who voted against him," Smith said.

As to the speculation about Perry running for national office, Smith said Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison is a more likely candidate for vice president.

"The rest of the country may not be quite ready to put another Texan anywhere near the White House given the last six years of blundering by the current inhabitant," Smith said.

Carney, who lives in New Hampshire, said he doesn't understand the "emotional" furor caused by the order. He said it benefits public health, saves money over the long run and respects parents' rights by allowing them to opt their daughters out of the requirement.

While the New York Times lauded Perry's order this week, USA Today said in a Friday editorial that the rush to require the Merck vaccine threatens to promote a backlash.

"For now, however, making it mandatory is premature," the newspaper said. "The vaccine ought to be available, at an affordable price, to everyone who wants it after consulting with a doctor. But sometimes, promotion of a medical advance can move too fast for its own good."

Perry responded in a commentary printed with the editorial. "Research shows that the HPV vaccine is highly effective in protecting women against the four leading cancer-causing strains of HPV," he said. "Though some might argue that we should wait several years before requiring the vaccine, I believe such a delay unnecessarily risks the lives of young women."

The GOP Field (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Now is the season of Republican discontent, extending even to the party's Presidential candidates. For the first time in decades, no dominant candidate has emerged and GOP voters seem to be in a Missouri state of mind: Show us what you really believe. We know exactly how they feel.

John McCain has been considered the front-runner, having lost a rough nomination fight in 2000 to President Bush. In the normal GOP habit of Presidential primogeniture, he'd be the likeliest nominee. The Arizona Senator has an inspiring personal story and a strong record on national security. His fortitude on Iraq has been all the more impressive since the war has become unpopular and threatens the media adulation he has long enjoyed. Tenacity is a Presidential asset, especially in dangerous times.

But among many Republicans, Mr. McCain is also paying a price for his years as a policy "maverick." Social conservatives hate his signature achievement of campaign-finance reform, which limits public ability to influence politicians. He also grandstanded on rules for interrogating terrorists.

Our own doubts relate to his economic instincts. He's a bulwark against spending earmarks, no question. But Mr. McCain turned against the Reagan tax-cut agenda in 2000, and he voted against the Bush tax cuts of 2003. Now that those tax cuts have proven to be a spectacular success, the Senator says he wants them made permanent. But his justification is the political one that he has "never voted for a tax increase," not that he now understands his opposition was wrong on the merits. With 2008 likely to be a tax watershed, the GOP needs a candidate who can articulate a pro-growth agenda. Maybe his estimable economic advisers, former Senator Phil Gramm and former FTC Chairman Tim Muris, can steer him right.

Mitt Romney, the former Massachusetts Governor, has had some success exploiting conservative unease with Mr. McCain. He has shown he can win votes in a blue state, and he was successful both as a capitalist and as manager of the 2002 Salt Lake City Olympics.

However, he too is something of an empty policy slate. The former business consultant made a big deal of the health-care "reform" he steered through the Massachusetts legislature last year, and we suppose he deserves credit for trying. But he oversold the results -- to the applause of the national health-care lobby -- and imposed an insurance mandate without reforming the state insurance market.

As it unfolds, this law is turning out to be far from a free-market success. And so now Mr. Romney is distancing himself from it -- never mind that he upbraided his critics last year for not understanding its virtues. The episode suggests a thin political skin and perhaps a too malleable policy core.

Filling out the current top tier of candidates is the anomaly of former New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani. We say anomaly because a Northeasterner who favors gun control and abortion rights isn't supposed to have a Ralph Nader's chance in the GOP primaries. Yet today Mr. Giuliani leads in the national polls and is all but tied with Mr. McCain in New Hampshire.

Some of this is no doubt due to name recognition after his 9/11 heroics. On the other hand, maybe cultural conservatives aren't the single-issue voters of media lore. Mr. Giuliani can point to the revival of the previously ungovernable New York, and his temerity and experience in a crisis are qualities that voters look for in a Commander-in-Chief.

The competition will attack his social liberalism, and our guess is that Mr. Giuliani could help himself if he came out solidly for appointing judges like Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas. Today's cultural disputes all end up in the courts, and what most conservatives want above all is to know that their views will get a democratic hearing rather than be pre-empted by judicial fiat.

As always, there are a pack of other potential candidates, one or two of whom could make a splash along the way. Newt Gingrich is famous as the former House Speaker and ubiquitous on Fox News. He is also a font of ideas, some of them sensible. But he will have to persuade Republicans that he can win given the baggage of his Beltway days and low favorability ratings.

There's always room for a strong anti-abortion voice in any GOP race, and Kansas Senator Sam Brownback is bidding for that slot. Though little known nationally, he's done impressive, and often bipartisan, work on everything from malaria to immigration. So we are astounded by his recent remarks from Baghdad distancing himself, a la Hillary Clinton, from the war he voted for. Millions of Republicans are frustrated with the war, but if he sustains this antiwar theme someone will note that he co-sponsored the 1998 Iraq Liberation Act.

All in all, this looks like the most wide-open Republican race in years. That may be a good thing if it forces the candidates to battle over ideas and revive the GOP reform agenda that got lost in the fog of the 109th Congress.

Woman Chosen To Lead Harvard (WP)

By Valerie Strauss, Susan Kinzie

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Harvard University is about to name its first woman president since its founding in 1636, tapping a Civil War historian to succeed Lawrence Summers, whose tumultuous tenure was marked by controversial remarks about women and clashes with faculty members.

Drew Gilpin Faust, 59, dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study and a leading historian on the American South, will be formally appointed president as early as this weekend, according to a source with knowledge of the decision.

With Faust's selection, half of the eight Ivy League schools will be run by women: Harvard, the University of Pennsylvania, Princeton University and Brown University.

Faust, a popular figure on campus known for her collegiality, will succeed the blunt Summers, an economist and former U.S. treasury secretary whose combative five-year tenure as president ended last year. His departure followed a faculty revolt after he suggested that the shortage of elite female scientists may stem in part from "innate" differences between men and women.

Many educators said Harvard's decision would send a message to other major research universities in the country -- 14 percent of which are headed by women.

DOJ_NMG_0130957

"Harvard is making a statement at a critical time when we are seeing student bodies [at many schools] that are well over 50 percent women," said Claire van Ummersen, director of the Office of Women in Higher Education at the American Council on Education. "We see women faculty increasing in number, and the place where we have lagged most is in research institutions having women at the executive level. . . . Hopefully, this will have some influence on boards of trustees or overseers of other institutions."

Faust's selection comes as Harvard moves to modernize its more than 30-year-old undergraduate curriculum, a step that is being closely watched by other schools and could serve as a model for U.S. higher education.

Especially delighted by the choice of Faust were undergraduates, who said the new president and curriculum would place a long-sought focus on their education at the university, which has historically used graduate assistants to teach many undergraduate classes, for example.

"Everybody is really excited," said Ryan Anthony Petersen, president of Harvard's Undergraduate Council. "She is a teacher and has the ability to bring people together and put the focus here on teaching and undergraduates, which hasn't been true for 50 years."

Faust faces big challenges, including keeping up the frantic pace of fundraising that helped Harvard increase its endowment to $29.2 billion in 2006 -- more than the gross national product of many nations.

She also must work with the university's strong schools and colleges, which are famously decentralized; indeed, the powerful faculty of the College of Arts and Sciences drove the opposition to Summers.

Harvard's affairs are of interest in higher education because it occupies a unique space in academia. Seven U.S. presidents were graduates, and the faculty has produced more than 40 Nobel laureates in a range of fields. Its age, wealth and visibility place it at the top of a group of highly prestigious and influential institutions.

Faust will end the succession of 27 white men who have held the president's title at America's oldest institution of higher education. She will take the reins from Derek Bok, 75, a former 20-year Harvard president who took over as interim leader when Summers left.

"And it has only taken them 371 years," said Kim Gandy, president of the National Organization for Women. "Larry Summers, we couldn't have done it without you."

Faust became dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study in 2001 and taught history and African American studies there. Before coming to Radcliffe, she taught for two decades at the University of Pennsylvania -- where she earned her doctorate in American civilization in 1975 -- and served as director of the Women's Studies Program. She is the author of five books.

Sheldon Hackney, who was president of Penn from 1981 to 1993 while Faust was a teacher there, said Faust was not only a great educator but always displayed sound judgment and was well-respected by her peers.

"She will be really good for Harvard," he said. "There is no big significant change that you can make in the university for which you don't need faculty support, and she will be able to get that."

Some educators said the choice of Faust was a surprise because she does not have extensive administrative experience. That was probably a plus, said George Washington University President Stephen Joel Trachtenberg.

"They didn't want anybody with administrative experience," he said. "They wanted an inspirational leader, a political symbol, a decent person that everybody could feel good about to help them do what the presidents do best."

The decision is expected to be formalized at a special meeting of the university's Board of Overseers tomorrow, according to the Harvard Crimson student newspaper, which broke the story in yesterday's editions, along with the Boston Globe.

Harvard Plans To Name First Female President (NYT)

By Sara Rimer, Alan Finder

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., Feb. 9 — Harvard, the nation's oldest university, plans to name Drew Gilpin Faust, a historian of the Civil War South, to be the first female president in its 371-year history, university officials said Friday.

Her selection by a search committee, if ratified as expected by the Board of Overseers on Sunday, would make Harvard the fourth Ivy League university to name a woman. It comes two years after Lawrence H. Summers, then president of the university, set off a storm by suggesting that a lack of intrinsic aptitude could help explain why fewer women than men reach the top ranks of science and math in universities.

Some Harvard professors, particularly women, greeted the decision with euphoria. "Harvard's waited a long time — since 1636," said Patricia Albjerg Graham, an emeritus professor of the history of education at Harvard, recalling that when she was a postdoctoral fellow in 1972, she was not allowed to enter the main door of the faculty club or eat in the main dining room.

Mary Waters, the acting chairwoman of the Harvard sociology department, said: "It's been a lonely place for women, very lonely. There aren't many of us."

Dr. Faust, 59, the author of five books and a former professor of history and women's studies at the University of Pennsylvania, is the dean of the Radcliffe Institute of Advanced Study, the smallest of Harvard's schools. It is the remaining remnant of Radcliffe College, once the women's college at Harvard. Much of the research sponsored by the institute emphasizes the study of women, gender and society.

Dr. Faust emerged in recent weeks as a finalist among the candidates being considered by the university's search committee, particularly after Thomas R. Cech, a biochemist who is the president of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute and a Nobel Prize winner, took the unusual step of announcing publicly that he had withdrawn from the competition.

His withdrawal prompted some professors to raise last-minute concerns about Dr. Faust. While declining to speak on the record, they said they thought she lacked the toughness and vision to be a strong leader of an unruly and factionalized university and noted that the Radcliffe Institute, with about 80 staff members, is a tiny part of Harvard. Others wondered why it had taken nearly a year to choose someone who was already a Harvard dean.

"The real import of this choice is that it is a cautious pick, which seems targeted at healing the wounds of the Summers years and restoring Harvard's momentum as quickly as possible," said Richard Bradley, who wrote "Harvard Rules: The Struggle for the Soul of the World's Most Powerful University" (HarperCollins, 2005).

Mr. Bradley said there were legitimate questions about Dr. Faust's qualifications, like her lack of experience running a large university. "The fact that Harvard could not find someone who filled all their bases suggests to me the difficulty that Harvard had to fill the position," he said.

One of the nation's premier universities, Harvard has 12 schools and colleges with an annual budget of $3 billion and an endowment of nearly $30 billion.

John Longbrake, a university spokesman, said he would not comment on the presidential search. Dr. Faust also declined to comment until Sunday's official announcement. Her selection was first reported by The Harvard Crimson late Thursday night on its Web site.

Faculty members and officials familiar with the search said Dr. Faust's leadership style — her collaborative approach and considerable people skills — would be vital for soothing a campus ripped apart by the battles over Dr. Summers, whom many accused of having an abrasive, confrontational style.

"She combines outstanding scholarship with an uncanny ability to administer both well and with a heart," said Judith Rodin, the president of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Dr. Summers turned to Dr. Faust two years ago to help calm the furor over his remarks about women in math, engineering and science. He asked her to oversee two committees he created to come up with ways to recruit, retain and promote women in those fields at Harvard.

Dr. Summers, a former Treasury secretary, stepped down a year ago after a five-year tenure in the face of widespread faculty discontent.

Dr. Faust will take the helm at a time when the university faces a challenging agenda, which includes transforming the undergraduate curriculum, re-emphasizing teaching and building a new campus in the Allston section of Boston that, among other things, will support stem-cell research.

She is seen as likely to be able to restore trust with the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, the university's largest and among its most prestigious divisions, which had led the charge against Dr. Summers.

Dr. Faust has run the Radcliffe Institute since 2001. Before that, she taught American history for more than two decades at Penn, where she had gone to graduate school. An expert in Southern history and a native of Virginia, she has written books on

Southern women during the Civil War and on intellectuals and ideology in the Confederate South, as well as a biography of a plantation owner.

In the end, some Harvard professors said, Dr. Faust's management style might have been more important to the nine members of the presidential search committee than any desire to name a woman.

"My own sense is that it's a new template for leadership, and that probably is not unrelated to gender, but it ought not get eclipsed by it," said Richard P. Chait, a professor of higher education at Harvard.

Dr. Chait, who studies university management, noted that in several recent changes of leadership of major American corporations, tough, even bullying leaders were replaced by more mild-mannered consensus builders.

The presidential search began not long after Dr. Summers resigned last February. Derek C. Bok, a former president of Harvard, stepped in to serve as interim president.

News of Dr. Faust's selection was greeted warmly by Harvard students. "It's about time," said Elisa Olivieri, a junior. "Talent is no longer 'single, male, childless.' It's an excellent acknowledgement that the face of talent has changed."

George Thampy, a freshman, said of the selection: "I think it's a great step forward — a bona fide scholar who's a woman. In some ways you could say it's a reaction to the last president and that fiasco."

First Woman Is Picked To Lead Harvard (BOS)

By Marcella Bombardieri, Maria Sacchetti

The Boston Globe, February 10, 2007

Drew Gilpin Faust became the Harvard University governing board's choice for the school's next president shortly after her final interview on Sunday night, a person close to the search process said yesterday.

Faust, who will be the first female president in Harvard's 371-year history, convinced the search committee that she would be a strong choice after fielding questions over dinner, the source said.

The Corporation, the name for Harvard's main governing board, plans to present Faust for approval tomorrow to the Overseers, a panel of alumni. The Overseers, by Harvard rules, have final say, but their approval has been a given in modern Harvard history.

Faust, 59, the dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, was coy yesterday as she greeted a handful of reporters at her alma mater, Bryn Mawr College, near Philadelphia. A trustee of the college, she was on that campus for a board meeting.

Faust, smiling, refused to answer questions about Harvard, but agreed to let photographers take pictures as she strolled through campus in a two-minute public appearance.

"Could you tell us what you're doing on Sunday?" one reporter asked, referring to tomorrow's vote to approve her.

Faust, a 1968 graduate of the women's college, laughed and said nothing.

Women at Bryn Mawr and throughout higher education were celebrating the fact that if Faust takes office, not only will she be Harvard's first female president, but that half of the Ivy League's presidents will be women. Faust's fellow trustees broke into applause for her yesterday, and she thanked them, according to the college president and the board's chairwoman.

"It sends the right signal, because Harvard didn't intentionally pick a woman, but it turns out that the best president for Harvard was a woman," said Amy Gutmann, who is the second consecutive woman to lead the University of Pennsylvania. "When we were in college, not one of us imagined that this would happen."

Corporation member Robert E. Rubin, the former treasury secretary who had strongly backed former Harvard president Lawrence H. Summers, had raised the most concerns about Faust during the search and questioned her aggressively during interviews, said the source, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the search process is supposed to be confidential.

Faust was the only candidate being seriously considered after Nobel laureate Thomas R. Cech withdrew last week, throwing into question whether the search would finish on Harvard's preferred schedule.

Several people familiar with the search have said that the committee hoped to finish its work by early February.

"They wanted to get it done as quickly as possible, within a year of Larry Summers's resignation," said the Rev. Peter J. Gomes, a professor and lead minister at Harvard's Memorial Church.

DOJ_NMG_0130960

Gomes cautioned the Overseers not to serve as a rubber stamp, but added that Faust would be a good choice. "She'll get a lot done, and it will get done quietly and effectively."

Bundled in a black overcoat and striped black and gray scarf, Faust stood in the wind and cold on Bryn Mawr's campus during her brief appearance yesterday. The only question she answered came from a reporter from the Bryn Mawr student newspaper: What was her favorite tradition at the all-women's college?

"Probably Hell Week," she said, referring to a quirky annual mock hazing that involves costumes and bedtime stories.

Faust has spent six years leading the Radcliffe Institute, a fellowship program and library that was once the university's women's college. A historian of the Civil War and the American South, she spent 25 years teaching at Penn before coming to Harvard.

Women's issues have been a major theme in her life. She graduated from a women's college, studied women in the South throughout history, and has led Radcliffe, a Harvard institution once reserved for women. She also led an effort to study how to better advance women's careers that Harvard undertook after Summers seemed to suggest that women have less "intrinsic aptitude" for science than men.

Several students walking to class in Harvard Yard yesterday cheered the idea of a female president, although they said they did not know much about Faust. (Summers, who was treasury secretary during the Clinton administration, was an instant celebrity when he arrived in 2001, frequently asked by students to sign dollar bills.)

"It's fantastic," said Jordan Bock, 18, from Weston. "It will be great to change things up. It's been too long."

Bock, a freshman who is considering studying astrophysics, said she was surprised two years ago by Summers's comments about women.

Women lead three other Ivy League schools and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, but only 14 percent of the presidents of research universities nationally are women, according to a report to be issued Monday by the American Council on Education. That's up from 4 percent in 1986.

Tiffany Shumate, a Bryn Mawr junior majoring in psychology, said she equated Faust's appointment to Senator Hillary Clinton running for president of the United States. "It just makes me have more hope for gender equality," Shumate said.

A Woman Likely To Lead Harvard (LAT)

By Richard C. Paddock, Rebecca Trounson

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

Harvard University is set to name the first female president in its 371-year history to succeed Lawrence H. Summers, the former Harvard head who contributed to his own downfall by questioning the ability of women to master science.

Drew Gilpin Faust, a Civil War historian and dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study at Harvard, is expected to be named Sunday as Harvard's 28th president.

Faust, 59, was praised Friday by friends and associates as an eminent scholar and a dynamic yet soft-spoken leader with a highly effective personal management style.

The appointment process is highly secretive, and Alan Stone, Harvard vice president for public affairs, said he could not confirm that Faust was selected. The Harvard Crimson, the student newspaper, reported Friday that the university's 30-member Board of Overseers would meet Sunday to affirm her selection.

Faust's appointment would be a breakthrough for an institution that did not have a single female faculty member in 1970 and did not abolish quotas restricting the number of female students allowed until 1975.

"I think it's a great moment in Harvard's history," said Maria Tatar, Harvard dean for the humanities. "She has a quiet charisma, and she is very likely to lead the place in bold new directions. She is not a self-promoting type. She does not seek the limelight but works for the good of the institution."

Women have made strides in the upper ranks of higher education in the last generation. If Faust is confirmed, four of the eight Ivy League schools will have female presidents. But men and women are far from equally represented at the helms of the nation's institutions of higher learning.

DOJ_NMG_0130961

Nationwide, the American Council on Education reports in a study to be issued Monday, women make up less than a quarter of the university and college presidents. From 1986 to 2006 the number of female presidents rose from 10% to 23%, the study found, although the gains have slowed considerably since the late 1990s. The report concluded that women were most likely to head two-year colleges and least likely to head an institution that awards doctorates.

"I think the fact that the Harvard board would be appointing a female may well make others look more favorably on women candidates," said Claire Van Ummersen, a former college president and a vice president on the council.

Indeed, Harvard, founded in 1636, is widely viewed as the most prestigious American university. Seven U.S. presidents were graduates, and its faculty has produced more than 40 Noble laureates. Its actions often have outsized influence on the actions of other universities — particularly their governing boards.

Harvard has been searching for a new president for nearly a year, since Summers announced that he would step down.

The former U.S. Treasury secretary, considered abrasive by some, lost the support of the faculty after questioning whether there were fewer women in science because they do not have an "intrinsic aptitude" for the subject.

E. Ann Matter, a former colleague of Faust at the University of Pennsylvania who is now associate dean for arts and letters there, described Faust as calm, reflective and deliberate.

"It's quite interesting that after the kind of trouble, the kind of controversies Dr. Summers was in, that they choose someone who is really the anti-Summers. He's bombastic, and she's very diplomatic," Matter said. "It will be quite a change."

Faust's appointment also sends a message, Matter said.

"They got a lot of heat over the things Larry Summers said and did — and was reputed to say and do. This makes a very different kind of statement. She's a humanist, a historian — and a historian who's written about women. And that's a very interesting choice for the president of Harvard," she said.

To ease the controversy caused by his remarks, Summers appointed two task forces to increase the role of women in science and on the faculty. Summers asked Faust to help lead both committees, giving her an even more prominent role at the university.

"The task force issued a very impressive report that sets forth a strategy for increasing the number of women and minorities on the faculty," said one administrator who spoke on condition of anonymity. "She was a very powerful presence behind the scenes."

UCLA history professor Lynn Hunt, who also worked with Faust at Penn, described her as a first-rate administrator and an excellent listener who can build a consensus. But she also can make tough choices.

"She is totally confident, the most relaxed person in the world, and she can make the right decision without her own narcissism or ego being involved in it," said Hunt, who has been friends with Faust for 20 years.

"I think she has all the makings of a great president," added University of Pennsylvania President Amy Gutmann, who has known Faust for more than a decade. "She's got a strong backbone, and she knows how to lead by articulating a vision and inspiring people to collaborate."

Faust, a graduate of Bryn Mawr College, went on to earn a master's and a doctorate in history at the University of Pennsylvania. She taught there for 25 years and was director of its Women's Studies Program.

A Virginia native, she has specialized in the history of the Civil War and the South and has published five books, including "Mothers of Invention: Women of the Slaveholding South in the American Civil War." She recently completed a sixth book on the effect of the Civil War's enormous death toll.

In 2001, she became dean of the Radcliffe Institute, with the mandate of transforming what had once been the former women's college into a research institute with 50 scholars.

In a speech to the Harvard Class of 2005, Faust detailed the slow progress of women at Harvard and the gradual transformation of Radcliffe College, which was founded in the late 19th century to give women access to a Harvard education.

"This is a university that has articulated its dedication to the success of every student, male or female," Faust said then. "But I invoke the past today to remind you that such commitments are not deeply rooted in Harvard's history, that they require a transformation rather than an extension of tradition, and that such transformation requires work and attentiveness.

"An institution that less than a century ago defined itself as an incubator for virility is still working out how fully to incorporate women," she added.

Harvard law professor Lani Guinier on Friday reflected on being a student at Radcliffe in the 1960s: "I graduated from Radcliffe College, and when I was a student there, we were treated as the distant cousins of Harvard…. As I recall, my freshman year, we were not allowed to enter Harvard Yard wearing pants."

Harvard To Name First Female President (FT)

By Rebecca Knight

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

Harvard is on the verge of naming its first female president, ending a year-long search for a new leader for the oldest and richest university in the US.

Drew Gilpin Faust, dean of the Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, is expected to be named the university's 28th president this weekend, according to a report in the Crimson, the college's student newspaper.

The appointment of a new president will be announced on Sunday after a special meeting of the university's board of overseers, the alumni governing body that must approve the selection, according to a university official with knowledge of the selection process.

Ms Faust, a historian who specialises in the civil war and the US south, arrived at Harvard six years ago. Before that, Ms Faust, a graduate of Bryn Mawr College, taught at the University of Pennsylvania, where she received her doctorate, for 25 years. She has never run a big institution.

Radcliffe is the smallest of Harvard's 10 schools with no full-time faculty and a budget of about $16m (€12m, £8m). By contrast, the president of Harvard oversees a budget of about $3bn.

But as news of Ms Faust's expected appointment swept through Harvard Yard on Friday, friends and colleagues praised her "strong leadership skills" and said she was up to the challenge of running Harvard.

Howard Gardner, a professor at the Harvard Graduate School of Education, said he was "very pleased". "She is not afraid to say what she thinks and to follow through on it," he said.

The expected announcement comes nearly a year after Lawrence Summers, former US Treasury secretary, resigned as Harvard president, amid increasing tension with faculty after he suggested that "intrinsic aptitude" might explain why fewer women reached top academic positions in maths and science.

Prof Gardner said the appointment of Ms Faust "puts the kibosh on the notion that people at Harvard do not have a high opinion of women".

In recent years, many US universities – including several Ivy League schools – have selected women leaders. Brown University hired Ruth Simmons in 2000, Shirley Tilghman became president of Princeton in 2001, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology appointed Susan Hockfield in 2004 and Amy Gutmann became president of University of Pennsylvania in the same year.

Observers predict that Ms Faust's consensus-building brand of leadership would be very different from Mr Summers' sometimes blunt managerial style.

Ms Faust could not be reached for comment.

Harvard Looks To A Woman (PHI)

By Patrick Kerkstra, Michael Matza, Martha Woodall

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 10, 2007

Harvard University appears poised to select Drew Gilpin Faust as its next president, putting a renowned historian with strong ties to Philadelphia at the helm of the nation's most prominent university.

Faust would become the first female president in Harvard's 371-year history and the fourth woman among the eight Ivy League presidents.

Now the dean of Harvard's Radcliffe Institute, Faust will officially be named the university's 28th president as early as tomorrow, according to reports in the Boston Globe and Harvard Crimson.

DOJ_NMG_0130963

Harvard spokesman John Longbrake declined to confirm or deny the reports, as did Faust, who was on the Main Line yesterday at Bryn Mawr College, her alma mater, for a meeting of the board of trustees.

Faust's affiliation with Bryn Mawr is just one of her many links to the region. She earned her graduate degrees at the University of Pennsylvania and was a professor there for 25 years in the history department that her husband chaired. Until she left for Harvard in 2001, she was a resident of Lower Merion.

Friends and colleagues described Faust, 59, as a quietly confident collaborator with exceptionally deft communication skills.

Such abilities are in high demand at Harvard, which is still shaking off the effects of the turbulent five-year tenure of former president Lawrence H. Summers, who clashed repeatedly with the university's liberal arts faculty.

"I think what they chose is a leader who is intelligent and eloquent and calm in the face of crisis, and also a people person," said novelist Julia Glass, who was a fellow at the Radcliffe Institute in the midst of the Summers upheaval. "I imagine that's a quality they needed to have this time around."

Penn history professor Steven Hahn recalled a meeting he attended at Harvard several years ago that both Summers and Faust attended.

"She was so formidable in the meeting, and Larry Summers was clearly so dependent on her wisdom and judgment that I remember walking out thinking, 'She's going to be running this place,' " Hahn said.

A scholar of the Civil War and the South, Faust has been considered for other top university jobs in recent years, including the presidency of the University of Chicago and of Penn. The latter ultimately went to Amy Gutmann.

Gutmann - who was rumored to be a candidate for the Harvard post despite her insistence that she would stay at Penn - could not be reached for comment yesterday. But earlier in the week, she told The Inquirer that Faust was "everything a Harvard president should be."

Faust had relatively limited administrative experience at Penn, and though she had been widely praised for her leadership of the Radcliffe Institute, it is a small operation, comparable to a think tank. The institute has 87 employees and a $17 million annual budget. Harvard, by comparison, operates on $3 billion a year.

"The problem is that Harvard is big," said Harvard education professor Howard E. Gardner. "But it's big even if you have run Yale for 30 years."

During the search process, many handicappers thought Harvard would best be served by a seasoned administrator with solid scientific credentials, given the university's increased emphasis on the sciences and its construction of a new research-oriented campus across the Charles River from Harvard Yard.

But those who know Faust said she had abundant administrative talent - if not experience - and described her as a naturally curious scholar who excelled at identifying connections across fields. She would, they said, be a strong leader for scientists as well as liberal arts professors.

"What I was struck by was Drew's passion and commitment to foster - and this might sound a little cheesy - but to foster this community of scholars, and her interest in what people were doing across disciplines," said Jim Costa, a professor of zoology at Western Carolina University who spent a year at the Radcliffe Institute.

"As soon as people see her in this role, whatever doubts they have are going to dissipate," Hahn said.

Harvard history professor Walter Johnson said Faust's groundbreaking work and writings had put her in the top rank of historians. "She is best in class as historians go," Johnson said.

Gardner, the Harvard education professor, said Faust would find good will and support in the faculty. "Nobody wants her to fail," he said.

When former Penn president Judith Rodin was inaugurated in 1994, she was the first woman to head an Ivy League university.

If Faust makes it four, it would be an "important tipping point in American higher education," Gutmann said.

Though Summers' tenure was marked by numerous controversies, the most explosive debate was triggered by remarks he made suggesting women might have less natural aptitude for math and science than men.

DOJ_NMG_0130964

Summers (who also has Philadelphia ties; he grew up in Lower Merion) tapped Faust to lead a task force he formed to soothe campus tensions in the aftermath. Faust took the job well aware that the committee could "simply be a way to toss a bone to the women faculty, to make it appear the university was doing something," Costa said.

"But she did it in good faith, thinking maybe it would make a difference," he said. "To her credit, given the opportunity, she went for it."

Faust's colleagues like to emphasize one other thing about Harvard's likely next president: She knows how to throw a party.

Glass, the novelist, described two soirees at Faust's Cambridge home. The first was an amateur night at which Radcliffe fellows "showcased their talents." The other, Glass said, was a full-blown dance party, with the furniture cleared away and a D.J.

"We're talking Chaka Khan and the Temptations," Glass said.

Harvard Expected To Tap Faust To Lead (WSJ)

By John Hechinger, Daniel Golden

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Harvard University, seeking to close a period of management tumult, is expected to choose faculty member Drew Gilpin Faust as the first woman to lead the 371-year-old institution, people familiar with the matter say.

The selection of a new president comes at a difficult time for America's richest university, which is trying to stay at the forefront of higher education while coping with the aftermath of a faculty rebellion that led to Lawrence Summers's departure from the top post a year ago.

Challengers to Harvard's preeminence, such as Stanford University and Princeton University, have eroded its lead in fund-raising and its reputation in undergraduate education. Mr. Summers spearheaded plans for a massive facilities expansion and curricular changes aimed at a greater emphasis on the sciences, but rankled faculty in the humanities, who didn't subscribe to his agenda.

Ms. Faust's nomination by an internal search committee is expected to be submitted to Harvard's Board of Overseers for ratification tomorrow. She is a respected Civil War historian and her presidency would mark a symbolic turning point for both Harvard and higher education. It would put women at the helm of half of the eight schools in the Ivy League, including Princeton, Rhode Island's Brown University and the University of Pennsylvania.

Women also run the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the University of Michigan. Overall, the percentage of female college presidents reached 23% last year, from 10% in 1986, according to a study to be released Monday by the American Council on Education, which noted that women's numbers remain rarer among elite research institutions.

News of Ms. Faust's probable selection was reported Friday in the Harvard Crimson and the Boston Globe.

Ms. Faust, dean of Harvard's Radcliffe Institute for Advanced Study, also represents a striking departure from Mr. Summers, the former U.S. Treasury secretary. Colleagues and friends describe Ms. Faust, 59 years old, as a diplomatic manager who has negotiated through a difficult time of change at Radcliffe, which was once Harvard's women's college but which has transformed into a research institute under the university's umbrella.

Judith Rodin, a former president of Penn who was the first female president in the Ivy League, said Ms. Faust had to deal with many "bristling" alumnae at Radcliffe showing a "kind of dexterity."

"She's got a great gift for bringing people together and consensus-building," says Ms. Rodin, who, now president of the Rockefeller Foundation, spoke with the Harvard search committee about Ms. Faust.

Mr. Summers turned to Ms. Faust for help after the uproar over his suggestion that innate gender differences help explain the absence of women in the upper echelons of the sciences and mathematics, tapping her to lead a committee to study the issue. A person familiar with the matter called her "a calming influence" who moved quickly for effective changes.

But many are sure to note that Ms. Faust's current administrative experience is leading an institute that hosts fellowships for professors in various disciplines, with a budget of nearly $17 million. By contrast, Harvard has a $3 billion budget, a $29 billion endowment, 20,000 students and 2,500 non-medical faculty.

In addition, many at Harvard felt Mr. Summers was rightfully challenging the faculty to bring change to a hidebound institution that many fear is losing ground to schools such as Princeton. U.S. News and World Report magazine recently ranked the New Jersey school No. 1 among colleges, surpassing Harvard. The two previously had been tied. At the same time, Stanford, with its ties to Northern California's nearby Silicon Valley, has become a more-potent challenger to Harvard's traditional role as higher education's biggest fund-raiser.

Harvard's ability to lead other schools to change has also been dimmed, in some eyes. In the fall, Harvard announced it was doing away with early admissions, saying the practice favors affluent applicants. Though many felt others would followed suit, most, except for Princeton and the University of Virginia, have stuck with the practice.

Some have worried that various fiefdoms at Harvard make it ungovernable, leaving the new president in a less powerful position to effect change.

"One would hope that it would not be an appointment of pacification," said Ruth Wisse, a professor of Yiddish and comparative literature who supported Mr. Summers. "This should be someone who could be a strong leader and take on the faculty of arts and sciences when that would be required."

Peter Gomes, a professor of Christian Morals at Harvard Divinity School and Harvard College who teaches courses in Harvard history, has publicly pushed for an outsider and said the search committee may have moved too quickly. While voicing "great respect" for Ms. Faust, he said, "The risk is that they haven't looked widely enough."

Among others, the search committee considered Steven Hyman, a neurobiologist and Harvard's provost; Elena Kagan, dean of Harvard Law School; and Thomas Cech, Ph.D., president of the Howard Hughes Medical Institute and a Nobel prize winning chemist, according to people familiar with the matter.

The Ex-Prez & His Prime-Time Pal

The new odd couple?

Eyebrows hit the roof earlier this week when Teri Hatcher ,42, and George H.W. Bush ,82, were spotted lunching together in Beverly Hills. Shots of the twosome chatting and kissing goodbye -- on the cheek, folks -- in the Los Angeles Country Club's parking lot have surfaced all over the Web.

Turns out that's not the only time they've met up. The "Desperate Housewives" actress, with daughter Emerson, visited the Bush compound in Kennebunkport, Maine, last year, Bush spokeswoman Jean Becker told us yesterday. "They spent two, maybe three nights at Walker's Point this summer," she said, and added that a return visit is likely.

So, what gives? The former president and the prime-time TV star have been friends since they met in Vegas a few years ago, Becker said. Um, Vegas?! Bush was seated next to Hatcher at the grand opening gala for one of Steve Wynn's new hotels in Sin City and, apparently, they hit it off.

"They enjoy each other's company. It's sort of one of those random things," Becker said. "It's not about politics -- they have a very personal and friendly relationship." The pals keep in touch mostly through e-mail but occasionally meet up in person.

This time around, Bush was in Los Angeles to receive the Ronald Reagan Freedom Award and invited Hatcher to lunch before the ceremony. Becker pointed out that the two weren't dining alone: Bush family pal Brad Freeman (and a few Secret Service agents) joined them.

We're told Bush wanted us to know that wife Barbara" loves Teri," said Becker. "We all love Teri."Wrapping Up a Trying Day

A grand jury investigation can't keep him down.

A very friendly Scooter Libby and 10 of his pals -- including attorney Ted Wells-- took over a table Thursday night at Brasserie Les Halles. Our source says the veep's former chief of staff happily chatted up well-wishers who approached the group while he sipped multiple Grey Goose vodkas on the rocks.

Libby -- in a well-tailored black topcoat and dark suit -- and his crew had a "legal air" about them as they downed drinks but passed on food. Came straight from the courthouse, eh guys?

California Split (NYT)

By Gar Alperovitz

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0130966

SOMETHING interesting is happening in California. Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger seems to have grasped the essential truth that no nation — not even the United States — can be managed successfully from the center once it reaches a certain scale. Moreover, the bold proposals that Mr. Schwarzenegger is now making for everything from universal health care to global warming point to the kind of decentralization of power which, once started, could easily shake up America's fundamental political structure.

Governor Schwarzenegger is quite clear that California is not simply another state. "We are the modern equivalent of the ancient city-states of Athens and Sparta," he recently declared. "We have the economic strength, we have the population and the technological force of a nation-state." In his inaugural address, Mr. Schwarzenegger proclaimed, "We are a good and global commonwealth."

Political rhetoric? Maybe. But California's governor has also put his finger on a little discussed flaw in America's constitutional formula. The United States is almost certainly too big to be a meaningful democracy. What does "participatory democracy" mean in a continent? Sooner or later, a profound, probably regional, decentralization of the federal system may be all but inevitable.

A recent study by the economists Alberto Alesina of Harvard and Enrico Spolaore of Tufts demonstrates that the bigger the nation, the harder it becomes for the government to meet the needs of its dispersed population. Regions that don't feel well served by the government's distribution of goods and services then have an incentive to take independent action, the economists note.

Scale also determines who has privileged access to the country's news media and who can shape its political discourse. In very large nations, television and other forms of political communication are extremely costly. President Bush alone spent $345 million in his 2004 election campaign. This gives added leverage to elites, who have better corporate connections and greater resources than non-elites. The priorities of those elites often differ from state and regional priorities.

James Madison, the architect of the United States Constitution, understood these problems all too well. Madison is usually viewed as favoring constructing the nation on a large scale. What he urged, in fact, was that a nation of reasonable size had advantages over a very small one. But writing to Jefferson at a time when the population of the United States was a mere four million, Madison expressed concern that if the nation grew too big, elites at the center would divide and conquer a widely dispersed population, producing "tyranny."

Few Americans realize just how huge this nation is. Germany could fit within the borders of Montana. France is smaller than Texas. Leaving aside three nations with large, unpopulated land masses (Russia, Canada and Australia), the United States is geographically larger than all the other advanced industrial countries taken together. Critically, the American population, now roughly 300 million, is projected to reach more than 400 million by the middle of this century. A high Census Bureau estimate suggests it could reach 1.2 billion by 2100.

If the scale of a country renders it unmanageable, there are two possible responses. One is a breakup of the nation; the other is a radical decentralization of power. More than half of the world's 200 nations formed as breakaways after 1946. These days, many nations — including Brazil, Britain, Canada, China, France, Italy and Spain, just to name a few — are devolving power to regions in various ways.

Decades before President Bush decided to teach Iraq a lesson, George F. Kennan worried that what he called our "monster country" would, through the "hubris of inordinate size," inevitably become a menace, intervening all too often in other nations' affairs: "There is a real question as to whether 'bigness' in a body politic is not an evil in itself, quite aside from the policies pursued in its name."

Kennan proposed that devolution, "while retaining certain of the rudiments of a federal government," might yield a "dozen constituent republics, absorbing not only the powers of the existing states but a considerable part of those of the present federal establishment."

Regional devolution would most likely be initiated by a very large state with a distinct sense of itself and aspirations greater than Washington can handle. The obvious candidate is California, a state that has the eighth-largest economy in the world.

If such a state decided to get serious about determining its own fate, other states would have little choice but to act, too. One response might be for an area like New England, which already has many regional interstate arrangements, to follow

California's initiative — as it already has on some environmental measures. And if one or two large regions began to take action, other state groupings in the Northwest, Southwest and elsewhere would be likely to follow.

A new wave of regional devolution could also build on the more than 200 compacts that now allow groups of states to cooperate on environmental, economic, transportation and other problems. Most likely, regional empowerment would be popular: when the Appalachian Regional Commission was established in 1965, senators from across the country rushed to demand commissions to help the economies and constituencies of their regions, too.

Governor Schwarzenegger may not have thought through the implications of continuing to assert forcefully his "nation-state" ambitions. But he appears to have an expansive sense of the possibilities: this is the governor, after all, who brought Prime Minister Tony Blair of Britain to the Port of Long Beach last year to sign an accord between California and Britain on global warming. And he may be closer to the mark than he knows with his dream that "California, the nation-state, the harmonious state, the prosperous state, the cutting-edge state, becomes a model, not just for the 21st-century American society, but for the larger world."

Tax Chambers (WSJ)

By Stephen Moore

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

The Chamber of Commerce, long a supporter of limited government and low taxes, was part of the coalition backing the Reagan revolution in the 1980s. On the national level, the organization still follows a pro-growth agenda -- but thanks to an astonishing political transformation, many chambers of commerce on the state and local level have been abandoning these goals. They're becoming, in effect, lobbyists for big government.

In Colorado, a coalition of property owners, conservative think tanks, anti-tax groups and small businesses fought against a ballot initiative in 2005 that was intended to gut the state's Taxpayer Bill of Rights (Tabor). They lost, and as a result state spending will expand by $5 billion over the next five years, costing the average family several thousand dollars in higher taxes. It was not the teachers' unions or class-warfare liberals who spearheaded the campaign against Tabor, however -- it was the Denver Chamber of Commerce. "This was just one depressing example of how everything bad that happens in Colorado," says Jon Caldera, president of the Independence Institute, "happens with the chamber's endorsement." And not just in Colorado.

In Virginia, the state and local chambers, along with big-business allies, have spent more than $4 million in recent years on ballot initiatives and legislative lobbying to raise $2 billion in taxes for roads, rails, buses and schools. This year they want a billion more for transportation, despite the state's multibillion-dollar surplus, and have even threatened to run candidates against fiscal conservatives in the legislature who take a "no new taxes" pledge.

In as many as half the states, state taxpayer organizations, free market think tanks and small business leaders now complain bitterly that, on a wide range of issues, chambers of commerce deploy their financial resources and lobbying clout to expand the taxing, spending and regulatory authorities of government. This behavior, they note, erodes the very pro-growth climate necessary for businesses -- at least those not connected at the hip with government -- to prosper. Journalist Tim Carney agrees: All too often, he notes in his recent book, "Rip-Off," "state and local chambers have become corrupted by the lure of big dollar corporate welfare schemes."

In New Jersey -- home of some of the worst schools in the nation -- the state chamber took out an ad with the teachers' unions opposing a school-voucher initiative for families in inner cities. The ad was withdrawn only after pro-school reform business members hollered in protest. Last summer taxpayers revolted when Democratic Gov. Jon Corzine called for a $1.5 billion hike in the sales tax; but "the chamber and other business groups sat on their hands in order to avoid making enemies with the legislature," notes Frayda Levin, New Jersey director of Americans for Prosperity.

In Oklahoma the state chamber filed a petition with the state Supreme Court to block eminent domain reform, and vowed to fight a taxpayer-led movement to enact a Colorado-style Tabor. Massachusetts? The state chamber and allied business groups oppose an income tax cut.

The picture isn't all bleak: The New York and Rhode Island state chambers, for example, struggle unflinchingly for low taxes, less regulation and expenditure control. But they are becoming the exceptions. More common is the situation in states such as Maryland. Last November Maryland local chambers announced candidate endorsements: almost all the candidates were the incumbent power holders who voted for an increase in the minimum wage.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce boasts that the organization's "core mission is to fight for business and free enterprise before Congress, the White House, regulatory agencies . . . and governments around the world." The national chamber has done just that, pushing tort reform and free trade -- but in the states, chambers have come to believe their primary function is to secure tax financing for sports stadiums, convention centers, high-tech research institutes and transit boondoggles. Some local chambers have reportedly asked local utilities, school administrators and even politicians to join; others have opened membership to arts councils, museums, civic associations and other "tax eater" entities.

Business owners are beginning to get fed up. In Hawaii, the chamber's cheerleading for higher taxes has caused hundreds of small business members to quit. (Since the early 1990s the chamber has supported three major tax hikes, including a recent a 12% increase in the state gross income tax to fund boondoggle transportation and rail projects.) In Maryland, small business membership is falling. Ellen Valentino, director of the Maryland National Federation of Independent Business, says that while the Maryland chamber provides PAC funds to its political adversaries, "Our membership wouldn't tolerate that."

"I used to think that public employee unions like the NEA were the main enemy in the struggle for limited government, competition and private sector solutions," says Mr. Caldera of the Independence Institute. Deal To Shut Major North Korean Nuclear Facilities Appears Closer (NYT)

By Jim Yardley And David E. Sanger

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

BEIJING, Feb. 9 — North Korea and the United States appeared on Friday to be inching closer to a deal that would establish a schedule for the North to shut down and seal its main nuclear facilities within two months, in return for shipments of fuel oil from South Korea and the beginning of talks over normalization of relations with Washington.

But the top American envoy negotiating the deal here cautioned that the two sides remained stuck on “one or two” small issues.

“Nothing is agreed unless everything is agreed,” the envoy, Christopher R. Hill, an assistant secretary of state, told reporters as he returned to his hotel Friday night. “So I just want to be careful about predicting success tomorrow.”

But in Washington, officials at the White House and the State Department were preparing for a major announcement this weekend, and described the agreement as very different from the nuclear freeze that the Clinton administration negotiated in 1994. That agreement ultimately fell apart, and the North has produced enough fuel for more than half a dozen nuclear weapons during President Bush’s term.

“This is the Libya model,” said one senior administration official, referring to Libya’s decision in late 2003 to turn over all of the equipment it had purchased from the secret nuclear network run by the Pakistani scientist, Abdul Qadeer Khan, to produce bomb fuel. In that agreement, both the Libyans and the United States executed a series of steps, in a carefully negotiated order, that rid the country of nuclear technology and ended its isolation.

It is still unclear exactly what sort of timeline North Korea would agree to, and how quickly it would turn over the plutonium it has produced, along with whatever weapons it may have built. In the past, the Bush administration has said it would never agree to the kind of “freeze” that President Clinton signed, because North Korea was not forced to give up its weapons fuel before it reaped rewards. That allowed the country to quickly restart its nuclear program, officials said.

Administration officials say this agreement would be different, because the biggest benefits for the North would come only after it allowed inspectors, sealed its facilities and began to give up its weapons. But those steps will be difficult to monitor, in part because there is a dispute about how much nuclear material the North possesses.

DOJ_NMG_0130969

In a second stage of the agreement, the North would be required to declare how much nuclear material it has on hand and where it is located, administration officials say. Presumably, that would include the uranium enrichment program that Mr. Khan has admitted helping the North start a decade ago, but which North Korea has denied.

On Friday night, Mr. Hill insisted that North Korea would be required to do more than submit to a "freeze," and also suggested that the process of shutting down the weapons program would be carried out in stages.

"We're interested in shutting things down and continuing, through various phases, to shut down, dismantle, abandon things," he said. "Freeze doesn't describe that process. Freeze suggests a process where you freeze, you thaw out, freeze again. We're not interested in that. We're interested in kind of a one-way process."

Mr. Hill said he remained "cautiously optimistic" and declined to specify which issues were delaying an agreement, though he suggested that North Korea had unexpectedly stalled on minor details. Negotiations resume Saturday, and Mr. Hill said he still hoped that a deal could be struck by the end of the weekend.

The latest negotiations over North Korea's nuclear weapons program began Thursday in Beijing amid tempered optimism that a breakthrough, if a modest one, might be at hand. North Korea and the United States — the key players in talks that also include China, Japan, South Korea and Russia — held fruitful private meetings last month in Berlin.

Mr. Hill and his North Korean counterpart, Kim Kye-gwan, have met privately more than once this week, including for lunch on Friday. Mr. Kim has told reporters that North Korea is "ready to make its first step" toward denuclearization.

The starting point in the talks is a broad accord signed in September 2005, in which North Korea agreed in principle to end its nuclear weapons program in exchange for a package of economic and energy aid, as well as security guarantees.

Subsequent negotiations stalled over the contested details of how and when the accord would be carried out.

This week, though, a rough initial timeline has emerged. Russian, South Korean and Japanese news agencies have reported that a draft proposal circulated by China this week would require North Korea to stop operations at its nuclear reactors and procession facilities within two months in exchange for initial shipments of aid, including energy supplies such as heavy oil.

None of the negotiators have spoken publicly about the specifics of the proposal, but Mr. Hill confirmed that it would require "both sides" to take "initial actions" within weeks. Such a deal would constitute only a first phase of an overall denuclearization plan, and Mr. Hill suggested that more rounds of negotiations could be held in March and April.

The paramount goal of the talks is eliminating North Korea's nuclear weapons program, but the negotiations have been complicated by a host of related issues.

Mr. Hill said the proposed draft would also create five working groups to negotiate separate issues. Analysts say these are likely to include denuclearization, financial sanctions and normalizing diplomatic relations between North Korea and the United States and Japan.

The United States infuriated the North Koreans when it froze $24 million of their country's assets and accused them of laundering counterfeit dollars. North Korea has demanded that the money be released, and financial negotiators from both countries met last week in Beijing. No deal was announced, and some analysts have questioned whether a stalemate could sink a larger denuclearization deal.

But Mr. Hill said the money dispute was not one of the sticking points holding up the current deal. "When I talk about one or two issues," he said of the unresolved problems, "that is not one of them."

NKorea Nuke Deal Close, But Hurdles Remain: US Envoy (AFP)

By Jun Kwanwoo And Shigemi Sato

AFP, February 10, 2007

A deal that would see North Korea take the first steps towards ending its nuclear weapons programme is close but hurdles remain, the chief US envoy to disarmament talks has said.

"There are some sticking points ... one or two issues. That sounds pretty close to a deal," Christopher Hill said Friday after a day of negotiations in the six-nation forum that is seeking to end the isolated regime's atomic ambitions.

Hill said envoys to the talks had agreed on a range of fundamental issues, after host China circulated a draft accord that outlined steps member nations would take to begin the process of North Korea disarming.

"I think we have managed to get through what we thought were tough issues but nothing is agreed until everything is agreed so we must be very cautious," he told reporters.

Under the draft accord, North Korea would close its main nuclear-related facilities, including a five megawatt reactor at Yongbyon, within two months in return for alternative energy sources, press reports said.

Envoys refused to give specifics but said the accord sought to begin implementing a six-party deal from September 2005 in which North Korea agreed to scrap its nuclear programme in return for security guarantees, energy benefits and aid.

That deal fell through two months later over North Korean objections to US financial sanctions imposed against it for alleged money laundering and counterfeiting.

The potential breakthrough this week comes after North Korea conducted its first atomic test in October last year, an event it said confirmed its status as a global nuclear power but which also drew punitive United Nations sanctions.

North Korean envoy Kim Kye-Gwan said following a one-on-one lunch meeting with Hill on Friday that he was prepared to do a deal, but remained non-committal.

"There are some agreements and some contentious points as well. We are trying to make a compromise. Please wait and see," Kim told reporters.

Hill said the responsibility for resolving the final outstanding issues rested with North Korea, and that the negotiations would go into the weekend.

"The DPRK (North Korea) sometimes looks at little things and the little things are sometimes the big things for them," he said.

Hill said one sticking point was the US wish to permanently close North Korea's nuclear facilities, while Pyongyang was intent on committing to "freezing" them, which could leave the way open to an unfreezing.

"We are not interested in freezing things. We are interested in shutting things down," he said.

Japanese envoy Kenichiro Sasae gave a more pessimistic assessment on Friday night of the two days of six-party talks, which group China, the two Koreas, Japan, Russia and the United States.

"At this point we cannot say that there is a prospect for an agreement being reached," he said.

However US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said on Thursday after the first day of talks that she was hopeful of progress.

Rice said preparatory negotiations, including rare direct meetings between Hill and Kim in Berlin last month, had paved the way for the September 2005 deal to be revived.

"I think we are cautiously optimistic there may be some movement forward," she said in Washington.

South Korea's Yonhap news agency, citing unidentified but multiple sources, reported the draft accord involved North Korea committing to freeze its Yongbyon reactor and a radiochemical laboratory.

It would also have to allow international nuclear inspectors back into the country, and in return would receive an unspecified amount of energy aid from the five other countries involved in the talks, Yonhap said.

Scott Snyder, a senior associate at US-based The Asia Foundation, said the deal would likely see North Korea receive at least 500,000 tonnes of oil.

North Korea would also want to see at least a partial lifting of the US financial sanctions, which have led to 24 million dollars being frozen in a Macau bank, he said.

The six-party forum began in 2003 with the intent of convincing North Korea to disarm. But it has seen many false dawns and failed to stop the regime from conducting its atomic test.

North Korea Nuclear Deal In Trouble (AP)

negotiator said he felt there was no prospect of an agreement late Friday on the draft on how to implement a 2005 agreement that calls for Pyongyang to disarm in exchange for security guarantees and aid.

"There are some parts in which we had progress but on others we ran into difficulty," Sasae told reporters after daylong meetings with the other delegates.

"We will continue with the talks, but at this point in time I don't feel there is a prospect of reaching an agreement," he said without elaborating.

Earlier Friday, the main U.S. negotiator, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, and his North Korean counterpart, Vice Foreign Minister Kim Kye Gwan, suggested the differences were not insurmountable.

"I think we can be cautiously optimistic," Hill said after a two-hour lunch meeting with Kim, the first bilateral session between the two sides at this week's talks.

Kim said the meeting led to agreement on some unspecified issues, although there were still issues to overcome. "We are going to make more efforts to resolve them," Kim said.

"As someone said, don't waste your energy trying to count chickens before they hatch," he said, quoting remarks by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice made Thursday in Washington.

Late Thursday after the first day of talks, China distributed a draft agreement to the nuclear envoys from China, Japan, the two Koreas, Russia and the United States.

The proposal — presented after North Korea agreed in principle to take initial steps to disarm — would grant the communist nation unspecified energy aid for shutting down its main nuclear facilities within two months, South Korea's Yonhap news agency reported.

Officials declined to confirm details of the draft.

Hill said earlier Friday he saw "differences" among the delegations over the draft deal.

"Opinions were expressed around the room, sometimes divergent opinions on the Chinese draft," Hill said. "There are some differences of views among the various delegations."

A South Korean official also cautioned against being too optimistic. The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because of the issue's sensitivity, said it is "not as easy as expected to produce a result due to differences in positions and a conflict of interests."

Both Hill and the South Korean official declined to elaborate on what the differences were.

But a pro-Pyongyang newspaper in Japan said the North wants the U.S. first to show that it has permanently ceased its "hostile" policy toward Pyongyang.

"As conditions mature, (North Korea) can halt the operation of the Yongbyon nuclear facilities," the Choson Sinbo said, referring to the site of the North's main nuclear complex north of Pyongyang.

"The (North)'s position is that it can take corresponding measures when the U.S. takes steps to show that it irreversibly gave up its hostile policy," it said.

The report, carried on the paper's Web site, cited a "diplomatic source well versed in" the negotiations. The paper, with links to the government in Pyongyang, is considered one of the North's propaganda tools.

Any agreement on an initial set of reciprocal moves to implement a September 2005 accord — in which North Korea pledged to disarm in exchange for aid and security guarantees — would set the stage for the first tangible steps in the often-delayed six-nation process.

The 2005 deal, a broad statement of principles that did not outline any concrete steps for dismantling North Korea's nuclear program, was the only agreement since the negotiations began in 2003.

At the last session of the arms negotiations in December, following North Korea's Oct. 9 underground nuclear test, the North refused to even talk about its nuclear programs. Instead, it demanded the U.S. lift financial restrictions targeting alleged North Korean counterfeiting and money laundering.

U.N. Chief Gives Key Post To American (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 9 — Stirred by criticism of the slow pace of senior appointments, Ban Ki-moon, the new United Nations secretary general, on Friday named four new cabinet members, including an American diplomat, while keeping a dozen other senior officials in place.

B. Lynn Pascoe, the United States ambassador to Indonesia, becomes under secretary general for political affairs, a delicate position in United Nations efforts to mediate disputes in international trouble spots. Mr. Pascoe, a Chinese speaker, has extensive experience in Asia.

Shortly after taking office on Jan. 1, Mr. Ban, the former foreign minister of South Korea, asked 55 assistant and under secretaries general to tender their resignations to allow him flexibility in forming his team.

He said Friday that he had accepted 17 of resignations, one of which was from Shashi Tharoor of India, the under secretary general for communications and public information, who finished second in the contest last summer to be secretary general. He will be replaced by Kiyotaka Akasaka of Japan, a former ambassador to the United Nations and a top negotiator at the Kyoto Conference on Climate Change.

Among those Mr. Ban retained from the administration of Kofi Annan, the former secretary general, was Jean-Marie Guéhenno of France, the under secretary general for peacekeeping operations.

Mr. Pascoe succeeds Ibrahim A. Gambari of Nigeria, who took the post in July 2005, ending decades in which a Briton held the job. Britain had put forward Sir John Holmes, its ambassador to France, for the political affairs position, but he instead was chosen last month to be under secretary general for humanitarian affairs, succeeding Jan Egeland of Norway, who resigned in December.

The announcements were made by Mr. Ban's new chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar of India, as complaints circulated widely among United Nations ambassadors who said Mr. Ban's decision-making was secretive, impulsive and badly planned. The complaints follow questions about Mr. Ban's decision last month to fill specialized posts with people who had no apparent experience in running large operations.

In answer to questions on Friday, Mr. Nambiar said Mr. Ban was aware of unhappiness over the time it was taking to make appointments.

"There has been a slippage in terms of the time that is required, but that has been for a variety of reasons, and he is conscious that he needs to make these appointments as quickly as possible," Mr. Nambiar said. "More than anybody else, I suppose, he is interested in having his team together."

Ban Changes U.N. At The Top (WT)

By Betsy Pisik

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

NEW YORK -- American diplomat B. Lynn Pascoe was named U.N. undersecretary-general for political affairs yesterday in a sweeping management shake-up that promises to boost the United States' voice in the organization's diplomacy and peace-making efforts.

Mr. Pascoe, 63, has served in senior posts in Malaysia, Moscow and the State Department in Washington. A fluent Mandarin speaker, he has also worked in Beijing, Taiwan, and with the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe.

His appointment was part of a broad reorganization of top management by Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, who took office last month.

Mr. Ban accepted resignations from five undersecretaries-general, including Shashi Tharoor, who headed the Department of Communications and Public Information. The telegenic Mr. Tharoor, of India, had briefly challenged Mr. Ban for the top U.N. post.

Jean-Marie Guehenno will remain undersecretary-general for peacekeeping for at least another year, which should allow a degree of continuity as the office is reorganized and field missions are expanded.

Several key hires, such as Deputy Secretary-General Asha-Rose Migiro of Tanzania, had previously been announced.

DOJ_NMG_0130973

The cumulative appointments -- 20 altogether since the beginning of the year -- mix traces of new blood with familiar faces from former Secretary-General Kofi Annan's administration.

They include several career foreign diplomats well known to Mr. Ban from his years in the South Korean Foreign Ministry.

"The point of the secretary-general's appointments is to be able to impart a certain dynamic to his own tenure," said Mr. Ban's chief of staff, Vijay Nambiar.

Despite the deeply entrenched politics of U.N. appointments -- in which key countries stake a claim on a department and all but dictate who shall fill it -- Mr. Ban exercised autonomy in his selections, Mr. Nambiar said.

"He has made it clear that the appointments will be his appointments and not appointments on the basis of political arrangements," Mr. Nambiar told reporters.

The Department of Economic and Social Affairs -- whose senior management has been subjected to several internal inquiries after reports in The Washington Times and other news outlets, will be headed by Sha Zukang, a career Chinese foreign ministry official who specialized in arms control, trade and other multilateral issues.

Mr. Sha most recently served as China's ambassador to the United Nations in Geneva.

The new head of public information, Kiyotaka Akasaka, is a former Japanese ambassador to the United Nations who is fluent in English and French, and speaks a bit of Portuguese.

Some 55 senior officials submitted letters of resignation last month in response to Mr. Ban's request. It is easier -- and more diplomatic -- to accept a letter of resignation instead of firing a person.

U.N. officials to be retained for at least another year include: Nicolas Michel, the Swiss-born undersecretary-general for legal affairs; Ad Melkert, the Dutch associate administrator of the U.N. Development Program; Thoraya Obaid of Saudi Arabia, executive director of the U.N. Population Fund; and Antonio Maria Costa of Italy, director-general of the U.N. offices in Vienna, Austria, and the Office of Drug and Crime Prevention.

In Palestinian Peace Deal, Hope And A Political Snare (NYT)

By Steven Erlanger

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 9 — The agreement in Mecca between Fatah and Hamas on how to form a unity government was greeted with relief by many Palestinians on Friday as their best hope for an end to the fighting among them that has killed nearly 100 Palestinians since December.

But it poses a challenge for the Bush administration, which, along with Israel and several European countries, wants the new government to meet three benchmarks for normal relations: recognize the right of Israel to exist, forswear violence and accept previous Israeli-Palestinian agreements. Without the three — and the Mecca accord does not accept them — an international boycott on the Palestinians would continue.

The administration will have to work hard to keep unity among its partners in the quartet — the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations — on the three conditions.

Russia has already demurred, welcoming the accord and saying that once the new government is formed it “should be combined with lifting a blockade of the Palestinian territories which has inflicted suffering and hardship to the people.”

The French also welcomed the deal, but the European Union spokeswoman, Emma Udwin, was cautious, saying that all parties agreed “to take the time to consider, to see what the agreement is and how it is going to be implemented” before deciding whether to lift the embargo.

The United States will also be reluctant to dismiss the Saudis’ accomplishments as brokers of the accord, given Washington’s interest in creating a broader moderate Arab coalition, including Egypt, Jordan and the Persian Gulf countries, to confront Iran’s nuclear ambitions and regional reach.

Already, Hamas has appealed for talks with the Europeans. Western nations “cannot ignore this agreement and impose their own conditions,” said Ghazi Hamad, the Hamas government spokesman. “The European Union should open a dialogue with this new government, and this is the only way to have stability in the region.”

DOJ_NMG_0130974

The accord for the new government does not promise to stop attacks on Israel and Israelis, though one of the documents it referred to urges Palestinians to "focus" attacks on Israeli-occupied areas outside the 1967 boundary lines.

As for recognizing Israel, Nizar Rayyan, a Hamas spokesman, was explicit. "We will never recognize Israel," he told [a news organization] in Gaza. "There is nothing called Israel, neither in reality nor in the imagination."

The Palestinian Authority's president, Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, pressed by Washington, wanted a new government to accept previous agreements on the basis of which the Palestinian Authority itself exists. But Hamas, which will still dominate the new government, agreed only to "respect" previous agreements, not to accept them.

For Mr. Abbas, aides said, the most important accomplishment of the Mecca meeting was to try to stop the bloodletting, which was humiliating to Palestinians and to the Arab and other governments that support them. Sufian Abu Zaida, a former Fatah minister of prisoners and an aide to Mr. Abbas, said: "The main goal of this agreement is to save Palestinian blood. If they succeed in this, it's a successful meeting. But in the long run, if they can't end the economic and political siege, there is no guarantee that the government will last very long."

But Mr. Abbas also looked weak, put by the Saudis in a position of symbolic equality with the exiled Hamas political leader Khaled Meshal and unable to produce an agreement on the international benchmarks. A new government would also mean that Mr. Abbas's threat to call early legislative and presidential elections would be hollow.

Fatah will take six positions in the new government, most of them relatively minor except that of deputy prime minister, which is likely to be filled by Muhammad Dahlan. Hamas will also continue to control the critical Interior Ministry through a so-called independent figure nominated by Hamas.

Many difficult issues are unresolved, including Hamas's demands for reform of the Palestine Liberation Organization, as well as who might fill particular cabinet posts.

An Israeli official, speaking on condition of anonymity before a full official government response, suggested that if Washington considered Mr. Abbas to have been compromised by the agreement — brought closer to Hamas, rather than Hamas brought closer to him — "it could have repercussions" for the planned summit meeting on Feb. 19 between the Israeli prime minister, Ehud Olmert, and Mr. Abbas, to be led by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

No one expects serious peace negotiations with Mr. Olmert and Mr. Abbas so weakened politically, but the talks may become more of a conflict management exercise than before. The United States warned Mr. Abbas about the dangers of a unity government headed by Hamas. Tzachi Hanegbi, chairman of Parliament's foreign and defense committee, said that Mr. Abbas "failed completely and awarded a significant victory to Hamas." As a result, he told Israel Radio, "the chance of advancing an effective initiative and an agreement between Israel and the Palestinians has receded."

Saudi Arabia, for its part, emerges as a winner for playing host to the meeting, taking responsibility for the Palestinian cause and lessening the influence of Shiite Iran on Hamas.

Hamas emerges as a winner for sticking to its refusal to bow to Western demands and recognize Israel, renounce "resistance" or accept previous agreements like the 1993 Oslo accords, while co-opting Fatah into the "unity" government Hamas wanted and short-circuiting any threat of early elections.

Ordinary Palestinians will feel they are winners if the killing stops. In Jerusalem's Old City on Friday, Abbas Abu Helem, 36, who sells clothes in a stall, said he hoped that the Mecca talks would be a success.

"I hope it will stop the fighting," he said. "We now have a deal, and I hope the factions can work together, because our life keeps getting harder and harder."

No Peace For Israel In Pact (WT)

By Joshua Mitnick

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

TEL AVIV -- Officials from Hamas and Israel dashed hopes yesterday that a Palestinian unity deal reached in the Saudi holy city of Mecca would end a crippling economic embargo or lead to a resumption of Palestinian-Israeli peace talks.

"Our battle with the Israeli enemy is still on," Fathi Hamad, a Hamas leader in Gaza's Jebaliya refugee camp, told thousands of supporters.

DOJ_NMG_0130975

He urged militant groups to resume attacks on Israel and denied that Hamas would respect past peace deals with the Jewish state -- a central element of the accord between Hamas and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas brokered by Saudi diplomats Thursday.

"We will be the spearhead of jihad ... to defend Palestine and Arab and Muslim nations," Mr. Hamad said, according to an Associated Press dispatch from Gaza.

Israel stopped short of a formal response, but Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told a security conference in Munich that Hamas remained dedicated to Israel's destruction.

"Hamas is not using terrorism to build a peaceful Palestinian state but to destroy the other, to destroy Israel. ... We cannot afford a terror state," Mrs. Livni said.

In Israel, a top lawmaker in the ruling Kadima party said the accord falls short of conditions set by the international community to lift an economic embargo against the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority.

"Abbas failed yesterday. He gave the Hamas a big victory," said Tzachi Hanegbi, chairman of the parliament's Defense and Foreign Relations Committee. "Regarding whether this helps the peace process, I'd say it's a step backwards."

Israel, the United States, Europe and other would-be Mideast peace brokers have demanded the Palestinian Authority recognize Israel and honor previous agreements between the two sides.

Despite fireworks and demonstrations between supporters of Hamas and Mr. Abbas' Fatah movements to celebrate the Mecca agreement, Palestinians said they were worried that it would not end intra-Palestinian fighting that has grown increasingly deadly in recent weeks.

"There are fears that this agreement is only a superficial one, since it is difficult to clear all the bitter feelings towards each other in such a short period of time," wrote Mahmoud El Battash in the Palestinian daily newspaper El Hayat Al Jadidah.

"As a result of this, another cycle of violence might erupt."

Dozens of Palestinians have been killed in the past two weeks in street battles that made Gaza look as if it were deep into a civil war.

Mohammed Dahlan, a leading Fatah strongman in Gaza who was present at the talks, told the Arabic cable channel Al Arabiya that the agreement will be difficult to implement and that it was concluded under pressure from the Saudi government.

An adviser to Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh, the top Hamas official in the Palestinian government, said that the Islamic militants don't consider themselves obliged to carry out parts of the agreement that the Israelis have not kept.

The adviser, Ahmed Yousef, said Hamas hopes the deal will enable the European Union to persuade the United States and others to restore aid to the Palestinians.

"I count on the Europeans to change their policies, and to say that what happened in Mecca shows ideological flexibility," he said. "The Europeans have their own interest, and they should care about the image and perception. They don't want their image in the region to be like the U.S."

A top Fatah official in Gaza said the agreement was drawn up first and foremost to stop a civil war. Fulfilling the demands of the so-called Quartet was secondary, he said. The Quartet joins the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia in a bid to restart Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

In Washington, the Bush administration said it is too soon to tell whether plans for a unified Palestinian government will meet international conditions for legitimacy and financial aid.

"We still haven't seen enough of the details on this to give you an answer," State Department spokesman Tom Casey said.

In Europe and at the United Nations, the reaction to the Mecca accord was slightly more upbeat.

France urged the international community yesterday to back the proposed national unity government formed by rival Palestinian factions.

"The inclusion in this government's program of respecting international resolutions and agreements signed by the PLO constitutes a step in the right direction toward full adherence to the international community's demands," French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazy said.

DOJ_NMG_0130976

At U.N. headquarters, representatives of the so-called Quartet -- the U.N., United States, European Union and Russia -- expressed hope yesterday that a Palestinian accord on sharing power in a coalition government would end months of deadly factional violence.

In the Arab world the emphasis was on calls to end the Western embargo against Hamas.

Arab League Secretary-General Amr Moussa called on the quartet of Middle East mediators to take the Palestinian agreement into consideration "and to consequently lift the embargo," the League said in a statement.

U.S. Wary Of New Palestinian Accord (WP)

By Glenn Kessler, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Deal Could Divide Washington and Its Allies, Affect Rice's Mideast Peace Mission

The deal to create a Palestinian national unity government, announced Thursday in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, threatens to expose divisions between the United States and its European allies while complicating Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's peace mission later this month, diplomats and analysts said yesterday.

The Bush administration reacted cautiously to the announcement that, after a year of deadly feuding, Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas and his Fatah party had agreed to join a government led by the militant group Hamas. The deal was brokered by Saudi Arabia, which is said to have pledged $1 billion to the Palestinians.

"We can't offer a reaction beyond the fact that we remain committed to a two-state solution and the Palestinian people deserve a government that is committed to that goal," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said.

Few details of the agreement have been released, except a vague statement in which Abbas called upon Hamas to "respect international resolutions," which appeared to fall far short of international demands that the new government commit to recognizing Israel. Indeed, Hamas officials later told reporters that the movement has no intention of doing so.

Under the deal, Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas would remain prime minister and Hamas would retain the largest number of ministries, although some key ministries would go to independents.

The announcement comes as Rice is preparing for a major plunge in Middle East peacemaking, meeting with Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert on Feb. 19 to begin sketching the contours of a Palestinian state. This week, Rice met with Israeli, Egyptian and Palestinian envoys in preparation for the summit, and U.S. officials said yesterday that she remains committed to her plans.

Dennis Ross, who was a Middle East envoy for two presidents, said the announcement is a blow to Rice's efforts both on the Palestinian front and in the broader region.

Rice in recent months has tended to divide the region between "mainstream" and "extremist" actors. That has included bolstering security forces loyal to Abbas as he confronts Hamas, which she has labeled an extremist group.

But now, Ross said, Saudi Arabia has demonstrated its interest in maintaining the divide between Sunni and Shiite Muslim regions. Hamas is largely Sunni but had come under the sway of Shiite Iran and Syria. The deal -- and the offer of money -- brings Hamas back into the Sunni camp, Ross said, calling it a "triumph for Saudi diplomacy."

U.S. officials have worked on the assumption that an Abbas-negotiated peace outline with Israel -- what Rice calls a "political horizon" -- would bolster his standing among Palestinians and, if Hamas rejects the agreement, would allow him to put the matter to a vote.

Ross said that, under a national unity government, Hamas will be able finally to pay salaries and run ministries, helping the day-to-day lives of Palestinians, while Abbas will be forced to embrace unpleasant compromises in negotiations, actually weakening his position.

The agreement "is a trap for her," Ross said, referring to Rice. "It is hard to see how this is good for producing a political horizon."

A Palestinian adviser to Abbas who spoke on the condition of anonymity said the deal is not intended to resolve the power struggle. "This is to buy us time and buy us some stability," the adviser said.

DOJ_NMG_0130977

Israeli officials, who have long viewed such a government as a dangerous possibility, said a formal response will come after the country's cabinet meets tomorrow. But Israeli officials privately said the agreement is not acceptable.

In an interview with The Washington Post in September, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said a national unity government that does not explicitly recognize Israel would lull the world into complacency.

"It is easy for us to see something black, Hamas, and white, Abu Mazen [Abbas's nickname], but sometimes the in-between, the gray, is sometimes the most dangerous," because it will appear legitimate through the presence of Abbas while Hamas continues to be an anti-Israel militia movement, she said. "They can get legitimacy and get the checks, but we cannot end the conflict."

Washington's wary attitude, citing a need to see more details, was echoed by Germany, which currently holds the rotating presidency of the European Union. The "Quartet" -- the diplomatic group that monitors Middle East peace and is made up of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations -- reiterated that any new Palestinian government must renounce violence, recognize Israel and respect peace deals for aid to resume.

But France and Russia immediately welcomed the statement, with Russia calling for an end to the freeze on direct aid to the Palestinians. French Foreign Minister Philippe Douste-Blazay said that the agreement is "a step in the right direction" toward eventual recognition of Israel and that "the international community must encourage and support the formation of the new government."

U.S. Cautious On Palestinian Accord (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 10, 2007

The United States and other world powers avoided endorsing a planned political bargain between warring Palestinian factions Friday, saying it was too soon to say if the new government will meet international conditions for legitimacy and financial aid.

The Bush administration said little in public beyond careful praise for Saudi Arabia's role in bringing the two factions together. Behind the scenes, officials did not sound optimistic that the deal can end Palestinian violence or a year-old international boycott.

"Peace is not at hand," said one U.S. official, speaking on condition of anonymity because Washington is still reviewing the deal's details.

The U.S.-backed Palestinian president, Mahmoud Abbas, struck a power-sharing deal Thursday with rival Hamas militants. The deal is meant to end more than a year of political uncertainty since Hamas won parliamentary elections, and stop months of internal factional violence that has killed more than 130 Palestinians.

The deal was announced in a brief statement that does not expressly meet international conditions for Hamas: to renounce violence, accept Israel and abide by agreements made by the previous secular Palestinian government.

"The Palestinians deserve a government that is clearly and credibly committed to the principles," State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said Friday. He said there is no change in U.S. policy toward either Abbas or Hamas, which the West lists as a terrorist group.

A joint statement Friday from the U.S., United Nations, European Union and Russia noted that the group had recently reaffirmed the terms for supporting a Palestinian government.

The group represents sponsors of a dormant 2003 peace proposal that would establish an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel. Neither Israel nor the Palestinians have met initial terms of that bargain.

The group's statement made no judgments about the deal but "expressed hope that the desired calm would prevail." The group said it will meet Feb. 21 in Berlin to continue a review of plans for the unified Palestinian government.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice still plans a trip to the Middle East later this month, McCormack said, and there are no plans to scrap a Feb. 19 meeting among Rice, Abbas and Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

At stake is roughly $1 billion a year in frozen aid from foreign donors in addition to approximately $500 million in withheld tax revenues collected by Israel on behalf of the Palestinians. The embargo has crippled the Palestinian government's ability to function, though the West and Israel have funneled millions of dollars through Abbas' office to prevent a complete collapse of the government.

If the U.S. and Israel are not convinced Hamas has sufficiently moderated, the West is unlikely to lift the sanctions, and it will be difficult to advance the peace process.

Quartet Again Urges Palestinian Government To Recognize Israel (AFP)

AFP, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - The international Quartet pushing the Middle East peace process urged the next Palestinian national unity government to recognize Israel.

"While awaiting formation of the new Palestinian government, the Quartet reaffirmed its statement of February 2 regarding its support for a Palestinian government committed to nonviolence, recognition of Israel, and acceptance of previous agreements and obligations, including the roadmap," the group said in a joint statement released by the US State Department.

The statement said the Quartet -- the European Union, Russia, the United Nations and the United States -- will meet in Berlin on February 21 "to continue their consideration of these developments, and to review formation and implementation of the agreement on the government."

"The Quartet will discuss the way ahead at the February 21 meeting," the statement added.

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and US President George W. Bush have laid out a Middle East strategy focused on rallying what they call "mainstream" Arab forces to isolate "extremists" backed by Syria and Iran.

Washington has largely ignored the Quartet for most of the Bush administration, and a ministerial meeting February 2 was the first in five months.

Rival factions Hamas and Fatah have condemned the failure of the major powers involved in Middle East peacemaking to end a punishing Western aid embargo on the Palestinians.

A Palestinian Pact (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

THE IMMEDIATE aim of the accord between Palestinian factions reached in Mecca on Thursday is to end internecine fighting that has killed more than 90 people in the past two months. If it achieves that end, the deal between Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas and the Islamic Hamas movement will at least prevent the eruption of another civil war in the Middle East. Saudi Arabia, which hosted the talks, can also hope that its diplomacy -- and the reported promise of $1 billion in aid to the new government -- will begin to draw the Sunni Hamas movement away from its alliance with Shiite Iran. All that would be decidedly to the good.

Whether the deal serves to advance an Israeli-Palestinian peace process is another and considerably more uncertain question. Because his main aim was to stop bloodshed among the Palestinians, Mr. Abbas didn't insist that Hamas meet the three conditions set by Israel, the United States and other outside powers for a resumption of aid. Hamas still hasn't recognized Israel or sworn off violence, and the "respect" for "international resolutions" and previous Palestinian-Israeli agreements included in the pact falls short of a commitment to compliance. Consequently, a cloud has fallen over the three-way meeting of Mr. Abbas, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice planned for Feb. 19.

Hamas nevertheless shifted its position, if only slightly. Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based hardliner who torpedoed a Palestinian deal last June by ordering the kidnapping of an Israeli soldier, agreed for the first time to a "unity" government not controlled by Hamas. While the movement's current prime minister will remain in office, Hamas will not have a cabinet majority and the foreign and finance ministers will be independent moderates. What remains to be seen is whether the coalition government successfully forms and takes steps that would be welcomed by Israel, such as releasing the captive soldier and enforcing a cease-fire in Gaza that has been regularly breached by the firing of Palestinian rockets.

For now, the accord has confounded an already confused U.S. policy in the Middle East. Having recently divided the region into "moderates" and "extremists," the Bush administration was attempting to strengthen the "moderate" Mr. Abbas against the "extremist" Hamas. Now another of the "moderates," Saudi Arabia, has stepped into the diplomatic vacuum created by American policy and brokered a deal across a divide that only the Bush administration and Israel perceived; as the Saudis see it, the dividing line in the region is sectarian, not ideological. Unable to embrace the Palestinian accord but reluctant to offend a Saudi ally it has been counting on for help against Iran, the Bush administration adopted an awkward wait-and-see position. As events unfold in the coming days, it will watch from the sidelines, to which it has been relegated by its own ineptitude.

Arab Protesters In Jerusalem Clash With Israeli Forces (NYT)

By Greg Myre

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 9 — Israeli troops charged onto the grounds of Jerusalem's most contentious religious site on Friday and fired tear gas and stun grenades at stone-throwing Palestinians who were protesting Israeli excavation work taking place nearby.

The confrontation, which began immediately after midday worship on the Muslim day of prayer, marked the fourth straight day of Palestinian protests against Israel's renovation of a 50-yard walkway leading up to the compound, known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount.

The clashes quickly spread to streets nearby and to other parts of Jerusalem's Old City as Palestinian youths barred from the compound hurled stones at a large contingent of Israeli police officers in riot gear. Over all, 19 Israeli police officers and 17 Palestinian protesters suffered minor injuries, and 17 Palestinians were arrested.

Because of the holy site's significance to Jews and Muslims, any dispute has the potential to ignite a major conflict here and in the wider region. The latest trouble began Tuesday when work on the walkway began.

Palestinians say they fear that a section of the foundation of part of the 35-acre compound could be damaged, and Muslim countries have joined in criticizing Israel. But Israel says that it is carrying out routine repair work that does not endanger the mosque compound, and that Muslim extremists are trying to manufacture a crisis.

With tensions running high, Israel prohibited men under 45 to attend Friday Prayer at the mosque. But some younger men did manage to get inside, and they emerged from the prayers chanting "God is great."

They immediately headed toward the police and began throwing stones and bottles at the officers, who were just outside the gate of the compound. Some 200 police officers then ran onto the grounds, firing tear gas and stun grenades, sending up clouds of smoke.

As they chased the stone-throwers, the police approached the entrances to Al Aksa Mosque and the Dome of the Rock shrine, but did not enter.

"There is no justification for what they did today," Adnan Husseini, the director of the Islamic Waqf, the trust that runs the mosque compound, said of the Israelis.

But Micky Rosenfeld, a spokesman for the Israeli police, said the officers had used "a minimum amount of force to disperse the rioters after they started throwing rocks."

In the past, Palestinians have thrown rocks from the compound at Jewish worshipers praying below at the Western Wall. When the disturbances broke out Friday, the police directed Jewish worshipers to leave.

The compound has often been a flash point for clashes between Israel and the Palestinians.

The second Palestinian uprising, or intifada, erupted on Sept. 29, 2000, at the mosque compound, one day after Ariel Sharon, then Israel's opposition leader, made a visit under heavy guard to emphasize Israel's claim of sovereignty over the site.

The walkway, which is adjacent to the Western Wall, is used primarily by tourists and some Jews to visit the mosque compound, which is built atop the ruins of the biblical Temples.

The walkway was damaged by a snowstorm and an earthquake three years ago and needed to be repaired, according to the Israelis. Because Friday is part of the Israeli weekend, no one was working there when the violence erupted. The office of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in a statement on Thursday that the renovations "do not constitute any damage to the Mount or Islamic holy places."

"The work is being carried out by professionals and with the complete transparency, entirely for the safety of visitors," the statement said.

DOJ_NMG_0130980

But the site is so holy to Jews and Muslims that any action by either side tends to provoke howls of protest.

Many Palestinians claim that the Israelis want to destroy the mosque complex and build a new Temple. While some fringe Jewish groups have expressed that desire, the Israeli government says the compound will remain a place for Muslim worship, as it has been for most of the last 1,300 years.

"The Israeli plan is very clear," said Maher Gounamah, 40, a Palestinian money-changer. "They want to do something much bigger, and they are starting at this point."

The Israeli digging has been the top story for several days on pan-Arab television channels like Al Jazeera. Several Arab countries, including Jordan and Saudi Arabia, have been critical of Israel's plans. Iran's president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, said that the "Zionist regime always does something to cause tension and escalate hostility."

In the past, Muslim authorities have carried out renovations of their own at the mosque compound. Seven years ago the Waqf removed thousands of tons of dirt in trucks to make way for a staircase. Israeli archaeologists complained that the work removed many artifacts from the periods of the First and Second Jewish Temples, and that the dirt and the artifacts were tossed into a garbage dump.

Just last month, Mr. Husseini, the director of the Waqf, complained that he wanted to carry out additional renovations that were being prohibited by Israel.

Palestinians Riot At Jerusalem Shrine (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

JERUSALEM, Feb. 9 -- Palestinians clashed with Israeli police Friday at one of this city's holiest sites and demonstrated across the West Bank to protest a construction project Israel has begun here near a pair of venerated mosques.

The work near Haram al-Sharif, a complex of 7th-century mosques and olive groves known by Jews as the Temple Mount, also sparked angry demonstrations in Cairo on the campus of the Arab world's most esteemed Islamic university and in several Palestinian refugee camps in Lebanon.

The foreign minister of Indonesia, the world's most populous Islamic nation, demanded that Israel immediately halt the work here near the al-Aqsa mosque and Dome of the Rock, where Muslims believe the prophet Muhammad ascended to Heaven, the third-holiest site in Islam.

Dressed in riot gear, hundreds of police officers poured into the area as thousands of Palestinians finished Friday prayers. Groups of Palestinians hurled rocks at police, who responded with tear gas, concussion grenades and rubber-coated bullets for more than an hour.

Palestinian hospital officials said 30 people were treated for injuries, including two Palestinians wounded by metal-jacketed bullets that witnesses said police fired into the air and trees. About 15 Israeli police officers were lightly injured in the rioting, the worst in the Old City in years.

Several of the injured were carried out on stretchers through the Lion's Gate, the locus of the skirmishes. "We finished the prayers and said, 'God is great, God is great,' then the shooting and grenades began," said Abed Owais, 45, a scrap-metal salesman from Jerusalem. "I think they want to change the view of the al-Aqsa mosque so when anyone looks at it from the outside they will see only Jewish tradition."

Israeli crews began work this week on a damaged access ramp that leads from the Western Wall plaza, where Jews pray at the base of the Temple Mount, to the Mugrabi Gate. The entrance, one of eight to the mosque complex, is used by Israeli soldiers and tourists to reach the plateau where the Second Temple stood until its destruction in A.D. 70.

In September 2000, a visit by then-opposition leader Ariel Sharon to the Temple Mount set off clashes that marked the start of the most recent Palestinian uprising.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who was Jerusalem's mayor in 1996 when the opening of a tunnel along the length of the Western Wall set off deadly riots, has rejected requests to stop the work now underway. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said "political extremists" were using the situation as a pretext to demonstrate.

DOJ_NMG_0130981

In a statement issued Thursday, Olmert said: "The work is being carried out by professionals and with complete transparency, entirely for the safety of visitors to the Mount. A thorough examination of the matter would reveal that nothing about the work underway will harm anyone, and there is no truth in the contentions against the work."

The project is being done to replace the earthen ramp Israel built after seizing the Old City from Jordan in the 1967 Middle East war. The ramp washed away in heavy rains three years ago.

In November, the Jerusalem municipality approved plans to more than double the length of the ramp and widen it, threatening walls dating to the 7th-century Omayyad rule of Jerusalem. Israeli state archaeologists have been supervising preliminary excavations at the site for several weeks and say nothing of historical importance will be harmed by the project.

But Arab leaders across the region, including the head of the Islamic Movement in Israel, a political organization, warned this week that the project could damage the mosques and called for demonstrations that have gained momentum in recent days.

The U.N. Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization has also issued a statement asking Israel "to suspend any action that could endanger the spirit of mutual respect."

Hundreds of Israeli police officers stood at the entrances to the Old City before prayers, barring Palestinian men younger than 45.

A white Israeli surveillance blimp floated above Haram al-Sharif as more than 10,000 Palestinians assembled to pray. Many of them were young men who evaded the police checkpoints, and witnesses said hundreds of them later took refuge from police inside the al-Aqsa mosque.

The crowd eventually dispersed, filing through the Old City gates, prayer rugs draped over shoulders.

"We are planted in this mosque," Owais said. "The demonstrations will continue, God willing."

Project At Holy Site Stirs Rioting (WT/AP)

By Diaa Hadid

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

JERUSALEM -- Anger over Israeli construction to repair a damaged ramp near a disputed Jerusalem holy site erupted into violence yesterday as police used tear gas and stun grenades to disperse thousands of rioting Muslims. Protests spread across the Arab world, with demonstrators accusing Israel of plotting to harm Islamic shrines.

Israeli officials accused Palestinians of distorting the project to rally their fractious population against the Jewish state. They insist that the replacement of the ramp, which was damaged in a 2004 snowstorm, would not harm the holy site about 200 feet away.

"We have nothing to hide and yet extremist elements with a hateful agenda have cynically provoked violence by deliberately spreading mistruths about what we're doing," Foreign Ministry spokesman Mark Regev said.

Known to Muslims as the Noble Sanctuary and to Jews as the Temple Mount, the compound has repeatedly been a flash point for violence between Israel and the Palestinians, and there were fears the unrest could spread.

The compound is home to the golden-capped Dome of the Rock shrine and Al Aqsa mosque and is thought to be the site where the prophet Muhammad ascended to heaven. Jews venerate the compound as the site of their biblical temples, and one of its outer walls -- known as the Western Wall -- is the holiest site in Judaism.

Small protests against the renovation began as soon as work started this week. They became violent after Friday prayers, when Muslims at the compound began throwing rocks at police stationed outside, police said.

About 200 riot police streamed into the compound, scuffling with some of the 3,000 Muslim worshippers. Clouds of tear gas rose up at the holy site, and stun grenades set off sharp booms.

Outside the compound, near Lion's Gate, hundreds of teenagers who had been barred from the mosque hurled stones, iron bars, vegetables and at least one firebomb at police, authorities said. Police responded with stun grenades.

Jewish worshippers were evacuated from the Western Wall plaza at the foot of the compound as a precaution.

The situation grew especially volatile when 150 protesters barricaded themselves inside Al Aqsa. But police did not enter the mosque, and the protesters began leaving 90 minutes later, following negotiations between police and Muslim representatives.

DOJ_NMG_0130982

The melee slightly injured 17 protesters and 19 police officers, and 17 rioters were arrested, police said. Officers shut all the gates leading to the complex, and disconnected loudspeakers that they said were used to incite worshippers.

Three hours after the initial clash, police and demonstrators still played cat and mouse in the narrow alleyways and on the rooftops of the nearby Old City.

But in other areas of the Old City, the scene was calm. Ten pilgrims speaking Russian and carrying wooden crosses walked down the Via Dolorosa, the path Christians believe Jesus took to his crucifixion.

In the West Bank, youths hurled stones at Israeli security forces at a major checkpoint leading into Jerusalem and near the town of Qalqiliya. South of Bethlehem, Israeli troops fired rubber bullets at Palestinians rioting over the work at the holy site, slightly wounding three.

In Egypt, thousands of anti-riot police beat and chased dozens of protesters into side alleys and streets to prevent them from staging a mass demonstration at Al-Azhar Mosque following Friday prayers. Witnesses said dozens of protesters were detained.

Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit demanded that Israel stop the construction and warned of escalation in tensions if it doesn't, the Middle East News Agency reported. And Jordan's King Abdullah II said he would try to muster enough international support to pressure Israel to stop the work, according to the Petra news service.

Indonesia, the world's most populous Muslim nation, also called for Israel to halt work on the ramp.

Hezbollah Wants Its Guns Returned (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 9 — Hezbollah acknowledged Friday that it owned a truckload of arms seized Thursday by Lebanese customs authorities in an East Beirut suburb and demanded their return.

The truck had been carrying weapons from the Bekaa Valley, in eastern Lebanon, to the south, Hezbollah said in a statement. Hezbollah officials insisted that the movement of the arms did not violate the militants' accord with the government.

But Lebanon's defense minister, Elias Murr, said the Lebanese Army intended to keep the weapons and pledged to use them against Israel if needed. Lebanese and Israeli soldiers exchanged fire across the border on Wednesday for the first time in decades.

Under the terms of the United Nations cease-fire agreement that ended last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel, the Lebanese Army is required to halt the flow of weapons to Hezbollah from abroad. This week, a United Nations official and Lebanese opponents of Syria accused the Syrian government of smuggling weapons to its allies in Lebanon in recent months.

Hezbollah has sworn never to use its weapons against other Lebanese but says it must remain armed, in part because of Israel's continued occupation of the Shabaa Farms, an area that the group insists is Lebanese territory. Israel and the United Nations say the land is part of the Golan Heights and belongs to Syria.

Russian Criticizes U.S. Plan For Missile Defense System (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

SEVILLE, Spain, Feb. 9 — Russia's defense minister chose a NATO session here on Friday for a pre-emptive verbal assault on American plans to base elements of a missile defense system in Eastern Europe.

The Russian, Sergei B. Ivanov, argued that there was no rationale for basing American antimissile radars and interceptors in former Soviet satellite states that have now joined the NATO alliance. Washington has entered talks with Poland and the Czech Republic to do just that.

North Korea cannot strike NATO territory in Europe with its current ballistic missiles, Mr. Ivanov said, adding that "any school globe or map" showed that Europe would not be under the flight path of any missile from North Korea toward the United States, either.

During the two-day NATO defense ministers meeting here, Mr. Ivanov also said that for Iranian missiles to strike in NATO territory or to hit the United States would require extensive industrial reorganization of Tehran's missile program.

He then warned that Russia could easily overwhelm the small defensive system under consideration.

DOJ_NMG_0130983

Bush administration officials say that any American missile defense system in Europe would not be aimed at Russia, but would be designed to counter other threats.

"We have made quite clear to them that it's not directed at them," Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said here. "And I think we'll work our way through it."

A senior Defense Department official traveling with Mr. Gates said an American missile defense program in Europe would be devised to counter Iran's improving missile arsenal. "They are extending the range of their missiles," the official said. "It's a matter of time."

In his comments, Mr. Gates cited reports of a recent visit to India by Mr. Ivanov that quoted the Russian minister as making statements that acknowledged the American "plans here in Europe for missile defense do not threaten Russia nor its strategic deterrent."

Opportunities for United States-Russia military cooperation, and competition, are expected to be discussed further this weekend at an international security conference in Munich, which will feature an address by President Vladimir V. Putin of Russia on Saturday and by Mr. Gates on Sunday.

NATO is discussing in broad terms whether and how to move forward with a regional missile defense system, and Russia's objections are not focused on that alliance program. Russia is not a NATO member, but participates in a NATO-Russia Council that meets during alliance sessions.

Russian officials do express alarm, however, at the American ballistic missile defense system, and Moscow's arguments have grown louder since the United States entered bilateral talks with Poland and the Czech Republic, two of the newer NATO allies, about basing parts of a missile defense system on their soil. Kremlin leaders have long said that an effective missile defense system could set off a new nuclear arms race.

American officials say that while no final agreements have been reached, serious technical talks are under way about basing antimissile radar in the Czech Republic and interceptor missiles in Poland.

Mr. Ivanov did not describe Moscow's options to thwart any antimissile system, but Russia's military laboratories could be expected to add dummy warheads and other blocking materials, known as chaff, to blind or confuse a missile defense system, and do it at relatively modest expense.

"We have the capability to surpass any antimissile system," he said. "It doesn't mean that we threaten others."

Mr. Gates acknowledged that the United States and Russia "do have differences, there is no doubt about that."

During their conversations at the NATO session, Mr. Gates said, he asked Mr. Ivanov about Russia's energy export policy; the topic is critical for European nations that fear Russia may turn its oil and gas deliveries on and off to further a political agenda.

"I raised energy security and so did a number of other defense ministers," Mr. Gates said. "And I would say that it was both in the context of protecting supplies from terrorists and others. But also there were references made to manipulation. And I think it was not confrontational, but I think the message was pretty clear."

Mr. Gates, a former director of the Central Intelligence Agency who specialized in Soviet issues, had never before met his current Russian counterpart, Mr. Ivanov, whose previous assignments included senior positions with Moscow's spy service operating in Africa.

"We commented on two old intelligence guys getting together," Mr. Gates said afterward.

Russians Accuse US Of European Military Expansion (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Demetri Sevastopulo In Seville And Neil,buckley In Moscow

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

A chill descended on relations between Washington and Moscow yesterday as Russia's top defence officials criticised what they called US military expansion in Europe.

Sergei Ivanov, Russian defence minister and a possible successor to President Vladimir Putin, said he did not believe the Bush administration's claims that its planned missile defence programme was aimed at protecting it from Iran, North Korea or terrorist groups.

DOJ_NMG_0130984

Speaking after meeting his Nato opposite numbers in Seville, Mr Ivanov spelled out Moscow's plans to counteract the US programme.

"What is the real intention of these activities?" he asked. "This will not harm the Russian deterrent. We will develop our own strategic system, which will have the capability to surpass any missile system. We want to be absolutely sure that under no circumstances are we under pressure."

But he added: "We will not get back in the arms race."

Mr Ivanov's comments came after Russia's army chief of staff warned that expansion of the US military presence in Russia's traditional zones of influence was a serious security threat.

General Yuri Baluyevsky said Russia faced even greater military threats than during the cold war, and needed a new doctrine to respond to them.

"Russia's co-operation with the west on the basis of forming common or close strategic interests hasn't helped its military security," he said in a Moscow speech.

Tensions over the missile defence programme have grown since Washington announced last month that it was negotiating installing a radar station for the scheme in the Czech Republic and interceptor rockets in Poland.

Mr Ivanov said the two countries, both former Soviet satellites, were too far away to play a part in disabling missiles from North Korea or Iran. "Take a look at the map," he said. He added that he did not believe the system would be effective against terrorist groups.

"They just don't need missiles," he said. "They have other forms of delivery - human bodies and civilian aircraft."

Earlier this week, Mr Ivanov announced a big increase in military spending to fund a new generation of intercontinental ballistic missiles, nuclear submarines and aircraft carriers.

Russia's defence budget would be $31bn this year, compared with $8bn in 2001, and it would spend $189bn over eight years on overhauling its military infrastructure. But Mr Ivanov noted yesterday that US military spending remained more than 20 times bigger than Russia's.

He also insisted he had had an amicable meeting with Robert Gates, the US defence secretary, in Seville.

Mr Gates sought to soothe Russia's concerns on the anti-missile scheme. "We have made it quite clear that it is not directed at them," he said.

Russian Critical Of U.S. Missile Defense Plan (LAT)

By Peter Spiegel

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

SEVILLE, SPAIN — Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov on Friday criticized moves by the U.S. to deploy parts of its missile defense system in Eastern Europe, saying the plan to base interceptor rockets and radars in Poland and the Czech Republic appeared to be aimed at shooting down Russian weapons.

Ivanov was in Spain for a regular meeting between the North Atlantic Treaty Organization's defense ministers and their Russian counterpart, and his remarks came just hours after his first face-to-face meeting with Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates, in which the two discussed the U.S. missile defense plans.

At a news conference following the meeting, the Russian minister said observers need only "look at the school globe" to counter U.S. arguments that the Europe-based system was needed to destroy North Korean missiles, adding that American claims Iran posed a threat to Europe were equally specious.

"Again, take a look at the map and calculate what territories can be reached by Iranian missiles," Ivanov said, arguing that Tehran's current capabilities don't allow its weaponry to reach beyond the Middle East and Central Asia. "In order to achieve the goal [of reaching Europe], there is a need to have an absolutely different defense industry in [Iran]."

The U.S. announced last month that it had opened negotiations with Poland and the Czech Republic as part of the Pentagon's expanding missile defense system — currently operated in a limited form with radars and interceptors in California and Alaska — to base similar technologies in their countries. The U.S. is seeking to put interceptor missiles in Poland and antimissile radars in the Czech Republic.

Ivanov has raised similar objections in recent weeks, but U.S. officials insisted he had also already acknowledged there was little threat posed by the system to Russian missiles. Asked if he understood Russian objections, Gates replied, "Not really."

"We've made quite clear to them that it's not directed at them," Gates told reporters traveling with him on his two-stop European swing.

A senior Pentagon official traveling with Gates said Ivanov raised the issue in his private meeting with Gates but that the objection was made perfunctorily since the U.S. is already well aware of Russian views on the matter.

"I must say, the tone could not have been more civil," the official said of the bilateral meeting. "Missile defense is an issue we agree to disagree on. We said, 'Look, we'll keep talking about it.' "

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity when discussing private bilateral meetings, said Ivanov did not mention the question of Iran's capabilities but that the Pentagon disagreed with Ivanov's assessment.

"It's not an issue of what's [Iranian missile range] today; it's what they're developing," the official said.

"The Iranians keep expanding the range of their missiles. It's a matter of time."

At his news conference, Ivanov said Moscow would respond to U.S. intentions to deploy the system in Europe by developing ways to counter it. But he added that any countermeasures would be simple, inexpensive systems, believed to include such technologies as decoy missiles.

"This will not harm the Russian deterrence," he said. "We will not be back in an arms race."

A Tall, Elusive Russian And A Cup Of Poison Tea (LAT)

By Kim Murphy, Sebastian Rotella

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

LONDON — Yuri Felshtinsky well remembers when he spent the better part of five hours pleading for the life of his friend Alexander Litvinenko.

It was May 22, 2000. Litvinenko, a colonel in the Russian Federal Security Service, or FSB, had just spent four months in prison, having gone public with allegations that senior secret police officers were involved in killings and kidnappings for financial gain.

Now he was free, but for how long? Felshtinsky called up Litvinenko's former boss, Maj. Gen. Yevgeny Khokholkov, and agreed to meet him for dinner at a small restaurant near Moscow's old Ukraina Hotel.

Khokholkov owned the restaurant and ordered it closed for the night so the two men could talk privately. "We were sitting there for five hours, from 7:30 to 12:30, discussing the fate of Litvinenko. It was a nice, professional conversation. I think it was a very honest talk," Felshtinsky recalled in a recent interview.

"But the general explained to me there was no way, just no way, Litvinenko's going to be pardoned…. He went against the system. He committed treason. And he was going to be punished for this."

"At one point, he said, 'If I ever see him in my doorway, I will kill him with my own hands.' And he put his two hands together as if he was smashing the neck, as if it was a piece of pipe, or a baguette. And then he just said, 'I'm joking, of course.' But it was clear he was not joking. They hated him so much."

Six and a half years later, Litvinenko died, felled by a dose of radioactive polonium-210 that investigators believe was delivered in a cup of tea at a London hotel bar. British police have spent months investigating the apparent homicide, in which 119 other people were at least slightly contaminated by polonium, including 15 who face long-term health risks, officials said.

As London prosecutors consider whether to file criminal charges, Felshtinsky and others among Litvinenko's expatriate Russian friends have pieced together their own picture of how the former agent died. The friends, who include the former London station chief for the KGB — the spy agency that preceded the FSB — detailed their theory of the case in recent interviews with the Los Angeles Times. British law enforcement officials confirmed some of their contentions.

Based on their conversations with Litvinenko as he lay dying, their own contacts in the world of former KGB agents, and their meetings as witnesses with police investigators, these Russians believe Litvinenko's slaying was the one Felshtinsky had tried to avert years earlier — a punishment for betrayal from an organization that forgets nothing.

They believe that the true killer may have been a tall, elusive Russian man known only as Vladislav who shows up on airport surveillance videos and was briefly present during Litvinenko's fatal lunch, then disappeared without a trace. Most likely, they say, he was a highly trained Russian spy operating in Europe.

"I'm absolutely sure this was a formal decision of the FSB," Felshtinsky said. "Litvinenko was a target. The death trap was there. The sentence was there. It's just, politically, they probably could not allow themselves to kill him until now."

London police appear less ready to settle on a motive. "It's still a complex picture," said a British security official. Investigators have "put together a good forensic picture, but not much on the motive."

The official confirmed that investigators were looking at the mysterious Vladislav, though he was cautious about the Russians' description of him as a top intelligence operative. The official also said the British investigation had focused on two Russian businessmen who Litvinenko's friends believe were at least collaborators in the case: Andrei Lugovoy and Dmitry Kovtun. Both men, former FSB agents, sat with Litvinenko in the Millennium Hotel's Pine Bar as he drank the apparently deadly cup of tea.

Lugovoy and Kovtun have confirmed they met with Litvinenko, but say it was purely a business meeting. Both are back in Russia and have suffered from apparent radiation sickness. They say they would never have knowingly exposed themselves to polonium, which was found not only in the hotel bar, but in a hotel room believed to have been occupied by Lugovoy.

Authorities and former officials of the secret services in Russia also have strenuously denied any involvement in the case. They point out the illogic of using so exotic a poison and targeting a dissident who had largely faded from public view.

The apparent involvement of Lugovoy and Kovtun poses puzzles for police. If they were the killers, why did they not disappear after Litvinenko's death? Instead, they presented themselves to the British Embassy in Moscow for questioning and gave a news conference.

Did the killer or killers know they were handling polonium, a highly lethal substance that leaves abundant radioactive traces? Polonium's sloppy international trail points to a scenario in which masterminds could have given Lugovoy and Kovtun the mission of killing Litvinenko and provided them with poison, but not told them what the poison consisted of, the British security official said.

"Were they set up?" the official asked. "Their behavior suggests a remarkable lack of knowledge of polonium."

Oleg Gordievsky, the former KGB station chief who defected to Britain in 1985 and later became friends with Litvinenko, said he was convinced Lugovoy and Kovtun were part of the plot but were not the ones who administered the poison.

That, he said, was probably the job of the tall, mysterious man who appears on airport surveillance videos. The cameras caught him talking with Kovtun as the two men arrived at Heathrow Airport on a flight from Hamburg, Germany, in the days before Litvinenko was poisoned.

According to Gordievsky, Litvinenko said before he died that he had seen the same man briefly in the hotel bar during his meeting to discuss business prospects with Lugovoy and Kovtun.

"Litvinenko remembered him in the hotel — that he appeared quite briefly," Gordievsky said. "Lugovoy said, 'Oh, Vladislav.' He said, 'He's one of our friends, Vladislav. He's in the protection business; he also may be useful in finding a job for you.' And then that guy disappeared. It's my theory that he put [the poison] in the tea."

British investigators were able to get the man's passport details — he was reportedly traveling on a European passport — but were unable to trace him to any hotel, or to any flight leaving the country.

Gordievsky said he believed there was a dress rehearsal of the poisoning two weeks before the real thing. Lugovoy and Kovtun apparently met Litvinenko on Oct. 16 at the Piccadilly Circus sushi restaurant, where traces of polonium have also been found.

He believes the man known as Vladislav observed the meeting — though he apparently did not appear on surveillance cameras — and determined that the time or location was not right.

"They knew it was Litvinenko's favorite place. They had lunch with him, and the polonium was ready, but they didn't do anything because the conditions were not favorable," Gordievsky said.

Litvinenko's friends say they are convinced the FSB organized the killing, and they blame Russian President Vladimir V. Putin for creating a climate in which the security services feel free to kill a man in London.

DOJ_NMG_0130987

Others suggest that the killing may have tapped into the FSB's ranks in a less formal way. Litvinenko's former direct supervisor at the FSB, Alexander Gusak, said it was possible Litvinenko had been killed by one of several former FSB informants outed when Litvinenko moved to Britain.

"I know that Litvinenko is a traitor. He betrayed the names of our agents to the British intelligence. I am talking about our agents in various organized crime gangs across Russia," Gusak said in an interview.

"In 2001, some time after Litvinenko had defected to the West, one of our agents came to me and said that the Brits got in touch with him and wanted to talk with him.

"He was furious. He said that he is in grave danger now that his cover was exposed. I told him that I had suffered a lot from Litvinenko's activities myself and told him about my huge problems. The man then said: 'How can you stand all that? Do you want me to go to London and get his head for you?'

"Well, that was said at the heat of the moment, and the man didn't mean literally to go to London to get Litvinenko's head. But my point is that I know that at least one exposed agent has this huge grudge against Litvinenko. But there were many others whom Litvinenko betrayed and who may have the same motive."

Soviet Monument To Make Way For Reagan: Report (AFP)

AFP, February 9, 2007

Opponents of Poland's former communist regime reportedly want to pay a posthumous homage to US President Ronald Reagan by erecting his statue in the place of a Soviet-era monument.

In an open letter to the mayor of the southwestern city of Katowice, the former anti-regime activists said that the staunchly anti-communist Reagan had been a "symbol of liberty," the Polish news agency PAP reported.

As a result, they said, he deserved to become the centrepiece of the city's Freedom Square, replacing a monument to the Soviet troops who drove out the occupying Nazis in 1945.

They also said that they wanted the site to be rebaptised "Ronald Reagan Freedom Square."

City hall spokesman Waldemar Bojarun said that Katowice's councillors would consider the issue.

Bojarun said that he had "enormous respect" for Reagan.

However, he said, the proposal could cost an estimated 500,000 zlotys (128,000 euros, 168,000 dollars) and the city had "other pressing needs."

There are already separate plans to erect a statue in memory of Reagan in the centre of the Polish capital, Warsaw, which would be paid-for from private funds.

Reagan, who dubbed the Soviet Union an "evil empire," is widely credited by Poles with having driven communism to the wall.

The conservative Republican made fighting communism the cornerstone of his 1980-1988 presidency, and backed Poland's Solidarity trade union after it went underground when the regime declared martial law in 1981.

Reagan died in June 2004 at the age of 93.

Is This The Next President Of France? (WSJ)

By Alessandra Galloni

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

PARIS -- During her campaign to become France's first woman president, Ségolène Royal has been photographed in a turquoise bikini, appeared in a gay magazine with a naked man on the cover and suspended a top campaign aide for poking fun at her longtime companion.

The 53-year-old mother of four has praised China for the efficiency of its justice system and criticized the most sacred of French cows, the 35-hour workweek. Many senior members of her Socialist Party aren't sure whether to call Ms. Royal's campaign a bold or amateurish foray into the hallowed halls of French presidential politics.

Even party boss François Hollande is often irked -- and for him, it's personal as well as political. He is the father of Ms. Royal's children, though the two never married, and had his own designs on the French presidency. "I should have been the candidate," he said in an interview. "But I thought, if Ségolène has more of a chance, I won't stand in her way."

DOJ_NMG_0130988

When Ms. Royal last year suggested ordinary citizens should oversee elected officials to improve French democracy, Mr. Hollande balked at his partner's populist bent. "I told her, 'Don't go around saying this. Why are you doing it?' " he recalled in an interview. The French public had a different reaction, he acknowledged: "They all came to her defense."

Since she first hinted at a run for the presidency in a French gossip magazine, Paris Match, in 2005, Ms. Royal's crowd-pleasing proposals and glamorous looks have transformed her from a back-bench Socialist politician into one of the two front-runners for France's highest office.

"It's the French people who have given me legitimacy," Ms. Royal said during a recent car ride between campaign stops. "After the Paris Match article, there was a popular uprising. The French people wanted me."

Her rapid rise speaks to the growing disconnect in France, and throughout much of Europe, between an aging generation of leaders and voters who feel their economic and social concerns are going unheard. By basing her campaign on a simple proposition of listening to the people, she has tapped into a sense of public disaffection rooted particularly in France's inability to create jobs. That is prompting voters to reach for something new and antipolitical -- even if they don't know quite what it is.

Visit Segolene Royal's official Web site1.

"I can't say how things will change," says Nasser Ledrac, a 23-year-old university student who was handing out leaflets for Ms. Royal in the poor Paris suburb of Bondy late last year. "What I like about her is that she doesn't hesitate to shake things up."

A recent series of personal and diplomatic gaffes has left Ms. Royal trailing her main rival, Interior Minister Nicolas Sarkozy, by several percentage points in the latest polls. Mr. Sarkozy too is claiming rebel status within his party, despite being a longtime force within the administration of current President Jacques Chirac. With the first round of elections on April 22, the race remains tight.

Ms. Royal has come this far by tossing ideology out the window and by selling her personality instead of her beliefs, a phenomenon rarely seen in continental Europe. An attractive brunette who favors white skirt-suits made by French designer Paule Ka, Ms. Royal often has dodged policy debates. Asked during the car ride to discuss her record as current president of France's Poitou-Charentes region, Ms. Royal snapped: "Haven't you talked to my chief of staff about that?"

Despite a 25-year career in the Socialist Party, she portrays herself as an outsider. Promising a break with the past, she beat out elder statesmen known as "elephants" for the nomination and has all but ditched the party's official platform for her own version -- due to be unveiled this Sunday. Her platform, she says, will be based largely on ideas gathered from some 6,000 town-hall meetings with voters, smaller coffeehouse sessions dubbed "café Ségolène," and 2.8 million visitors to her campaign Web site.

In speeches she often evokes her own struggle between maternity and a career, and recently noted how democracy is like amour -- the more there is, the more it grows, she said. She recently decorated the hallway of Socialist Party headquarters in Paris with 2007 red roses. Last summer, she was voted the world's sixth-sexiest woman in a poll by the French edition of FHM men's magazine, behind Angelina Jolie and ahead of Elizabeth Hurley.

So far, Ms. Royal's popular appeal has given her the upper hand with her party and her partner, Mr. Hollande. Though flummoxed by some of her remarks, most of the Socialist elite concede she's their best shot at winning back power after 12 years of Mr. Chirac's conservative rule. During this time, France has not resolved key economic problems, such as high unemployment among young people, the increasing cost of a generous social-welfare system and tensions in the fast-growing immigrant population.

"I had no idea she would rise so fast," says Mr. Hollande.

Her approach isn't foolproof, and her success is by no means guaranteed. Among her recent foreign policy gaffes was a diplomatic flap with Canada's government after Ms. Royal suggested last month that she supported sovereignty for Quebec. "She's very intelligent, but she doesn't have a geopolitical grounding," said French economist and scholar Jacques Attali, who first hired her as a presidential aide in 1982, in an interview late last year.

Business leaders are concerned about her economic rhetoric so far, including plans to give unions more power. She rails against stock options, "greedy profits" and "wild capitalism," and is likely to propose that French citizens abroad start to pay some taxes at home. While managers are glad she has hinted at making the maximum 35-hour workweek more expandable, they would like her to explain how. "What has she said about ...job contracts? We haven't heard anything," says Paul Hermelin, the chief executive of the large French consulting and information-technology company Capgemini Group.

At the same time, strains in her not-so-private relationship with Mr. Hollande, the party leader, have highlighted wider tensions between Ms. Royal and the Socialists over who is in charge. "They think they're professionals and that she's not," says Zaki Laidi, a professor at the Institute d'Études Politiques who has published a book called "Emerging From Social Pessimism."

Ms. Royal dressed down her partner in public last month after he said the Socialists wanted to raise income taxes for people who earn more than €4,000 per month, roughly $65,000 a year. After the spat, a top aide to Ms. Royal said on television that her only flaw was "her partner."

She suspended the aide for a month, but the episode fueled rumors in the French press that the couple have effectively split and are only keeping up appearances. Given a chance to clarify their personal relationship in the interview late last year, Mr. Hollande said only, "Whether we are a couple or we're not is irrelevant." Ms. Royal has declined to discuss the question.

The French also are puzzling over something else: How, after 20 years in Mr. Hollande's shadow, Ms. Royal has snatched away the life her partner had mapped out for himself, and what consequences this might have on a Socialist administration. According to a poll last month in Le Parisien newspaper, 47% of French voters feel the couple's respective roles in the party are unclear.

Ms. Royal's desire to break from the establishment dates back to her childhood. In interviews, Ms. Royal, who was born in the then-French colony of Senegal where she lived until she was eight, has described a strict upbringing dominated by her father Jacques, a devoutly Catholic, conservative army colonel.

The fourth of eight children, the young Marie-Ségolène and her two sisters were taught to tend to the home so they could find suitable husbands. "I understood at an early age that I didn't want to end up like the other women at my house," Ms. Royal said on French radio last summer.

Marie-Ségolène's good grades gained her entrance to the Institut d'Etudes Politiques in Paris, an elite university. She fled to the French capital, ditched the "Marie" in her name, and spent the rest of her life rebelling against the patriarchal, conservative values embodied by her father.

Colleagues say Ms. Royal inherited his exacting style, however. "She likes to control all decisions that are taken," says Poitiers mayor and fellow Socialist Jacques Santrot, describing Ms. Royal's reign as regional president. Other Socialists were shocked recently when she sent out detailed instructions on how to run a town-hall meeting, including photos on how to organize seats2 and a directive to invite 10 times the holding capacity of the hall.

Mr. Hollande says she's simply a strong-willed thinker. "She's not afraid of conflict. She's not afraid of telling you you're wrong or if she doesn't like you, of not shaking your hand," he says. "She doesn't care about protocol."

Ms. Royal and Mr. Hollande met at the elite graduate school that breeds French heads of state, the École Nationale d'Administration. The two started dating, and Mr. Hollande, already a Socialist activist, introduced her to left-wing political circles. Mr. Attali, then a special adviser to Socialist President Francois Mitterrand, discovered the couple and hired them to work at the Elysée, France's presidential palace, in 1982.

Mr. Hollande was the rising star. He had graduated near the top of his class and joined President Mitterrand's council of economic advisers. Ms. Royal landed the less-prominent portfolio of health, environmental and youth issues.

Yet Mr. Attali was impressed by the young woman's raw determination, even compared to her partner. "He has a sense of humor and would have succeeded in any other job," he recalls. "She has no humor at all. For her, politics is vital... and nothing has ever been unattainable."

Mr. Hollande agrees: "She's tougher than I am."

While at the Elysée, Ms. Royal had the couple's first two children, Thomas in 1984 and Clemence in 1985. She sowed the seeds of a political career centered on family issues. Colleagues say Ms. Royal believes children, not couples, form the family nucleus. Ms. Royal would go home to feed the children and then return to the Elysée Palace to work, friends recall. Writing a 1989 book called "The Baby Channel-Surfers Are Fed Up," Ms. Royal decried violence in children's television shows.

At the Elysée, Ms. Royal befriended Sophie Bouchet-Petersen, a feminist and left-wing intellectual who remains the candidate's sounding board. "Ségolène was always a feminist before being a Socialist," says Ms. Bouchet-Petersen.

DOJ_NMG_0130990

Ms. Royal's path diverged from Mr. Hollande's. He was promoted to spokesman for two Socialist governments and was elected to the National Assembly. She remained at the Elysée. "Our political lives have always been separate," says Mr. Hollande. "I've always said to her: 'You try your lot without me.' "

Ms. Royal's first big break came in 1988 when she ran for the National Assembly in a small, normally conservative constituency in the western Poitou-Charentes region and won. Then, during a brief stint as environmental affairs minister, she won broader notice: When she had Flora, her fourth child with Mr. Hollande, in 1992, she invited photographers into her hospital room to snap photos of her and the baby.

The stunt brought a normally private moment, even for public women, into French living rooms. "She made herself known as a young woman who was accepting her maternity and talking about it openly while working," recalls Mr. Hollande. "This wasn't an ordinary thing in France." A year after Flora's birth, Ms. Royal was re-elected in Poitou-Charentes.

She wasn't rewarded with the cabinet post she wanted in 1997, when Socialist Lionel Jospin became prime minister during a period of power-sharing under Mr. Chirac. Ms. Royal's main female rival in her party, Martine Aubry, got the key Labor Ministry. Ms. Royal was given the less prominent post of minister for education, and then for family affairs. She thought she deserved more, said Mr. Hollande, who became the Socialist Party's national secretary, a key political post.

Ms. Royal used her new position to introduce paternity leave and free distribution of the morning-after pill in high schools. Friends and colleagues say she also began plotting her revenge for the slight: a bid for France's highest office.

Her launching pad came seven years later, in 2004, when she ran for president of Poitou-Charentes and, again, defeating forecasts, she won.

"She became a symbol of victory for the Left," says Mr. Hollande. "People started talking about her, and she was on the covers of French magazines," before she adopted her current polished look. He quips: "She wasn't wearing white yet."

In her new post, Ms. Royal revamped her appearance. She cut her hair into a stylish bob, wore heels and abandoned trousers for skirts that just skim the knee.

She summoned old friends: Ms. Bouchet-Petersen, the feminist from the Elysée, and Jean-Luc Fulachier, her former chief of staff at the family affairs ministry. Ms. Bouchet-Petersen handled the theory, Mr. Fulachier the practice, and Poitou-Charentes became the testing ground for democracy, Royal-style.

Ms. Royal has tried to give the people of Poitou-Charentes a bigger role in government. For example, students, parents and teachers decide via secret ballot how to spend 10% of the regional budget for high schools. Last year, their votes led to more garbage cans, new school-bell tones and a vegetable garden, according to regional documents.

Ms. Royal introduced financial aid for entrepreneurs and local "citizen juries," whereby residents are chosen randomly to evaluate laws for their community. The measures have been hugely popular. "She has applied the ideas of the people, which is good," says Rachel Merlet, a 43-year-old mother selected to a "citizen jury" in the town of Cerizay in December.

Ms. Royal's outsider positioning drew Socialists who felt marginalized. One was Gilbert Roger, mayor of the Parisian suburb of Bondy, one of the mostly immigrant communities hit by violent rioting in October 2005. During the riots, the Socialist Party agreed to imposing a curfew on Bondy, which Mr. Roger thought would be ineffective. "They didn't even ask me what I thought," recalls Mr. Roger. "There was a total gap between the political apparatchik and the reality of the land."

In January 2006, Ms. Royal went to Chile to visit Socialist presidential hopeful Michelle Bachelet, accompanied by Patrick Menucci, a former car salesman and restaurateur who was a Socialist city councilman in Marseilles. The trip won big publicity for Ms. Royal -- partly thanks to newspapers criticizing her wearing heels to a Chilean slum. It also won her a close aide in the boisterous Mr. Menucci. Last year, when a rival of Ms. Royal's was reported as saying "If she wins, who will look after the children?" Mr. Menucci berated him publicly. "I'm seen as a macho kind of man, so it meant a lot to her that I defended her," he adds.

Last April, the center-right government faced a crisis. Students and unions took to the streets to protest a labor-reform law making it easier to fire young hires. The law was aimed at making France's rigid job market more flexible, but youths decried it as a path to insecurity. The protests became a symbol of economic and social malaise in France, particularly over the 22% jobless rate among people under 25. Mr. Chirac eventually was forced to withdraw the law.

DOJ_NMG_0130991

Amid the protests, Ms. Royal's promises to listen to people's problems and her call for a "just order" resonated with voters. "She understood the state of the people," says Mr. Hollande. "She portrayed an image that she could protect them from their fear of the future."

By the summer, Mr. Hollande realized that he wouldn't have a chance himself against Ms. Royal in the party primaries. "I could have gone against her, but the French people wouldn't have understood."

In the November primaries, Ms. Royal trounced a former prime minister and finance minister. Speaking after her official nomination, she evoked French Revolution-era feminist Olympe de Gouges and thanked Socialists for choosing a woman candidate. She also quoted her Chilean friend, by then elected president herself: "As Michelle Bachelet says, nothing would be possible without men." Before the speech, Ms. Royal stood before the pink backdrop of the auditorium stage for several minutes, basking in the applause.

Now, cracks are starting to appear in the Royal campaign. During a trip to Beirut late last year, Ms. Royal was criticized at home for not immediately reacting when a Hezbollah lawmaker compared Israel's former occupation of Lebanon to that of the Nazis in World War II France. Ms. Royal aides claimed the remark was omitted by their translator and they brushed off the affair. "If the television images of her today are as good as those yesterday, it'll be fine," Francois Rebsamen, one of Ms. Royal's campaign managers, reassured an aide on the phone shortly after the incident.

But the gaffes have been adding up. In China last month, Ms. Royal said France could learn from the speed of the justice system in China -- a country often criticized for its human-rights record.

Days after her remarks on Quebec sovereignty, a famous French comedian called Ms. Royal pretending to be Quebec's prime minister. During the call, which he recorded and then aired on French radio, he compared her comments to supporting independence for the French Mediterranean island of Corsica, where sovereignty also is a divisive issue. Ms. Royal joked that the French wouldn't mind, but then hurriedly added: "Don't repeat that. It will create another incident in France." It did, prompting derision from the Sarkozy camp.

Ms. Royal has acknowledged "a moment of tension" in the campaign. She and aides are pinning much hope on Sunday's speech, but bracing for more turbulence. "I knew the battle would be tough," she said this week. "And we haven't seen everything yet."

U.N. Peacekeepers Fight Gangs In Haiti, One Street At A Time (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 5 — For years, street gangs have run Haiti right alongside the politicians. With a disbanded army and a corrupted wreck of a police force, successive presidents have either used the gangs against political rivals or just bought them off.

Recently, something extraordinary has occurred. President René Préval decided to take on the gangs and set the 8,000 United Nations peacekeepers loose on them, a risky move that will determine the security of the country and the success of his young government.

“We’re taking back Port-au-Prince centimeter by centimeter,” said Lt. Col. Abdesslam Elamarti, a peacekeeper from Morocco. “We’re pressing these gangs so the population can live in peace.”

The offensive by the United Nations forces, who arrived here in 2004 after the ouster of President Jean-Bertrand Aristide, began in earnest in late December. One of the fiercest battles took place on the morning of Jan. 25 with a raid by hundreds of United Nations forces on a gang hide-out on the periphery of Cité Soleil, this sprawling seaside capital’s largest and most notorious slum.

After a fierce firefight in which gang members fired thousands of shots, United Nations officials succeeded in taking over the hide-out, a former schoolhouse that gang members had once used to fire upon peacekeepers and to demand money from passing motorists. The United Nations said four gang members had been killed in the battle.

Other raids have followed, and though it is still too early to judge the operation, gang leaders seem to be on the run, and armored United Nations vehicles now rumble through the crowded streets of Cité Soleil.

[Some 700 United Nations peacekeepers raided strongholds in Cité Soleil before dawn on Friday trying to take control of abandoned buildings used by gang members. One person was killed and several others wounded, including two peacekeepers, United Nations officials said.

["There will be no tolerance for the kidnappings, harassment and terror carried out by criminal gangs," Maj. Gen. Carlos Alberto dos Santos Cruz, the commander of the United Nations forces, said in a statement on Friday. "I will continue to cleanse these areas of the gangs who are robbing the Haitian people of their security."]

The biggest of the United Nations operations have been aimed at one of the most wanted and feared of all the gang leaders, an unlikely and unpredictable power broker in his 20s who goes simply by the name Evans. Evans and his groups have been linked to a rash of kidnappings in the capital, and lately his men have been locked in fierce battles with United Nations peacekeepers.

Within the confines of Cité Soleil, Evans's every whim is enforced with absolute authority. Deeply superstitious, he recently said he suspected cats of bringing him bad luck after one appeared during a raid by United Nations troops on one of his hide-outs, local residents and United Nations officials said.

So he issued an order that all cats were to be killed in his patch of the slum. His gunmen would be rounding them up and roasting them, he told the people. When one woman resisted, he or one of his men shot her, United Nations officials say.

Evans and the other leaders now hide in the maze of tin-roofed shanties that are home to some 300,000 of Haiti's urban poor. Meanwhile, the local population debates which is a more effective strategy for dealing with these young toughs, confronting or conversing with them.

Haiti, the poorest country in the Western Hemisphere, has a long tradition of politics mixed with thuggery. In the 1970s and '80s, François Duvalier and his son Jean-Claude employed the Tontons Macoute, dreaded paramilitary hoodlums.

Mr. Aristide was elected president in 1990 and again in 2000 with the support of the poor. Gang leaders, who act as de facto spokesmen for long-neglected slums, gained entry to the presidential palace and helped dole out jobs and other spoils to their men.

In his initial months in office, Mr. Préval, who had been Mr. Aristide's prime minister as well as president from 1996 to 2001, followed a similarly conciliatory tack. He negotiated with gang leaders, including Evans, inviting them at times to face-to-face meetings in the presidential palace, officials say.

But he has grown increasingly impatient with the gangs as they resisted surrendering their guns and continued wreaking havoc on Port-au-Prince.

The kidnapping spree at the end of last year was the last straw. As the country prepared for Christmas, street thugs began grabbing people off the street, taking them into the slums and demanding ransoms.

Then the kidnappers began singling out children. In one horrible episode, a teenage girl was killed and her eyes were gouged out. Then, a school bus of children was seized by gunmen, prompting many terrified parents to keep their children hidden at home.

Mr. Préval, who has support among Haiti's poor as well as its elite, found his coalition government under attack as well, with opposition politicians in the Senate and Chamber of Deputies denouncing him for allowing the violence. The president changed course, calling off negotiations with the gangsters and giving the United Nations the go ahead to go after them.

Some local residents say that the raids are stirring up the gangs and that innocent people are getting caught up in the cross-fire.

David Wimhurst, the spokesman for the United Nations mission, said that the peacekeepers were careful to single out only combatants and that gang members had themselves killed civilians and then blamed the United Nations.

Not everybody agrees that confrontation is the best way of calming the slums. "The gang men can change," insisted Meleus Jean, 45, a pastor who runs a tiny church in Cité Soleil and who was once almost hit by a stray bullet while delivering a Sunday morning sermon. "I talk to them and I think they are gang men because they have nothing else. Fighting them will not change them."

One of those who has been criticized in the past for dealings with gang members has been Wyclef Jean, the Haitian-American rapper formerly of the Fugees. "The problem is much bigger than the gang leaders," he said in a telephone interview from New York. “I’m not saying they are not part of the problem. When people are killing people, that’s a problem. But we don’t have enough conversation.”

But United Nations officials say the time for talk is over.

“If one of them goes to Préval and says, ‘I want to give up,’ and waves a white handkerchief, that is fine,” said Edmond Mulet, a Guatemalan diplomat in charge of the United Nations mission here. “That’s the kind of conversation we want.”

At the same time, nobody believes that arresting or killing the gang leaders will be enough to calm Port-au-Prince. The violence is linked, most say, to the dire poverty.

“The people didn’t ask to be born here,” said Christy Jackson, 42, headmaster of a school in Cité Soleil. “We didn’t ask to live like this.”

The United States government recently set aside $20 million to create jobs for young people in Cité Soleil once the violence is quelled. In Solino, a neighborhood where the gangsters were chased away, people are being paid to clean garbage from a clogged drainage ditch.

Mr. Jean, the singer, has numerous social projects under way, including a program to bring giant mobile movie screens to poor neighborhoods, which have no cinemas.

Mr. Mulet, of the United Nations, said he believed that the gang leaders were beyond rehabilitation. “They’ve been killing people, kidnapping people, torturing people, raping girls,” he told reporters recently in Washington. “It is very difficult to reinsert into society someone like that. A psychiatric institution would be the best place to place them in the future — after we arrest them.”

Even if the gangsters are all rounded up, the country’s justice system is ill-equipped to handle them.

Justice is bought and sold in Haiti, with both police officers and judges routinely allowing bribes to determine guilt or innocence. Jails are packed with people awaiting trial, most languishing for years.

On top of that, more and more narcotics have begun flowing through Haiti to the United States, law enforcement officials say. It is Haiti’s weakened state that is the big attraction to narcotics traffickers, officials say.

In a recent report on Haiti’s woeful law enforcement apparatus, the International Crisis Group, a nonprofit group committed to preventing and resolving deadly conflicts, said that without urgent reform “the current escalation of organized violence and criminality may come to threaten the state itself.”

As bullets fly, everyone is under threat. One stray shot pierced the outer wall of a hospital in Cité Soleil recently. “We don’t know who shot it,” said Marie Yves Noël, the chief nurse. The bullet continued on through the maternity unit and then broke the glass of a pediatrics ward. Nobody was hit.

U.N. Peacekeepers Raid Slum In Haiti (WP)

By Manuel Roig-Franzia

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

PORT-AU-PRINCE, Haiti, Feb. 9 -- U.N. troops fought a block-by-block gun battle with gangs in one of this capital's notorious slums Friday, in the force's largest offensive since being deployed here in 2004.

At least two U.N. soldiers and six gang members were injured in heavy fighting that sent the loud clap of automatic weapons fire into the air above Cite Soleil, where poverty is rampant and canals serve as open sewers. By late afternoon, the 700-member U.N. force had seized control of a large section of the slum but failed to capture the main target of the raid, a powerful gang boss known as "Evens."

Evens is said to run a kidnapping and extortion empire in Cite Soleil. U.N. officials suspect him of being a cannibal and say he earned the nickname "Little Knife" because he carves the bodies of his victims, according to Edmond Mulet, head of the U.N. mission in Haiti. Mulet said Evens is also suspected of killing cats in ritualized voodoo ceremonies because he considers them bad luck.

"He's a psychopath," Mulet said in an interview Friday at the heavily guarded Hotel Christopher, which now serves as U.N. headquarters in Port-au-Prince.

DOJ_NMG_0130994

U.N. troops spent much of Friday trying to corner Evens in the twisting streets of Cite Soleil, where he and other gang leaders are known both for terrorizing residents and for doling out the social services that Haiti's barely functioning government cannot provide. U.N. troops monitored Evens's calls on multiple cellphones, cutting off service each time they intercepted a call in hopes of isolating him.

At times it appeared that Evens was trying to talk his way out. In the afternoon, a man believed to be Evens was on a Port-au-Prince radio station offering to give up his weapons. He also attempted to reach authorities but was given only two options: "Surrender or surrender," Mulet said.

"I don't want to kill him," the U.N. mission chief added. "I just want him to give up, surrender and face justice."

Haiti has a notoriously corrupt and dysfunctional justice system. But Mulet said a special team of prosecutors and judges has been identified by the year-old administration of President RenÃ© PrÃ©val to handle high-profile cases. PrÃ©val was elected in February 2006 after foreign diplomats negotiated a settlement to avert a runoff and end days of protest. PrÃ©val replaced the interim government that struggled to rule Haiti after President Jean-Bertrand Aristide was toppled in 2004 and flown into exile on a U.S. plane.

U.N. forces provide much of the law enforcement for the country, and oversee elections and many basic services. The United Nations maintains a 9,000-member force made up of troops and police from 13 countries, with the largest contributions from Brazil and Uruguay.

After initially trying to negotiate with gang members, PrÃ©val has agreed to support an expanded military force. The United Nations has conducted a series of raids since mid-December, when a sharp increase in kidnappings sent panic through Port-au-Prince.

The threat of kidnapping is a daily concern for both poor and wealthy Haitians. On Friday, a Haitian American missionary, Nathan Jean-Dieudonne, was released five days after being kidnapped in Croix-de-Bouquets, a town outside Port-au-Prince.

U.N. officials believe Evens primarily finances his criminal organization with ransoms, which can range from $50 for a street vendor to tens of thousands of dollars for working professionals. Gang leaders also frequently force workers to turn over a portion of their earnings. In return, gangs dole out food and money to cement support from the poor.

As U.N. troops sealed off entrances to Cite Soleil on Friday, residents clustered on the outskirts, waiting hours to return to their homes. Soldiers searched women leaving the slums with baskets of fruit balanced on their heads. Some residents applauded the raid; others, stoked by radio commentators who want the U.N. force out of Haiti, railed against it.

Most just wanted to get home as the operation, which began at 3 a.m., stretched into the late afternoon. As night fell, the fighting subsided, but U.N. forces remained stationed in Cite Soleil.

Earlier in the day, Miken Gay, a 45-year-old resident of the slum, tried to escape the sun by hunching beneath the wooden cart he and seven friends were using to haul the frame of an abandoned car that they hoped to sell as scrap metal.

"We want the gangs out of Cite Soleil," Gay said. "But I'm tired. I've been here all day."

Just a few days ago Gay was walking down the same street, he said, with a pocket full of cash, a rare payday of about $3 after selling a stack of scavenged metal. A gang member he knew greeted him by leveling a revolver at his head.

The man with the gun didn't have to say a word. Gay handed over the money and walked away.

UN Troops Flood Into Haiti Slum (BBC)

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

More than 700 United Nations troops have moved into Haiti's largest slum, sparking a major gun battle with suspected gang members.

At least one person was killed and eight injured in the operation in Cite Soleil, a coastal area of the capital Port-au-Prince.

UN troops make regular incursions into Cite Soleil but a spokesman said this was the biggest so far.

He said troops had forced a major criminal gang out of its headquarters.

The Brazilian-led force of 8,000 has been deployed in Haiti since the ousting of former President Jean-Bertrand Aristide in 2004.

Fierce resistance

DOJ_NMG_0130995

UN spokesman David Wimhurst told the BBC that Friday's operation was the largest incursion into Cite Soleil, home to 300,000 people, yet attempted by the UN.

Troops entered an area of Cite Soleil known as Boston, the stronghold of a gang leader known only as Evans.

Evans has been blamed for kidnappings, killings and rapes in the areas under the control of his gang.

There was fierce fighting and heavy resistance from gang members, Mr Wimhurst said.

The spokesman said the UN forced gang members out of a school they had occupied, and out of their major headquarters, known as Jamaica Base.

"That means Evans no longer has a base in Cite Soleil," Mr Wimhurst said.

Local radio reported heavy and sustained gunfire coming from the area of Cite Soleil, making an accurate assessment of casualty figures difficult.

At least four people were killed and six wounded during the UN's previous incursion into Cite Soleil, in late January.

There was further violence in December, with at least five people killed in similar clashes.

Venezuela's Theoretical Democracy (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

VENEZUELA, AS ITS president, Hugo Chavez, never tires of pointing out, is still a democracy. It's just a place where democracy is a little more nonbinding than elsewhere.

To illustrate just how democratic the country is, the 167 members of the National Assembly — all of whom support the president because the opposition boycotted the last parliamentary election — convened outdoors in Caracas last month, to be better seen by the throngs of red-shirted Chavistas gathered in the square, and unanimously voted themselves into irrelevance.

The vote gave Chavez the power to make laws by decree for 18 months, with no need to even use his Assembly's rubber stamp. Seeing as how Chavez already had total control over the judicial branch, how he is taking steps to quell opposition media and how he could have rammed any law he chose through the Assembly with barely a semblance of debate or a whisper of protest, his new powers seem gratuitous. But even symbolic oversight can be messy, bureaucratic and slow. Kind of like democracy.

Venezuela's constitution allows the legislature to cede decree powers to the president, which it has done several times to other presidents and once before to Chavez, in 2000. But normally this occurs in times of fiscal upheaval, not while the nation is swimming in oil revenues. Chavez is expected to use his powers to, among other frightening things, do away with presidential term limits so he can remain in office indefinitely.

Predictably, the opposition newspaper Tal Cual played the Hitler card after Chavez's move, with a front-page banner headline reading "Heil Hugo!" and an editorial comparing the National Assembly rollover to the German Reichstag's vote in 1933 giving Hitler extraordinary powers. Chavez, even more predictably, passed the charge onto President Bush. "Who would be the greater fascist, Hitler or Bush? They might end up in a draw," Chavez brayed the day after winning his new authority.

Democracy still has a faint pulse in Venezuela; any Chavez decree can theoretically be overturned by public referendum, as long as opponents gather signatures from 5% of the electorate. And Chavez, destructive as his economic policies will eventually be to Venezuela, is no Hitler.

Now Mussolini, on the other hand …

India Finds Its Economy On The Verge Of Overheating (NYT)

By Keith Bradsher

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MUMBAI, India, Feb. 8 — With breakneck growth, an outsourcing industry that leads the world and hundreds of millions of consumers demanding more class and comfort, India has an economy many countries would envy.

But now, after three years of near double-digit growth, signs of a potentially dangerous inflationary spiral are beginning to emerge. Prime Minister Manmohan Singh and his closest economic advisors gathered just last weekend over fears that India's extraordinary economic expansion was starting to overheat, an issue they labeled as a "key short-term priority."

DOJ_NMG_0130996

They may have waited too long. Food prices are climbing for everything from lentils to onions, squeezing the poor. Apartment rents and prices are rising steeply, especially in large cities. Factories that make the country's increasingly ubiquitous motorcycles are running at full tilt and have still fallen weeks behind in meeting orders from dealers.

Inflation in India remains much lower than in many developing countries. But prices are rising more than twice as fast as in China, India's archrival for foreign investment and economic leadership among emerging markets. Prices are also increasing considerably faster than in industrialized countries.

That has put the onus on government leaders to try steering the economy, which is expected to expand by as much as 10 percent this year, away from a possible escalation of inflation pressures that could derail some of their achievements and temper the country's climb in living standards.

"There is a recognition of these pressures and there is virtual unanimity that these have to be managed," Y. Venugopal Reddy, the governor of the central bank, said in an interview this week. On Jan. 31, the central bank raised an important short-term interest rate by a quarter-point, to 7.5 percent, to help stem inflation.

Mr. Singh, Mr. Reddy and other senior officials have repeatedly reaffirmed their commitment in recent days to the market-oriented policies that have helped to triple the economy's growth rate since the early 1990s.

But rising prices are starting to rekindle some nostalgia for the 1980s, when India had one of the world's most highly regulated economies. "You have to ensure some amount of price regulation," said Suhel Seth, a prominent political commentator and marketing consultant. "Under the guise of a free market, you've created a free fall for the poor."

Some of the largest increases in food prices have been here in Mumbai. This is an industrialized peninsula where food is brought in over long distances by truckers who have had to pay much more for diesel fuel over the last year as the Indian government has passed on part of the increase in world oil prices.

Navalben Nagda, a retired shopkeeper in northern Mumbai, shopped for milk this week in a green sari but complained that she and her husband had been forced to change their purchasing habits.

"We buy lower-quality food now because that's all we can afford," she said. "It doesn't taste as good."

Wholesale price inflation has accelerated to 6 percent from 4 percent last spring. Consumer price indexes have risen nearly 7 percent in urban areas over the last year and almost 9 percent in rural areas, where more than two-thirds of the population live and where higher food prices are having the biggest effect.

Government economists attribute rising food prices in India to global factors like a poor harvest in Australia, the growing use of crops to produce ethanol and a higher cost of diesel for tractors. But many here link the increase to the government's encouragement of futures trading in agricultural commodities, and the government has responded this winter by limiting a few types of transactions involving food.

Mr. Reddy said he felt "some justifiable optimism" about inflation and the Indian economy. He pointed to the lagged effects of interest rate increases over the last year that had not yet fully worked their way through the economy. He also noted that Indian companies were investing in additional capacity and that new roads, loading docks and other infrastructure were being built.

Still, the central bank's surveys show that practically all of India's manufacturers are operating at full capacity, as consumer demand has risen first and companies have been slower to respond. Many factory expansions and new factories will be ready in 18 months to two years, Mr. Reddy said, describing the time until then as a transitional period for the economy.

Awash with deposits derived from foreign investors, Indian banks have been lending aggressively, particularly to consumers. That has led to a wave of buying on credit.

Rahim K. Premji, the manager of Allibhai Premji Tyrewalla, a motorcycle store here, said that there had been so many buyers nationwide that for the last six months, motorcycle factories had typically been 15 days late in filling orders.

"It used to be you'd place your order and they'd dispatch it right away," he said. "They've constantly been expanding capacity, but not as fast as demand."

The panoramic view from the 25th floor of India's central bank provides clear evidence of supply shortages. Across a wide swath of four-story buildings, stretching for many miles, not a single construction crane was in sight, not in the nearby historical district nor in the poor and rich neighborhoods alike all the way to the edge of the warm waters of the Indian Ocean.

DOJ_NMG_0130997

That stands in stark contrast to Chinese cities like Beijing, Shanghai and Yantai, which have used rising property markets to help finance the bulldozing of many square miles of crumbling housing.

But India has very strong rent control laws and other tenant protection legislation. Along with extensive litigation and backlogged courts, these rules have made it extremely difficult to demolish and put in high-rise complexes to replace the tens of thousands of acres of moldering buildings that clog large cities.

The scarcity has sent prices even higher for existing housing. In fashionable neighborhoods of South Mumbai, apartment prices have jumped close to 60 percent just since last spring. Foreign investors, including oil-rich investors from nearby Middle East countries, are joining the market, bidding aggressively against members of India's increasingly affluent business elite.

Rushabh S. Mehta, a partner at the Royal House Agency, walked through a 2,000-square-foot apartment that had a cheap-looking concrete floor and flimsy wooden closets. But it is in the chic Malabar Hill neighborhood. The asking price is nearly $1.5 million.

"It's the location, basically — there's no view," he said, looking out a window at the white wall of a neighboring apartment building.

Demand for everything from housing to beer is outpacing supply in part because white-collar salaries are rising faster in India than anywhere else in Asia, climbing 13.7 percent on average over the last year, said Sharad Vishvanath, a labor cost analyst at Hewitt Associates. Wages for junior managers and technical employees are rising fastest of all. Meanwhile, new factories and offices take time to build. But analysts and executives say that productivity gains could allow India to wring more output from the businesses it already has, helping avoid the bottlenecks that can feed an inflationary spiral.

Big gains could come from modern telecommunications and the growing flexibility of India's labor force, as shown by workers like Selvi Partipan in Chennai.

Ms. Partipan, a 40-year-old who gave birth to the first of her five children when she was 13, used to work as a street vendor. She fried samosas and other fare for passers-by, earning just $2 a day.

But six years ago, after partial deregulation of the leather industry, Mrs. Partipan found a leather factory job. She sewed everything from handbags to jackets and earned $3 a day. She learned that she could earn as much as an additional $7 a day by doing extra sewing at home in the evening and on weekends, when other factories were desperate to finish orders.

The difficulty lay in figuring out when a leather factory manager somewhere else needed workers. So last summer, she gave $80 to her son, a security guard who works a morning shift, to buy a mobile phone. When work became available, factories sent text messages to her son and others in English — Mrs. Partipan speaks only a local dialect — and he quickly told her and she raced to the factory gate.

"I've already gathered some orders by phone," she said, wearing a maroon sari and sitting on a plastic stool as a daughter cooked samosas at the same location where Mrs. Partipan used to cook. "It is paying for itself."

But while such adaptability helps to explain the long-term optimism of most government and business leaders in India, people in the streets are more worried about the continuing rise in prices. Mukesh Maru, a shopkeeper in Mumbai, pointed to a steel basin of moong dal, a popular type of small yellow bean in especially short supply now, and said that the price had risen to 58 cents a pound from 23 cents a year ago.

In the 35 years his family's shop has been in business, he said, "it's only in the past year the prices have jumped so much."

Even Amid Its Wealth, India Finds, Half Its Small Children Are Malnourished (NYT)

By Somini Sengupta

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MUMBAI, India, Feb. 9 — Even after India's years of sustained economic growth, child malnutrition rates here are comparable to some of the poorest countries, and at times worse.

In this young nation, where 40 percent of the people are under 18, figures released by the government on Friday offered an alarming portrait of child health: Among children under 3, nearly half are clinically underweight, the most reliable measure of malnutrition.

DOJ_NMG_0130998

Additionally troubling, the incidence of child malnutrition declined only one percentage point, to 46 percent, in seven years, according the latest National Family Health Survey. During that time, the economy grew at 6 to 8 percent; it is poised to swell by more than 9 percent in the current fiscal year, the government announced this week.

India's economic prospects pivot in part around what it calls its demographic dividend.

But the child malnutrition rates put India roughly on a par with Burkina Faso and Bangladesh. Sudan posted better results, according to data compiled by the United Nations Children's Fund, or Unicef. Malnutrition in China was about 8 percent, Unicef said.

The long-awaited health report, which was quietly made public on Friday on a government Web site, also showed scant progress in childhood immunization. In the survey, compiled in 2005-6, 43.5 percent of children 12 to 23 months old were fully immunized, compared with 42 percent in the previous survey, in 1998-99.

Poverty amid plenty is hardly new in India. But the latest numbers are startling because they suggest that economic growth has not significantly uplifted the most destitute, nor have well-meaning government efforts to improve children's well-being yielded measurable results.

The nutrition figures also reflect the grinding poverty in parts of rural India, and poor public health and sanitation in general. The health survey measured how many households had access to a toilet (44 percent nationwide) and the proportion of children who suffered from diarrhea and who were given oral rehydration salts (58 percent).

"It's partly poverty, it's partly the collapse of health services, it's a measure of a completely lopsided pattern of growth in the country," said Jean Drèze, an economist who led a study of India's child nutrition programs late last year.

The nutrition figures showed a wide disparity among states. In central Madhya Pradesh, malnutrition rates are around 60 percent; in Tamil Nadu, the rates have steadily improved, bringing malnutrition down to 33 percent.

The national figures could be seen as an indictment of an ambitious government-financed program, the Integrated Child Development Services, which is intended to help poor families feed their children.

The program has been dogged by criticism in recent months, from charges of corruption in some states to poor accountability elsewhere. Studies by both Unicef and Mr. Drèze's group have concluded that in some places, children get only raw grains. Some workers were not properly trained and some mothers were inadequately counseled about feeding newborns.

Werner Schultink, who runs child development and nutrition programs for Unicef in India, called the latest figures "very disappointing."

"It gives an indication that some of the programs are not as effective as they should be," he said. In mid-January, Prime Minister Manmohan Singh went further in his criticism, urging state officials to review the child nutrition program.

"There is strong evidence that the program has not led to any substantial improvement in the nutritional status of children under 6," he wrote in a letter, adding that for the government actually to keep its promise of providing nutrition to poor children, it would require close monitoring of the program, and "political will."

Theft In Thailand (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

The crusade against drug patents was once fought in the halls of the World Trade Organization. No more. By seizing patents for HIV/AIDS treatments and heart disease, Thailand has asserted that governments have the right to take intellectual property whenever they please.

The Thai Ministry of Public Health announced recently that it would issue a "compulsory license" for Abbott Laboratories' Kaletra, an HIV/AIDS drug, and Clopidogrel, the local Thai brand of Sanofi-Aventis's Plavix heart medication -- meaning that Thailand will eventually produce generic copies of these drugs. Its decision follows a similar move in November against Merck's Stocrin, an antiretroviral HIV/AIDS drug. The Ministry said WTO rules give Thailand "a right to issue a safeguard measure to protect public health, especially for universal access to essential medicines using compulsory licensing on the patent of pharmaceutical products."

Thailand's actions may be technically legal. The WTO language on compulsory licensing is regrettably vague, and doesn't list specific causes for which governments can seize private patents. The only hint of protection of private property lands in Article

31, which says "the proposed user has made efforts to obtain authorization from the right holder on reasonable commercial terms and conditions."

However, Thailand did not bother to consult prior to issuing the compulsory licenses, and the drug companies woke up to read about it in the papers. So it clearly breached the spirit, if not the letter, of Article 31. In any case, it's hard to argue that Thailand has an AIDS epidemic, when its incidence is a little over 1% -- and countries such as South Africa are well over 20%. The same goes for heart disease.

Until now, governments have been careful to define disease outbreaks as "emergencies," primarily because they didn't want to dissuade drug companies from investing in their countries. Hong Kong, for example, refrained from issuing a compulsory license during the 2001 SARS outbreak. Drug companies spend billions of dollars in research, development, training and distribution. Without market-based incentives, there's little reason to invest in R&D.

It's worth noting that Thailand's confiscations are also a boon for the Government Pharmaceutical Organization, the state-owned monopoly. Until it can ramp up its own production, GPO will be the sole importer and reseller of the products Bangkok seized.

GPO says it will charge consumers lower prices. But Merck was already selling Stocrin at cost in Thailand, as it does in other developing countries with over 1% incidence of HIV/AIDS. GPO's profits, then, must come from sourcing a cheaper producer of generics. It's likely to turn to India -- the world's most prolific source of counterfeit generics.

How this is good for Thai patients is anyone's guess. GPO's production facilities have never met WHO standards. HIV drug resistance in Thailand is high, most likely because of the reliance on faulty GPO generic copies. Now, given the lack of patent protection, foreign companies may hesitate to introduce newer, more expensive and sophisticated second- and third-generation drugs into Thailand. If Merck's new AIDS vaccine shows promising results, for example, you can bet it won't debut in Bangkok.

Thailand's decision is already reverberating world-wide. Brazil, which has used the threat of compulsory licensing to extract lower prices from drug companies, is paying attention. Full credit, then, to World Health Organization Director-General Margaret Chan for criticizing Thailand's move and defending IP protection. "I'd like to underline that we have to find a right balance for compulsory licensing," the Bangkok Post quoted her as saying last week. "We can't be naive about this. There is no perfect solution for accessing drugs in both quality and quantity."

Thailand's military junta has embraced bad economics in the name of populism since taking power last October. So far, these decisions have mostly hit investor pocketbooks. Now the government is toying with its citizens' lives.

China's Influence In Africa Arouses Some Resistance (NYT)

By Michael Wines

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Feb. 9 — China is often depicted as a juggernaut of sorts, its untroubled and unfettered rise into the ranks of global powers a fact that lesser nations can only watch with awe and trepidation. On Friday, President Hu Jintao of China completed a 12-day tour of Africa that suggested the reality was more nuanced.

More than that, the visit tested a basic tenet of China's economic relations: that business is business, and what a partner nation's people think about it is not China's — or the world's — preoccupation.

Mr. Hu swept through eight nations, among them some of China's closest African allies, largest trading partners and most prominent objects of Chinese investment. He left behind a multibillion-dollar trail of forgiven debts, cheap new loans and pledges of schools and cultural centers, tokens of affection for a continent of strategic economic importance to Beijing's future.

Yet in Zambia, Mr. Hu was greeted with public disdain, and forced to cancel one appearance, even as he showered more than $800 million in gifts and investments on the nation, one of the world's poorest. In Namibia, a decades-old ally, a newspaper and human rights activists assailed China's foreign policy as selfish and lacking morality.

In South Africa, a generally warm visit was clouded by President Thabo Mbeki's recent warning that Africa risked becoming an economic colony of China, and by Johannesburg's major newspaper, which devoted a full page this week to a scalding critique of China's record on human rights and labor rights.

Mr. Hu's stop in Sudan, where China has extensive oil interests, reignited criticism that Beijing has helped shield its ally and oil supplier from global outrage over attacks on civilians in Darfur.

Mr. Hu also met his share of flag-waving supporters, of course, and the official parts of his trip — the meetings and agreement-signings with heads of state — were a diplomatic and commercial success. Most African heads of state like China, which supported many of their liberation movements when liberation was not fashionable. And they like Mr. Hu, whose views on sovereignty, human rights and development are frequently closer to theirs than are those of Western governments.

But an undercurrent of disquiet accompanied Mr. Hu's barnstorming. Mostly, it came not from heads of state, but from the people they rule, some of whom resent China's growing influence here — for economic, racial and ideological reasons.

"It's important to note the obstacles the Chinese are running into" in Africa, said Bates Gill, a leading China scholar at the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "It has a lot to do with their unfamiliarity with working in countries that have a vibrant private sector and civil society. These guys in the Chinese Embassy, they don't understand that."

China is not yet an overwhelming presence in Africa. The juggernaut image aside, China imports less African oil, invests less money and spends less on aid than does the United States or Europe. As an African trading partner, China ranks third, behind the United States and France, and much of that trade is in oil purchased from Sudan, Angola and Nigeria, not in goods made by African workers.

Unlike most other nations, however, China is frequently seen here as coveting Africa for its oil, gold and other valuable minerals and as a dumping ground for cheap Chinese goods — not for its people or talents. Mr. Mbeki said as much in December, warning in a speech that Africa's relationship to China as an exporter of ore and oil and importer of finished goods threatened to become "a replication of that colonial relationship" between Europe and its African possessions a century ago.

True or not, the perception has been telling. In Zimbabwe, Zambia and elsewhere in southern Africa, an influx of Chinese shopkeepers and street traders has pushed locals into bankruptcy. South African textile workers lost tens of thousands of jobs after the 2005 expiration of a global trade agreement allowed cheaper Chinese goods — including knockoffs of traditional African prints — to flood the country. Angry trade unions called for retaliatory boycotts of shops selling Chinese goods.

Anti-Chinese sentiment has mushroomed in Zambia since 2005, when an explosion at a Chinese-owned copper mine killed at least 46 workers and spawned complaints of unsafe working conditions and poor environmental practices. In last year's presidential election, the populist challenger to President Levy Mwanawasa based part of his campaign on a pledge to curb Chinese influence in the country.

This month, Mr. Hu canceled a visit to Zambia's Copperbelt Province, in the nation's north, apparently because of the threat of protests.

For some foreign powers in Africa, such snubs are part of the territory; both the United States and Europe are regularly assailed for agriculture policies that are said to stunt African farm exports. One reason China has been welcomed into Africa, analysts say, is it can serve as a counterbalance to American influence now that the Soviet Union has vanished from the scene and Russia is far less active in the region.

But while popular dissent is old hat to Westerners, it is less so to the Chinese, for whom foreign relations and domestic policies alike are shaped by governments — not activists, lobbies or public opinion.

Having claimed a bigger role on the African and world stages , Mr. Hu is now reaping the first bitter fruits of pretension to leadership. One test comes in Sudan, where he must reconcile China's doctrine of noninterference in other nations' affairs with the outcry over the killings of civilians in Darfur. In Khartoum, he gave Sudan a $13 million interest-free loan to build a new presidential palace, but also said it was "imperative" to halt the deaths in Darfur.

South Africa's Mbeki Vows To Intensify Fight Against Rampant Crime (WP)

By Craig Timberg

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

JOHANNESBURG, Feb. 9 -- President Thabo Mbeki on Friday sought to reassure worried South Africans that his government is stepping up its fight against crime but offered little new detail on how it can curb levels of rape, robbery and murder that are among the highest in the world.

DOJ_NMG_0131001

After weeks of rising political pressure amid a string of high-profile attacks, Mbeki went further than he had before in acknowledging that levels of violent crime terrify many South Africans. He avoided quibbling over whether rates are rising or falling, or by how much -- an approach that provoked a sharp backlash after an interview last month.

In Friday's State of the Nation speech, made before Parliament in Cape Town and broadcast across the country, Mbeki said, "Certainly we cannot erase that which is ugly and repulsive and claim the happiness that comes with freedom if communities live in fear, closeted behind walls and barbed wire, ever anxious in their houses, on the streets and on our roads, unable freely to enjoy our public spaces. Obviously, we must continue and further intensify the struggle against crime."

He listed government plans to hire more police officers and increase their pay while also bolstering intelligence gathering and improving the sophistication of forensic laboratories.

But administration officials acknowledged that they had formulated and announced most of the initiatives before the recent public outcry.

Analysts praised Mbeki for his expression of concern but faulted him for not offering major new plans on an issue that polls consistently rank among the country's top concerns.

Crime analyst Johan Burger of the Institute of Security Studies in Pretoria said Mbeki's acknowledgment of the problem was "very positive." But, he added, "What he did not say is what is the decisive action that is going to be taken, and how is the fight against crime going to be intensified."

Mbeki announced the government's goal to continue expanding the availability of clean water, electricity and affordable housing while delivering more jobs and training. And he announced plans to create a new system of social security payments, funded by levies on working South Africans, that will expand the government's system of grants to the elderly, poor and unemployed.

On the subject of AIDS, Mbeki pledged to continue expanding prevention and treatment programs, though he offered few clues on how the government could slow the pace of new infections or save already sick South Africans who will die without costly antiretroviral drugs. An estimated 5.5 million out of 46 million South Africans have HIV, which causes AIDS, and only a small percentage of those are receiving vital medicine.

But crime was the most prominent subject in Mbeki's speech, an implicit acknowledgment of how it has come to dominate the national political agenda.

First National Bank, one of the country's largest, printed 1.5 million fliers urging South Africans to write down their experiences with crime and send them to Mbeki. The fliers were to be distributed in newspapers last weekend. Politicians and business leaders close to Mbeki quashed the plan, according to news reports, but not before provoking allegations that Mbeki was insulated from knowledge of the crime experienced by most South Africans.

A union soon created a Web site, http://www.dearpresident.co.za, to collect crime complaints for Mbeki. When his office failed to confirm receipt of thousands of e-mails the Web site generated, the union ordered 25 wheelbarrows to deliver them to him, news reports said.

Mbeki's speech returned to crime again and again but tied it to broader themes, including South Africa's history of racial subjugation and enduring poverty among blacks.

"None of the great social problems we have to solve is capable of resolution outside the context of the creation of jobs and the alleviation and eradication of poverty," he said. "This relates to everything, from the improvement of the health of our people, to reducing the levels of crime, raising the levels of literacy and numeracy, and opening the doors of learning and culture to all."

JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA — Engulfed by a tide of public anger over violent crime, President Thabo Mbeki acknowledged in his annual state of the nation speech Friday that the government needed to work harder to eradicate what he called an "ugly and repulsive" scourge.

Mbeki's speech was in marked contrast to recent televised remarks in which he said there was no evidence that most South Africans thought crime was out of control. Critics said Mbeki was in denial about one of the worst violent crime rates on Earth.

In the days preceding the speech, tens of thousands of South Africans signed Internet petitions and some small businesses took out newspaper ads urging the president to tackle crime seriously.

A major financial institution, First National Bank, commissioned a $2.8-million advertising campaign urging the public to write to Mbeki demanding the government make crime its top priority. But the bank pulled the campaign on the eve of its launch; the government denied widespread news reports that it had pressured the bank to do so.

Mbeki did not launch any major initiatives, but his speech was noteworthy for the stark language it used to describe the crime problem.

"Certainly we cannot erase that which is ugly and repulsive and claim the happiness that comes with freedom if communities live in fear, closeted behind walls and barbed wire, ever anxious in their houses, on the streets and on our roads, unable to freely enjoy our public spaces," Mbeki said. "Obviously we must continue and further intensify the struggle against crime."

Although police statistics have shown a slight improvement in some crime categories, including murder, the rates are still among the world's highest. There were 18,528 murders, 54,926 rapes and 119,726 violent crimes such as aggravated robbery or attempted murder last year in a country of 44 million, police said.

Despite the drop, there is a growing public perception that robberies have become more violent. Fears have been fueled by the killings of several prominent figures and a sharp rise in high-profile crimes, such as robberies of armored cars in which highly organized attackers are often armed with automatic weapons.

The issue has taken on more urgency because South Africa will be the host of soccer's next World Cup, in 2010, and incidents of crime during the tournament could hurt the country's tourism industry.

The U.S. government has issued warnings to travelers about crime in South Africa.

The ruling African National Congress party is sensitive to criticism of its performance on crime. Government officials were riled by U.S. Ambassador Eric Bost's comments in a newspaper interview in November in which he said few people would travel to South Africa for the World Cup if crime continued at its present levels.

Crime has also become an increasing concern for South African businesses. A survey by the Grant Thornton consulting firm found that 84% of medium to large businesses reported that employees or family members had been affected by crime, 88% reported increased security costs, and 65% reported lowered productivity because of crime.

Mbeki reiterated Friday that the number of police would increase from 152,000 to 180,000 before the World Cup. He also promised to continue a program to build more jails and improve cooperation between police and armed private security forces who transport cash for businesses and guard neighborhoods.

But he received as much criticism as praise, with opposition parties saying he had failed to show he grasped the scale of the problem.

$25 Million Offered In Climate Challenge (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 9 -- British billionaire entrepreneur Richard Branson, with former vice president Al Gore at his side, offered a $25 million prize Friday to anyone who can come up with a way to blunt global climate change by removing at least a billion tons of carbon dioxide a year from the Earth's atmosphere.

Branson, saying that the "survival of our species" is imperiled by current environmental trends, said the prize was similar to cash inducements that led to some of history's most notable achievements in navigation, exploration and industry. A competition launched in the 17th century, he said, resulted in the creation of a method to accurately estimate longitude.

"I believe in our resourcefulness and in our capacity to invent solutions to the problems we have ourselves created," said Branson, who has pledged to invest $3 billion in profits from his transportation companies, including Virgin Atlantic Airlines and Virgin Trains, to fighting global warming.

"We are now facing a planetary emergency," said Gore, whose documentary film, "An Inconvenient Truth," has helped him become one of the world's leading voices on climate change issues.

The former vice president will serve as a judge in the contest, known as the Virgin Earth Challenge. He said he hoped the contest would spur scientific innovation without distracting from more practical steps people can take to battle global warming, from using energy-efficient light bulbs to pressuring politicians to confront "the crisis of our time."

"It's a challenge to the moral imagination of humankind," Gore said at a packed news conference, which several noted climate scientists and authors attended. Others provided videotaped endorsements or appeared by live video link.

Gore and Branson said that although scientists are working on technologies to capture carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases at power plants and other industrial sources, no one has developed a strategy to remove gases already released into the atmosphere. Those gases are contributing to a dramatic increase in global temperatures that could have catastrophic results in the coming decades, they said.

The winner of the contest must devise a plan to remove greenhouse gases from the atmosphere without creating adverse effects. The first $5 million would be paid upfront, and the remainder of the money would be paid only after the program had worked successfully for 10 years.

"We're nowhere" on technologies to reduce the amount of carbon dioxide in the air, Gore said. But he said he hoped innovators might be spurred not simply by the cash prize but also by a passion for working on what he called "a moral issue."

Other judges in the competition are James E. Hansen, director of NASA's Goddard Institute for Space Studies; British environmentalists and authors James Lovelock and Crispin Tickell; and Australian conservationist and author Tim Flannery.

Gore, Branson and the other panelists referred repeatedly to a study released last week by the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, made up of hundreds of scientists from 113 countries, that concluded that human activity is warming the planet at a potentially disastrous and irreversible rate.

Gore dismissed critics who say the potential effects of climate change have been exaggerated. He said the overwhelming scientific evidence is that "the planet has a fever." He likened the situation to parents told by a doctor that their child needs medical care; those parents shouldn't listen to "some science fiction expert who tells you it isn't real -- you listen to the doctor."

Gore said he believed public interest in climate change was growing in the United States. But asked whether he thought Americans were ready for a presidential campaign in which global warming was the central issue, he said, "We're not there, yet."

Branson and Gore said they hoped to ask the governments of the United States, Britain and other countries to add to the prize money, or even match the $25 million pledged by Branson. "I don't have much influence with this administration," Gore joked.

Gore, who barely lost the 2000 presidential election to President Bush, has experienced a resurgence in popularity among many Democrats and is still viewed as a potential dark horse candidate in 2008. On Friday, he said he would not categorically rule out another run for public office, but he said he "can't foresee" any circumstances that would lead him to enter the race.

"I'm involved in a different kind of campaign," Gore said.

Details on the $25 million competition can be found athttp://www.virginearth.com.

$25 Million To Encourage Cleaner Air (NYT)

By James Kanter

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 9 — Imagine a giant vacuum cleaner for the atmosphere.

The British billionaire Richard Branson and Al Gore, the former vice president, aimed for just that on Friday when they announced a $25 million prize to meet possibly the biggest challenge faced by humankind: to reduce the planet's warming gases that have collected in the atmosphere since the dawn of the Industrial Revolution.

DOJ_NMG_0131004

"We are now facing a planetary emergency," said Mr. Gore, the author of the book "An Inconvenient Truth," which formed the basis for an Oscar-nominated documentary film about global warming.

At a news conference here, Mr. Branson urged governments to match the prize money he offered. He spoke of past efforts to encourage leaps forward in technologies, like a competition sponsored by the British government that led to more accurate measurement of longitude, saving thousands of lives at sea.

Mr. Gore, who with Mr. Branson, will be one of six judges, said the prize was intended for a project that would be different from technologies currently under development that capture and store large amounts of carbon dioxide from heavy emitters like coal-fired electric plants.

Mr. Gore also said the winning project must be more than a stop-gap against global warming gases. "This is a very new and different way of thinking," he said. Even so, experts in climate change said the prize money might be better spent on projects with more of a chance of success, like building cleaner engines for cars and ensuring that new technologies reach the marketplace.

"This project may hold particular appeal in the aviation industry as there really are no other viable, cleaner fuels in the pipeline," said Steve Rayner, a professor of science and civilization at Oxford University.

Mr. Rayner said plans for a extraction device to clean carbon from the air had been developed by Klaus Lackner, a professor at Columbia University. But Mr. Lackner's project never left the drawing board, Mr. Rayner said. Steve Howard of the Climate Group, a nonprofit organization that Mr. Branson said would help the judges with the deliberations, acknowledged that there were few technologies on the horizon. But he said he hoped the prize would encourage innovators to go to work.

Mr. Gore acknowledged that the prize was "highly speculative" and that it could be seen as a gimmick. But he said organizers should ensure that the prize was not "seen as a substitute or distraction from the main event which is to reduce the amount of CO2 which is being emitted."

Air transport represented about 3.5 percent of global greenhouse gas emissions in 1990 but that figure could grow to about 15 percent by 2050, according to United Nations figures, as cited by the Aviation Environment Federation in London.

The Virgin Group, owned by Mr. Branson, operates airlines.

TERRORISM NEWS:

5 Held In Plot To Kill British Soldier (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 9 — With sirens wailing and streets blocked off to permit its passage, a convoy of police vehicles sped across Britain and wound through central London on Friday to bring five terrorism suspects to court here from Birmingham.

A sixth suspect, who was identified by [a news organization] as Basiru Gassama, 29, was charged with a terrorism offense in Birmingham on Friday evening, the police said.

The six were among nine Muslims seized nine days ago in a roundup of suspects in Birmingham linked to an alleged conspiracy to capture a Muslim British soldier and show images of his killing on the Internet. The three other suspects have been released without charge.

Of the five who faced terrorism charges in court on Friday, only one, Parviz Khan, 36, was specifically charged with engaging "in conduct to give effect to his intention to kidnap and kill a member of the British armed forces." The charge made no direct reference to the Internet.

The four others — Amjad Mahmood, 31, Mohammed Irfan, 30, Zahoor Iqbal, 29, and Hamid Elasmar, 43 — were charged along with Mr. Khan with planning to supply equipment and money in the knowledge that it might be used for an act of terrorism.

Mr. Mahmood was also charged with failing to disclose information that might have helped prevent an act of terrorism.

The charges were brought under British antiterrorism laws enacted in 2000 and 2006.

The arrest of the nine suspects in Birmingham, Britain's second-largest city, stirred worries and anger among many Muslims, who said they believed that the police action and extensive coverage by television and newspapers had further stigmatized Islam. One of the three men released after the arrests said Britain had become a police state for Muslims.

Some Islamic leaders in Birmingham sought on Friday to calm passions by appealing to Muslims to "remain dignified and have a calm attitude," in the words of Mohammad Naseem, the chairman of Birmingham's Central Mosque. But others said the city's Muslims, about 15 percent of the population of one million, were still cautiously waiting to see the outcome of the whole affair.

The Birmingham police said their inquiry had made great strides. "Nine days ago I told you that we were in the foothills of a major investigation," David Shaw, the assistant chief constable in charge of the Birmingham investigation, told reporters. "We have made extraordinary progress in that time, but it would be wrong of me to leave you thinking that this is any sense a completed inquiry."

Mr. Shaw said Muslims in Birmingham "have fed back to us the frustration and damage experienced by the way some of the media have labeled them through their reporting."

By contrast, he said, local people had given "fantastic support" to police officers.

"Contrary to much of the reporting about the area, we have seen real leadership from all sections of the community, who have not only supported us but have also publicly supported our search for the truth," he said.

The five suspects who appeared in court on Friday were ordered to be held until a hearing on Feb. 23. The police in Birmingham said the case had been referred to a London court under protocols covering terrorism cases.

In a separate hearing, Abu Izzadeen, an outspoken convert to Islam who was arrested Thursday, was released on bail on Friday after being charged with encouraging terrorism in a speech last year.

6 Charged In Alleged Terror Plot In Britain (WP)

By Kevin Sullivan

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

LONDON, Feb. 9 -- British police charged six men arrested in Birmingham last week with terrorism-related offenses Friday, officially alleging for the first time that the suspects were plotting to kidnap and kill a British soldier.

Parviz Khan, 36, is accused of leading the plot with help from four other men arrested in pre-dawn raids last week and charged with providing equipment and funding for the plan: Mohammed Irfan, 30; Zahoor Iqbal, 29; Hamid Elasmar, 43; and Amjad Mahmood, 31. All five appeared in a London courtroom Friday and were ordered held until a Feb. 23 hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0131009

The sixth suspect, Basiru Gassama, 29, was charged with failing to inform authorities about the plot, which is a crime under Britain's Terrorism Act. He is due to appear in a London court Saturday.

David Shaw, spokesman for the West Midlands police, said police had recovered 4,500 pieces of evidence, including computers and mobile phones, that point to "the stark reality of what was being planned in our midst."

The plot, reportedly involving the kidnap, torture and murder of a Muslim soldier in the British army, is widely seen as a new kind of extremist threat in Britain. Since bomb attacks on the London public transit system that killed 52 passengers and four bombers in July 2005, police have repeatedly broken up alleged plots to commit large-scale attacks, including an alleged plan last summer to blow up commercial jetliners traveling from Britain to the United States.

For many Britons, the plot to kill a soldier -- and, according to the media, post video of the execution on the Internet -- has had worrisome echoes of violence that until now had been common in Iraq but unheard-of in Europe or the United States.

Police arrested nine people last week, including three who were released without charge. British police may hold terrorism suspects for up to 28 days without charge with a judge's approval.

One of the men, Abu Bakr, told reporters after he was released that Britain had become a "police state for Muslims."

"It's not a police state for everybody else because these terror laws are designed specifically for Muslims, and that's quite an open fact," said Bakr, a university student who works in an Islamic bookstore that was raided by police. He said his week-long detention was "going to affect me for the rest of my life."

Bakr's comments mirror a widespread feeling among Britain's nearly 2 million Muslims that they are being unfairly targeted by police and government policies. Many believe that the actions of some religious extremists have cast unwarranted suspicion on the wider Muslim community, pointing to last year's arrest of two brothers in the Forest Gate section of London in a suspected chemical weapons plot. After a high-profile police raid, in which one of the brothers was shot by police, the men were released without charge.

Prime Minister Tony Blair called the description of Britain as a police state "categorically wrong."

Jack Straw, a top official in Blair's government, called the allegations "absolute, utter nonsense."

"We live in a democracy, and what we are sadly having to fight at the moment is people who seek to destroy the very basis of our democracy," Straw said in Parliament this week.

Also Friday, government officials announced that they had ordered the closure of an Islamic school in Sussex, southeast of London, that was raided in September as part of an anti-terrorism operation. Government education officials said the Jameah Islameah school had been closed for failure to meet government standards for independent schools.

The school, set in the countryside on 54 acres of land, was searched by scores of police in an operation in which 14 people were arrested in London. Media reports at the time said the school might have been used by radicals trying to recruit and train violent extremists. Police on Friday said 12 of those arrested were charged with terror-related offenses and are awaiting trial. Two were released without charge.

Padilla Is Competent to Face Terror Trial, Prosecutors Say

MIAMI -- An evaluation of suspected al-Qaeda operative Jose Padilla by the U.S. Bureau of Prisons has found him competent to stand trial on terrorism charges, government attorneys said in court documents filed Friday.

Padilla 36, can understand the court proceedings and communicate with his attorneys, according to prosecutors' description of the report's conclusions.

Padilla, a U.S. citizen and former Chicago gang member, contends that he was tortured in custody. His attorneys say he is suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, which raises questions about his competence for trial, allegations that federal officials reject.

A competency hearing is set for next Friday.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Homeland Budget Called Inadequate (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131010

The chairman of a House committee yesterday challenged Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff to explain how his agency's budget was adequate to guard against a terrorist attack or another Katrinalike disaster, saying "we cannot continue to protect the homeland on the cheap."

Rep. Bennie Thompson, Mississippi Democrat and chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee, said President Bush's proposed $35 billion Homeland Security budget does not address necessary funding for key programs and leaves the nation vulnerable to terrorists and natural disasters.

"Millions of lives are at stake," Mr. Thompson said.

Rep. Peter T. King of New York, the committee's ranking Republican, also questioned whether the department's budgeting process needed revamping, saying agency officials were basing spending increases on a 2003 budget "guesstimate" when the agency was formed.

"Should we, rather than work within the box, create a larger box?" Mr. King asked, noting that White House spokesman Tony Snow said on Thursday the administration was trying to do the best it could with scarce resources.

"If we're at war with Islamic terrorism, the resources for Homeland Security should not be scarce," he said. "It should not be just another Cabinet department. ... With a $2.9 trillion budget, we should be able to find a few billion more for homeland security. Either we're at war with Islamic terrorism or we're not."

Both lawmakers also expressed concern over what they called a delay in implementing a $1 billion communications system for emergency workers. They described the program as "critical" to the nation's first responders in the event of a terrorist attack or natural disaster.

"The inability to communicate hampers the ability to respond to an event and creates further confusion," Mr. King said. "I'm equally concerned by the delay in getting the administration of this grant program up and running."

In his second appearance before Congress in two days to defend the budget, Mr. Chertoff noted it represented an 8 percent increase over last year and again described the 2008 budget proposal as "sound, simple and ample."

"It reflects the president's very strong commitment ... to continuing to make sure we have the tools and resources that we need to enhance our security but in a way that balances our freedom and our prosperity," Mr. Chertoff said.

But Mr. Thompson said that while Mr. Chertoff thinks the 2008 budget proposal protects the nation's people and critical infrastructure, improves emergency preparedness and response, and improves the operation and management of the department, he was not convinced.

He noted that last year, the entire nation "was disgusted with the atrocious response to Hurricane Katrina" and confidence in the department was at an all-time low. He said it was "evident" the department was not prepared to handle another catastrophic terrorist attack or natural disaster.

"This may be a new year, but in some instances, Mr. Secretary, it feels like deja vu," Mr. Thompson said. "I do recognize some significant increases in the areas such as cyber and border security; unfortunately, I fear that behind the increases lurks some problems rather than answers."

He said the budget eliminates funding for local law-enforcement terrorism-prevention programs, proposes significant cuts in grants to first responders in all 50 states and U.S. territories, and would zero out funding for grants to metropolitan medical systems that he said would be needed to prepare for the mass casualties in the event of a disaster.

Mr. Thompson also said he was concerned whether the budget adequately addresses why the department ranked at the bottom for the second time in nearly every category of the Office of Personnel Management Employee Satisfaction Survey.

Proposed Federal Protective Service Cuts Hit (WT)

By Shaun Waterman

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

President Bush's new budget proposes cuts to the Federal Protective Service, police that guard U.S. government buildings, a move labor unions say will be "the last nail in the coffin" of the agency that is being replaced by private contractors.

Administration officials say changes to the agency in the Department of Homeland Security improve efficiency without sacrificing security, and that private security firms already guard the vast majority of federal buildings.

A memo to staff from the service's acting Director Paul Durette Monday said it would be "realigned" as a "standards-setting and compliance-centered operation" with 950 employees, from the current 1,250 or so.

The changes mean the service "work force will be primarily composed of inspectors," with "patrol functions ... limited only to the highest risk major metropolitan areas, or in locations where special security arrangements require" them.

The service will maintain its inspectors, and "a core group of criminal investigators dedicated to intelligence and investigative activities related to federal facilities," but "the remaining uniformed cadre of police officers [in the agency] will be absorbed into other law enforcement functions" within homeland security, or encouraged to take early retirement, states the memo.

The move will complete the service's transformation from a police force that actually guards U.S. government buildings across the country, including federal courthouses, to one that largely sets and enforces standards on private firms hired by other agencies to provide security at 880 or so facilities.

"This will be the last nail in the coffin," said David Wright, president of the service's union, American Federation of Government Employees Local 918. "It will break morale, it will break the service."

Mr. Wright said Mr. Durette's proposal was "a rehash of failed initiatives they have tried before."

"The administration is proposing to walk away from its basic responsibility" to protect federal buildings across the country, said American Federation of Government Employees National President John Gage in a statement vowing to oppose the cuts.

A Homeland Security official said the department was reviewing the service's role "looking at areas where its responsibilities might duplicate those of other agencies."

The result would be "a higher standard of service for our customers," the federal agencies who own and operate the buildings protect ed by the service.

Mr. Wright said the plan was a response to a huge budget deficit the agency had -- up to $65 million -- blaming the departmental leadership at Homeland Security for their "reluctance ... to go back to Congress to help solve this problem."

The service's management "is not being forthcoming about where the deficit comes from," Mr. Wright said, adding that lawmakers he had spoken to this week were demanding a government audit of the service's finances.

The Federal Protective Service is managed as part of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, a part of the Department of Homeland Security.

Will Bush Library Be A Target? (DMN)

By Kristen Holland

The Dallas Morning News, February 10, 2007

Terrorists will destroy the Bush library and take out most of the Park Cities at the same time. The question isn't if but when, says Sam Boyd, a Park Cities lawyer.

Mr. Boyd isn't alone.

A number of Park Cities residents say they fear that building the presidential library in University Park would be like painting a big, red target on their community.

Security and terrorism experts have mixed sentiments. Although some say presidential libraries are unlikely targets, others say Bush's library may change that because the president is such a polarizing figure worldwide.

"It's just kind of a realization," Mr. Boyd said about the terrorist threat. "I'm not willing it. I don't want it. But if they build the target, somebody's going to shoot at it."

Mr. Boyd, who was a Green Beret in Vietnam, was one of dozens of residents who squeezed into University Park's City Council chambers this week to comment on whether the city should sell to Southern Methodist University a small park that the private university may need for the Bush library. SMU learned in December that it was the lone finalist to host the facility.

Presidential Bookmarks : A guide to presidential libraries across the U.S.

Though the library has drawn sharp criticism in recent months – from SMU faculty members and Methodist clergy – the terrorism concerns raised by several residents at the public hearing represent a new front against the facility.

University officials say they are concerned about security but not enough to abandon their bid for the library.

"We take security very seriously," said Patti LaSalle, SMU's associate vice president and executive director of public affairs. "But in this post-9/11 world, we also feel that we're not going to retreat into fearful existence. We're not going to stop taking advantage of opportunities."

If SMU is awarded the library, the National Archives and Records Administration, which oversees the presidential library system, will provide security. The university has a director of emergency preparedness and an emergency operations center. Both were created after 9/11.

Danny Defenbaugh, former head of the FBI's Dallas office, understands the residents' concerns. He said presidential libraries could be targeted because they're icons.

"Not the type of national icon like the Washington monument or the Capitol would be," Mr. Defenbaugh said. "However, it is. Appropriate security concerns need to be applied."

DOJ_NMG_0131012

William Harris, director of physical infrastructure and collection support for the National Archives' Office of Presidential Libraries, said security goes beyond armed guards and metal detectors at the nation's presidential libraries. Security measures are incorporated into the architectural and design standards for the libraries.

Mr. Harris couldn't provide many specifics, but one basic requirement is for a 100-foot setback from major highways or thoroughfares. He also said all the libraries have round-the-clock security details. Cameras monitor all buildings and grounds.

But that security won't be enough, says Avi, a terrorism expert with Mayday International, a security firm that provides counterterrorism training.

Avi, who spoke on condition that his last name not be used because of the sensitivity of his profession, said SMU and law enforcement officials would not be able to stop terrorists from targeting the Bush library.

"George Bush is not accepted by so many cultures in the world, especially the Islamic world," Avi said. "Wherever you carry the word 'Bush' might be potential for attack."

He said he doubts a group like al-Qaeda would take the time to plan such an attack. With students coming to and from SMU, it would be much easier for a small group of fanatics – such as young supporters of Hezbollah – to hide among students and do the job.

University Park Police Chief Gary Adams said residents concerned about a terrorist attack are raising good points. He said any public facility is a possible terrorist target.

The department has listed SMU as a potential target because it has a large number of people in a relatively small area.

"If they plan an attack in University Park, we've always thought it would be Ford Stadium during a game," Chief Adams said. "The library certainly could be a potential target."

Highland Park DPS Chief Darrell Fant said the risk of a terrorist attack at the library is remote. He said he'd be more concerned about President Bush moving to town. The president and first lady Laura Bush have indicated they will return to Dallas at least part time after Mr. Bush leaves office.

"Any time you have a past president – and we've had past governors and I've had sons and daughters of foreign diplomats – it demands a different type of response plan," Chief Fant said. "It certainly creates a greater potential and a greater threat level."

While anything can be a target, Andrew Teekell said terrorist organizations such as al-Qaeda probably wouldn't waste their time attacking a presidential library, even with Bush's name on it.

"Certainly there would be some symbolic value there," said Mr. Teekell, a counterterrorism and security analyst at Stratfor, a private security-consulting firm in Austin. "But you probably wouldn't generate a lot of casualties. If that's the best al-Qaeda can do, I'm frankly not impressed."

He said they would gain some points for staging an attack on American soil, but not much.

"Once again, I don't think it would occur to them," he said. "However, that's not to say that a target like that wouldn't be attractive to domestic terrorists."

Although it's possible the Bush library could be targeted, terrorism expert Jennifer Holmes said the threat is minimal.

"If people want to live in a bunker, they're less likely to have problems," said Dr. Holmes, associate professor of political economy and political science at the University of Texas at Dallas. "The issue is the relative risk compared to anywhere else in Dallas. Dallas is a target-rich environment anyway. One more really doesn't make a difference."

"They're all more likely to die on [U.S. Highway] 75 or LBJ anyway," Dr. Holmes added.

Tom Sheehan, the former police chief at D/FW International Airport, said water-storage facilities, power plants or nuclear facilities would be a more likely target than a presidential library because their destruction would affect day-to-day life.

"You could make a bigger splash hitting a grade school," he added.

That's not much comfort to University Park resident Irene Mitchell, who worries that the Bush library would subject residents to threats by religious extremists, intent on punishing the White House for its international policies.

"We haven't a clue," Ms. Mitchell said. "We're like ostriches hiding our heads in the sand if we don't think it'll come here, because it will."

Katrina Suits Put U.S. Judge In Eye Of Storm (WSJ)

By Liam Pleven, Paulo Prada

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Lyonel Thomas Senter Jr.'s roots run deep in northern Mississippi, amid magnolia-lined streets and antebellum mansions. He learned to play trumpet there and high-school football and became a federal judge.

Now, at 73 years old, Judge Senter has become a defining figure in the coastal south of the state, presiding over a deluge of legal cases that grew out of Hurricane Katrina. The storm triggered more than 1.2 million claims from homeowners for $17.6

billion in damage, says the Insurance Information Institute, a trade group. Most claims have been resolved, but thousands of homeowners in the Gulf region are still suing their insurers, and billions are still at stake.

At issue in many of these cases is a messy question. Were homes destroyed by the ferocious winds of the storm or the surging Gulf waters that came with them? Insurers typically cover wind damage but exclude water damage, because it's covered under the federal government's flood insurance program. Yet who knows what's behind the damage when a house has been wiped off the map?

Judge Lyonel Thomas Senter Jr. (pictured) is delivering some key decisions in Mississippi Katrina cases.

Judge Senter has been at the core of several recent critical turns in cases in Mississippi -- which have generally moved faster than in Louisiana -- in part because he's one of the few federal judges there whose own home wasn't damaged by the storm. At least two other judges have sued their insurers. He owns a condo in nearby New Orleans that was unharmed and stays in a hotel when in Mississippi.

Judge Senter, who has declined interviews, has ruled against the insurance industry in some important ways. In late January, he ruled against State Farm Insurance Cos., the nation's largest home insurer, in one case involving one Mississippi couple, setting the stage for a $1 million punitive damage award against the company.

A few days later, he tossed aside a proposed settlement that would have had State Farm pay at least $50 million to thousands of Mississippi homeowners, helping it clean the slate of Katrina-related conflicts in the area. He said he needed more information.

He'll be holding a hearing on the settlement -- important to residents desperate for rebuilding funds -- on Feb. 28.

"I would like nothing more than to approve a settlement procedure that is fair, balanced and reasonable," he wrote in an order Thursday that set that coming hearing.

He's handed the insurance industry some important victories. Last March, he upheld a standard provision in many policies that frees them from the responsibility of covering damage caused by floods. The industry considers the "flood exclusion" sacred.

But beyond upholding flood exclusions, his rulings have put the onus on insurers -- not homeowners -- to prove which damage was caused by wind and to pay for it, or risk costly penalties.

"Judge Senter has laid out a framework that is likely to be followed by most courts" in future hurricane-related cases, says John Ellison, an attorney with New York-based Anderson, Kill & Olick PC, who is representing Louisiana plaintiffs in other Katrina-related cases.

Judge Senter is not the first to address the wind vs. water issue. But this is "the first time we're seeing it on a massive scale," says Tom Baker, director of the Insurance Law Center at the University of Connecticut Law School.

Judge Senter himself is a relative newcomer to the Gulf Coast, having grown up in Aberdeen in the north. It is a once-prosperous town on the Tombigbee River, where the movie house on Commerce Street still sells popcorn for $1. He was a sure-footed high-school quarterback until he was stricken with polio, which later forced him to walk with a leg brace and crutches. He now uses a wheelchair.

After working as an attorney and serving as a state judge, he was nominated to the federal bench by President Carter in 1979. He later became chief of the Northern District, sitting in Aberdeen, where he garnered a reputation as a thoughtful, fair and even-tempered jurist who combines small-town practicality with a scholarly interpretation of the law.

"This is a guy that sees both sides to everything," says Danny McKittrick, a probation officer at the district court. "He never claims to know it all and works hard to get the information necessary to understand what he's hearing."

The judge, who sometimes introduces himself as "Tommy" outside the courtroom, played trumpet with a jazz band in college. He once used the trumpet to ease tensions in a case, recalls Ron Welch, a Mississippi lawyer. Mr. Welch and another attorney were in chambers strenuously arguing a point when Judge Senter began asking about their personal interests and then steered the conversation to music. He then suggested they take a break, and they wound up at Judge Senter's house, where he pulled out his trumpet and played "Summertime," the lullaby from "Porgy and Bess."

"We ended up settling that point," says Mr. Welch.

In 1998, Judge Senter became a senior judge, and he relocated to the Southern District of Mississippi in 2002. When Katrina hit, Judge Senter rode out the storm with friends in Pensacola, Fla., and took over Katrina-related cases afterward.

Some of the judge's recent rulings could have added import as Katrina cases work their way through the system in the Gulf. Among those rulings was his call on how insurers should proceed when both wind and water cause damage to a home. The insurer -- not the policyholder -- bears the burden of proving which part should be excluded.

That came into play last month in the case brought against State Farm by Norman and Genevieve Broussard, of Biloxi, Miss. Their home was wiped away. State Farm denied the claim. "State Farm attempted to shift its burden of proof to the plaintiffs to establish the portion of their losses that were caused by wind," Judge Senter said in his ruling. He ordered the insurer to pay to the limits of the policy, $211,222 for the home and its contents.

DOJ_NMG_0131014

A jury then awarded the couple $2.5 million in punitive damages, which Judge Senter later reduced to $1 million.

"If that's the law, then that will have a huge impact on how future cases are handled," says Randy Maniloff, an attorney for insurance companies at White & Williams LLC in Philadelphia who has written about Judge Senter's rulings.

State Farm, which is based in Bloomington, Ill., says it is likely to appeal the entire case, and adds that the company is working on answering the judge's questions about the proposed settlement.

WAR NEWS:

Pre-war Intelligence Gathering Under Fire (LAT)

By Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — Senate Democrats assailed Pentagon officials today for insisting to the White House in the months before the Iraq war that Saddam Hussein had direct links to Al Qaeda — despite doubts within the U.S. intelligence community.

Defense Department Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the lawmakers that he questioned Douglas J. Feith, the influential former undersecretary, about the incident.

Feith was a prime architect of Bush administration policies and presented policymakers with allegations of links between Iraq and Al Qaeda that did not accurately reflect the views of U.S. intelligence agencies.

"He said it was left out because it was critical of the intelligence community," Gimble said.

"It's damn suspicious to me," said Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.). "You're telling the CIA — you're giving them an assessment that disagrees in a number of respects with theirs, but leave out a slide that says that you have fundamental problems with how the intelligence community is assessing information…. You remove it when you're talking to the CIA and then you reinsert it when you present this same assessment to the White House. That's mighty bloody suspicious."

Republicans defended the Pentagon's intelligence gathering operation under former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld during the months leading up to the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq in March 2003. Sen. Jim Inhofe (R-Okla.) said Feith's group at the Pentagon asked "probing questions" that improved the intelligence process.

Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman denied that the policy shop produced its own intelligence, saying they were looking at the intelligence community's work "with a critical eye."

The testimony follows a critical report released by the inspector general's office.

Its findings lend credence to charges by White House critics that Feith, who has since left the department, was out of line when he sought to discredit analyses by CIA intelligence officials that discounted alleged ties between Al Qaeda and then-Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Feith, in responding to the investigation, defended his actions and said he was pleased that the report found he had done nothing illegal.

The report says that Feith's office "developed, produced and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and Al Qaeda relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community."

Levin, in a statement released Thursday, said the report found that Feith acted inappropriately, taking on a role that should have been reserved for the intelligence analysts.

The report is sure to add fuel to the controversy over President Bush's main justifications for overthrowing Hussein.

Before the invasion, Bush and other administration officials warned that Hussein had stockpiles of banned biological and chemical weapons and had ties to Al Qaeda terrorists.

The alleged caches of weapons have not been found and the independent commission that investigated the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks found no evidence of a collaborative relationship between Hussein and Al Qaeda.

Levin has been highly critical of Feith in the past, saying he played a key role in helping Bush make a misleading case for war. In 2005, Levin requested the probe into Feith's activities.

In his statement, Levin called the inspector general's report "devastating," and said he was going to push for the full, classified version of the investigation to be made public.

In a statement, Feith said it "is good but not surprising" that the report found that his office's activities "were all legal and authorized" and that he and his aides "did not mislead Congress." But he took issue with the conclusion that his actions were inappropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0131015

"I disagree with the inspector general's opinions here mainly because, if heeded, they would discourage policy officials from asking tough questions about the quality of CIA work," he said.

At the Pentagon, Feith created the Office of Special Plans, an organization that drafted plans for the war in Iraq. Feith has long rejected claims by critics that the office generated misleading intelligence.

Analysts in the Office of Special Plans believed that the CIA was ignoring links between Al Qaeda operatives and Iraq.

Feith resigned from the Pentagon in 2005 and teaches at Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service.

Senate Intelligence Committee Chairman John D. Rockefeller IV (D-W.Va.) said in a statement Thursday that his panel had never been informed about the activities of Feith's office.

"Individuals in that office produced and disseminated intelligence products outside of the regular intelligence channels," Rockefeller said. "These intelligence products were inconsistent with the consensus judgments of the intelligence community and as a result policy makers received distorted intelligence."

CIA Doubts Didn't Deter Feith's Team (LAT)

By Greg Miller, Julian E. Barnes

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON — As the Bush administration began assembling its case for war, analysts across the U.S. intelligence community were disturbed by the report of a secretive Pentagon team that concluded Iraq had significant ties to Al Qaeda.

Analysts from the CIA and other agencies "disagreed with more than 50%" of 26 findings the Pentagon team laid out in a controversial paper, according to testimony Friday from Thomas F. Gimble, acting inspector general of the Pentagon.

The dueling groups sat down at CIA headquarters in late August 2002 to try to work out their differences. But while the CIA agreed to minor modifications in some of its own reports, Gimble said, the Pentagon unit was utterly unbowed.

"They didn't make the changes that were talked about in that August 20th meeting," Gimble said, and instead went on to present their deeply flawed findings to senior officials at the White House.

The work of that special Pentagon unit — which was run by former Undersecretary of Defense Douglas J. Feith — is one of the lingering symbols of the intelligence failures leading up to the war in Iraq.

The Bush administration's primary justification for invading Iraq was always its assertion that Saddam Hussein possessed weapons of mass destruction. But Iraq's supposed ties to Al Qaeda — and therefore its connection to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks — were an important secondary argument, and one that resonated with many Americans in the lead-up to the war with Iraq.

The CIA and many other intelligence agencies were wrong in their assessments of Iraq's weapons programs. But the agency was always deeply skeptical about the ties between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

Most of the evidence that Feith's Office of Special Plans cited in making its case for significant collaboration between Baghdad and Al Qaeda has crumbled under postwar scrutiny. The Senate Intelligence Committee has concluded that Saddam Hussein was so wary of the terrorist network that he barred anyone in his government from dealing with Al Qaeda.

Although the Pentagon Inspector General's report released Friday did not address the accuracy of such assessments, it documented the unusual efforts by Defense Department policymakers to bypass regular intelligence channels and influence officials at the highest level of government.

Feith's work was of critical importance to Vice President Dick Cheney, who once referred to the Pentagon team's conclusions as the "best source" for understanding the relationship between Iraq and Al Qaeda.

The activities of Feith's group weren't illegal, Gimble concluded. But they were, "in our opinion, inappropriate, given that the intelligence assessments were [presented as] intelligence products and did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community."

The Pentagon team touted a series of claims that have not survived postwar review. Among them was the allegation that Mohammed Atta, the presumed ringleader of the Sept. 11 hijackers, had met with an Iraqi agent in Prague before the attacks.

A critical question raised by the inspector general's report is whether Feith and his office were just critiquing CIA analysis, or were creating their own intelligence assessment, a role that is supposed to be left to the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) noted Friday that Cheney has referred to Feith's work as an "assessment," suggesting it was a formal intelligence document. But Feith maintained in interviews he was not creating an intelligence "product," but was just checking the work of the CIA.

Laurence H. Silberman, a semiretired U.S. appeals court judge and co-chairman of a presidential commission on Iraq's weapons, said it is appropriate to question intelligence.

"Policymakers, whether they are in Defense, State, the White House or Congress, are absolutely entitled to question the intelligence community, look over the material and come up with their own views," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0131016

Feith's work had the blessing of his boss, former Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. The operation was set up at the behest of then-Deputy Defense Secretary Paul D. Wolfowitz with approval from Rumsfeld, Gimble noted. By most accounts, those three officials had distrust, if not disdain, for the work of the CIA and other intelligence agencies.

But Robert M. Gates, the new secretary of Defense and former CIA director, said that groups outside the CIA and other chartered intelligence agencies should not be involved in freelance analysis.

"Based on my whole career, I believe all intelligence activities need to be carried on by the established institutions, where there is appropriate oversight," he told reporters traveling with him in Europe for meetings on security.

Gimble provided new details on the chain of events leading from the creation of the Feith team, through a series of briefings it made for senior officials and culminating in a presentation before deputies in the National Security Council at the White House.

The initial instruction to search for links between Iraq and Al Qaeda came from Wolfowitz in January 2002, Gimble said.

By that July, Feith had assembled a group of analysts detailed from other agencies to draft a document outlining evidence that the officials thought other agencies had ignored.

The team presented its findings to Rumsfeld on Aug. 8. Rumsfeld found it so compelling that he urged Feith to arrange a briefing for then-CIA Director George J. Tenet at the CIA. In the meantime, the team's paper began to circulate among analysts at other agencies who took issue with more than half of its contents.

"There were like 26 points," in the Feith team's paper, Gimble said. "And essentially [experts at other agencies] disagreed with more than 50% of it, and either agreed or partially agreed with the remainder."

When the team briefed Tenet and other senior CIA officials on Aug. 15, the audience was polite but unimpressed. Tenet described the meeting as "useful," Gimble said, but "in our interviews with him he later said that he only said that it was 'useful' because he didn't agree with it and he was just trying to, you know, nicely end the meeting."

That encounter led to the "roundtable" meeting at the agency five days later where CIA experts urged the Pentagon unit to at least include footnotes acknowledging the long list of disagreements.

Nevertheless, the Pentagon team pressed on.

P.J. Crowley, a retired Air Force colonel and a senior fellow at the Center of American Progress, said that the intelligence peddled by Feith tainted the public dialogue.

"They weren't creating intelligence, but they were assembling the pieces to create a rationale for war," Crowley said. "Their production was discredited, but they had the desired effect. The little pieces ended up infecting the process."

Pentagon Office "misled" On Iraq War (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

A special Pentagon office created in the run-up to the Iraq war engaged in “inappropriate” activities by providing misleading intelligence to policymakers, according to the US Department of Defense.

The Pentagon inspector-general on Friday said the Office of Special Plans set up by Douglas Feith, then undersecretary of defence for policy, provided senior policymakers with “alternative intelligence assessments” on alleged links between al-Qaeda and Iraq that were “inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community”.

Senator Carl Levin, the Democratic chairman of the armed services committee and senior member of the intelligence committee, said the report was a “devastating condemnation” of senior Pentagon officials.

“The bottom line is that intelligence relating to the Iraq/al-Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration’s decision to invade Iraq when the intelligence assessments of the professional analysts of the intelligence community did not provide the desired compelling case,” said Mr Levin.

The report comes at a critical time for the White House as President George W. Bush struggles to keep Republican support for the war in Iraq.

Democrats have long argued that Mr Feith was engaged in helping Dick Cheney, vice-president, build the case for war based on inaccurate, or misleading, intelligence.

Before the 2003 invasion, Mr Cheney often referred to the alleged links between al-Qaeda and Saddam Hussein, which subsequent investigations confirmed never existed.

While the report said the actions of Mr Feith’s office were not “illegal or unauthorised”, it concluded that they were “inappropriate” because they “did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community”.

Mr Feith, who now teaches at Georgetown University, told Associated Press that the allegations of inappropriate activity were “bizarre”.

DOJ_NMG_0131017

"The policy office has been smeared for years by allegations that its pre-Iraq-war work was somehow 'un-lawful' or 'unauthorised' and that some information it gave to congressional committees was deceptive or misleading," AP cited Mr Feith as saying.

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, in Seville for Nato meetings yesterday, said he had not read the report, which referred to activities that occurred under his predecessor, Donald Rumsfeld.

But the former Central Intelligence Agency director said: "Based on my whole career, all intelligence -activities need to be carried out through established institutions where there is oversight."

Separately, yesterday, Mr Gates said the US had "pretty good" evidence that Iran was providing groups in Iraq with sophisticated explosive devices called "explosively formed projectiles" [EFPs].

He said the evidence included serial numbers and markings on fragments of exploded devices. But Mr Gates again dismissed suggestions that the recent increase in anti- Iranian rhetoric in Washington was a prelude to war. After the Iranian supreme leader threatened on Thursday to respond to any US attack on Iran, Mr Gates responded that it was "just another day in the Persian Gulf".

Asked yesterday whether that response was aimed at ratcheting down the US rhetoric, he replied: "In the last few weeks there's been an effort in Washington actually to tone down everybody else.

"I don't know how many times the president, Secretary [Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran, that the second carrier group [recently dispatched to the Gulf] is there to -reassure our allies, as well as to send a signal that we've been in the Persian Gulf for decades and we intend to stay there. And I think these are fairly modest statements."

Senators Debate Significance Of Pentagon Report On Intelligence (WP)

By Walter Pincus, Karen DeYoung

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Senate Democrats and Republicans disagreed yesterday over the meaning and importance of a Defense Department inspector general's conclusion that a Pentagon policy office produced and gave senior policymakers "alternative intelligence assessments on Iraq and Al Qaida relations" that were "inconsistent" with the intelligence community's consensus view in the lead-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq.

Acting Defense Department Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the Senate Armed Services Committee that he had no evidence that the Pentagon activities were illegal and said they were authorized by then-Secretary of Defense Donald H. Rumsfeld and his deputy, Paul D. Wolfowitz.

But, he said, "the actions, in our opinion, were inappropriate."

The office's assessments, according to an unclassified summary of Gimble's report released yesterday, "evolved from policy to intelligence products, which were then disseminated." The summary said the intelligence community's consensus view and "available intelligence" at the time, late in the summer of 2002, did not support the policy office's conclusion that a "mature symbiotic relationship" existed between Iraq and al-Qaeda.

An article in yesterday's Washington Post misattributed to the inspector general's report critical comments about the Pentagon operation made by committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.). In a statement he released Thursday, Levin, not the inspector general, said the Pentagon effort used intelligence reporting of "dubious quality or reliability." [See correction, A2.]

Douglas J. Feith, the former undersecretary of defense for policy, sharply disputed the inspector general's conclusions in a series of interviews yesterday. "My office was trying to prevent an intelligence failure," Feith told National Public Radio. "We had people in the Pentagon who thought that the CIA's speculative assessments were not of top quality; they were not raising all the questions they should raise and considering all the information they should consider."

His office "did not present an alternative intelligence analysis," Feith said, it "presented a criticism."

After weeks of discussion over President Bush's strategy for ongoing involvement in Iraq, yesterday's hearing once again plunged the Senate into discord over how the United States got there in the first place.

Levin, who has long questioned Feith's prewar intelligence operation, was harshly critical. "Senior administration officials used the twisted intelligence produced by the Feith office in making the case for the Iraq war," Levin said. Calling the inspector general's report a "devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities," he said he would hold further hearings on the subject.

"I don't think in any way that his report could be interpreted as a devastating condemnation," Sen. James M. Inhofe (R-Okla.) quickly countered. Feith's office, he said, "actually provided a service" by bringing intelligence community failures to the attention of policymakers. Inhofe described the disagreements outlined in the inspector general's report as a simple "turf battle" between government departments.

Democratic senators used Gimble's report and testimony to bolster their contention that the administration misused intelligence to promote the urgency of invading Iraq. Republicans implied that the intelligence community had soft-pedaled crucial reports of a close al-Qaeda relationship with Saddam Hussein and that Feith's office had put them in the proper perspective.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence is in the process of producing a "Phase II" of its investigation of the lead-up to the war, dealing with allegations that the administration emphasized unproven intelligence that supported its charges against Hussein and played down information that undercut them. The committee has been awaiting the inspector general's report.

Gimble repeatedly emphasized yesterday that his report "was an investigation of a process" at the Pentagon and not of any individuals. That process was inappropriate, he said, because it purported to produce an "intelligence product" but its conclusions did not acknowledge alternative views within the intelligence community.

"The condition occurred because the role of the Office of the Undersecretary of Defense Policy was expanded from the mission of doing defense policy to analyzing and disseminating alternative intelligence," Gimble said. "As a result, the office did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to the senior decision-makers."

"I don't know whether it was intentional or whether it was a good-faith judgment," Gimble said. "That's not my position, and I wouldn't have a thought on that. All I can tell you is at the end of the day, when those things went forward, there was two sets of facts out there; one of them got passed over, and it would happen to be the one that's in the very community that we look to to have this kind of information."

Focused on the question of Iraq ties to al-Qaeda, Gimble's report concentrated on findings that Feith's office presented in three briefings in August and September 2002 -- one to Rumsfeld and Wolfowitz, one to the CIA, and one at the White House to then-deputy national security adviser Stephen J. Hadley and I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby, then Vice President Cheney's chief of staff.

Laying out a chronology of events, Gimble said Wolfowitz asked Feith in January 2002 "to assess the links between al-Qaeda and Iraq." The following July, he told the committee, a group of Pentagon employees assigned to Feith's office "compiled a position paper that was later translated into a briefing."

The briefing, titled "Iraq and al-Qaeda: Making the Case," was given to Rumsfeld on Aug. 8. In a memo to Feith's office that day, Wolfowitz described it as "excellent."

"The secretary was very impressed," Wolfowitz wrote. "He asked us to think about some possible next steps to see if we can illuminate the differences between us and the CIA. The goal is not to produce a consensus product, but rather to scrub one another's arguments."

Rumsfeld then directed that the briefing be presented to then-CIA Director George J. Tenet.

Before an Aug. 15 briefing for Tenet, however, analysts from the Defense Intelligence Agency, the CIA and other agencies critiqued the briefing. In particular, they questioned Feith's conclusion that a "known contact" had taken place in Prague in April 2001 between a senior Iraqi intelligence agent and Mohamed Atta, the leader of the al-Qaeda attack on the World Trade Center in September of that year. "Essentially, they disagreed with more than 50 percent of it and either agreed or partially agreed with the remainder," Gimble said yesterday.

The CIA described the intelligence concerning the alleged contact with Atta as "contradictory at best," a Gimble aide testified at yesterday's hearing.

At the subsequent CIA briefing, Tenet called the presentation "useful," Gimble said. But Tenet remarked in an interview with the inspector general's office, Gimble said, that "he only said that it was 'useful' because he didn't agree with it and he was just trying to nicely end the meeting."

For the CIA briefing, Gimble said, Feith removed a slide concluding that there were "fundamental problems with the way the intelligence community was assessing the information." Gimble said that Feith told the inspector general's office he had taken it out "because it was critical of the intelligence community." The slide was reinserted for the later White House briefing.

After his session with Feith's group, Tenet arranged for a meeting between the group and intelligence community analysts to go over agreements and disagreements. As a result of that Aug. 20 session, Gimble said, the CIA agreed to make "some minor changes" in its analysis and to "footnote" its disagreements with the Pentagon presentation. Such footnotes are normally used in community intelligence documents to warn policymakers that there are other opinions.

Briefing Hadley and Libby, Gimble said, Feith's group did not mention that the intelligence community disagreed with more than half of its conclusions. Tenet, Gimble said, did not learn of the White House briefing until two years later.

Hadley, he said, declined to be interviewed by the inspector general's office, on the advice of the White House counsel. Libby was not asked for an interview, Gimble said. Levin said yesterday that he wants to question both.

Pentagon Probe Criticizes Ex-official's Iraq Intelligence (AFP)

By Marie Sanz

AFP, February 10, 2007

Former US defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld's top policy aide produced "inappropriate" intelligence reports linking Saddam Hussein and the Al-Qaeda terror network to bolster the case for war with Iraq, according to a Pentagon investigation.

The classified document, whose summary was made public Friday, is the result of an investigation by the Defense Department's acting inspector general, Thomas Gimble, of the Iraq intelligence work conducted by the office of former US defense under secretary Douglas Feith.

The probe was launched in November 2005 at the request of Congress to determine whether Feith's the so-called Office of Special Plans had conducted "unauthorized, unlawful or inappropriate intelligence activities" on Iraq between September 2002 and June 2003, the summary said.

The investigators concluded that the actions "were not illegal or unauthorized," having been approved by then-deputy defense secretary Paul Wolfowitz.

But, they said, "the actions were, in our opinion, inappropriate given that the intelligence assessments were intelligence products and did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intelligence community."

That condition occurred because of "an expanded role and mission from policy formulation to alternative intelligence analysis and dissemination."

As a result, it said, the office of Feith, a neoconservative supporter of the invasion of Iraq, did not provide "the most accurate analysis of intelligence" to senior decision-makers.

The White House reacted by pointing out that President George W. Bush "has long acknowledged that intelligence leading up to the war in Iraq was inaccurate" and that he had "taken dramatic actions in order to revamp the intel community ... so that those inaccuracies don't happen again."

The existence of links between the Al-Qaeda terror network and the Iraqi regime of Saddam Hussein was one of the main arguments of the Bush administration to justify the invasion of Iraq.

The Pentagon report is a "devastating condemnation" of the work done by Feith's office, said Democratic Senator Carl Levin, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

"Indeed, Vice President Cheney said the principal Feith office assessment was the 'best source of information' on the alleged relationship between Iraq and Al-Qaeda," Levin said.

Levin was hearing testimony of the Pentagon's Gimble Friday, who was scheduled to present the investigation's classified findings.

The Pentagon investigation focused on the Policy Counter-Terrorism Evaluation Group, created by then-deputy secretary of defense Paul Wolfowitz following the September 11, 2001, terror attacks in the United States to look for state sponsors of terrorism.

Feith, who resigned his Pentagon post in 2005 and now teaches at Georgetown University in Washington, lashed back at critics and said the report vindicates him.

"The policy office has been smeared for years by allegations that its pre-Iraq war work was somehow 'unlawful' or 'unauthorized' and that some information it gave to congressional committees was deceptive or misleading," he said in a statement.

"The inspector general's report has now thoroughly repudiated the smears."

However Senator Jay Rockefeller, the Democrat who heads the Senate Intelligence Committee, said that Feith may have violated the 1947 National Security Act by failing to keep Congress informed.

"The IG (Inspector General) has concluded that (Feith's) office was engaged in intelligence activities. The Senate Intelligence Committee was never informed of these activities," Rockefeller said in a statement.

"Whether these actions were authorized or not, it appears that they were not in compliance with the law," he said.

Eric Edelman, Feith's successor at the Pentagon and a former Cheney aide, said in a rebuttal to the report that Wolfowitz had asked Feith's analysts to ignore the intelligence community's belief that the radical Islamist Al-Qaeda and Saddam's secular dictatorship were unlikely allies.

Feith's unit was one of three offices that received intelligence on Iraq as the Bush administration made its case for ousting Saddam, Edelman said.

The office delivered three separate reports, none of which was an "assessment of any sort," according to Edelman's rebuttal.

Inquiry On Intelligence Gaps May Reach To White House (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131020

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee said Friday that he would ask current and former White House aides to testify about a report by the Pentagon's inspector general that criticizes the Pentagon for compiling "alternative intelligence" that made the case for invading Iraq.

The chairman, Senator Carl Levin, Democrat of Michigan, said that among those called to testify could be Stephen J. Hadley, the national security adviser, and I. Lewis Libby, a former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney. Both received a briefing from the defense secretary's policy office in 2002 on possible links between Al Qaeda and Saddam Hussein's government.

In its report on Thursday, the acting inspector general, Thomas F. Gimble, found that the work done by the Pentagon team, which was assembled by Douglas J. Feith, a former under secretary of defense for policy, was "not fully supported by the available intelligence."

It was not clear whether Mr. Hadley and Mr. Libby would testify. The White House normally resists having top aides testify before Congress.

The Senate Intelligence Committee may also seek to question the men. Tara Andringa, a spokeswoman for Mr. Levin, said Mr. Levin planned to consult with Senator John D. Rockefeller IV, Democrat of West Virginia and chairman of that committee. Mr. Levin is on both committees.

The inspector general's report found that while the Feith team did not violate any laws or knowingly mislead Congress, it made dubious interpretations of intelligence reports and shared them with senior officials without making clear that its findings had already been discounted or discredited by the main intelligence agencies.

"The actions, in our opinion, were inappropriate, given that all the products did not clearly show the variance with the consensus of the intel community, and in some cases were shown as intel products," Mr. Gimble told the Armed Services Committee in a hearing on Friday.

That set off a two-hour partisan clash. Democrats argued that the report showed intelligence had been manipulated to justify an invasion of Iraq, and Republicans insisted that Mr. Feith's office did nothing wrong by reaching conclusions that differed from those of the main intelligence agencies and presenting them to higher-ups, who had asked for the re-examination in the first place.

Senator Levin, who has long been a leading critic of Mr. Feith's role, called the report "a devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities" by Mr. Feith. But Senator James M. Inhofe, Republican of Oklahoma, responded, "I don't think in any way that his report can be interpreted as a devastating condemnation."

Mr. Gimble said formal intelligence findings did not corroborate some of the Pentagon's assertions: that Mr. Hussein's government and Al Qaeda had a "mature symbiotic relationship," that it involved a "shared interest and pursuit of" unconventional weapons and that there were "some indications" of coordination between Iraq and Al Qaeda on the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

The briefers from Mr. Feith's office should have noted their departures from the formal consensus findings of intelligence agencies, Mr. Gimble said.

Representative Ike Skelton, a Democrat from Missouri and chairman of the House Armed Services Committee, said Mr. Feith's office exercised "extremely poor judgment for which our nation, and our service members in particular, are paying a terrible price."

Senator Jeff Sessions, Republican of Alabama, noted that Mr. Feith's superiors at the Pentagon had asked him to re-examine intelligence on links between Iraq and Al Qaeda. Therefore, Mr. Sessions said, there was no need for the briefers to point out that their conclusions differed from those of the C.I.A., because the briefing was intended as a "critique" of the agencies' conclusions.

A similar argument has been made in a formal rebuttal to the inspector general that was prepared by Mr. Feith's successor at the Pentagon.

Pentagon Push Of Iraq-al Qaeda Link "Inappropriate" (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Pentagon officials undercut the intelligence community in the run-up to the U.S. invasion of Iraq by insisting in briefings to the White House that there was a clear relationship between Saddam Hussein and al Qaeda, the Defense Department's inspector general said yesterday.

Acting Inspector General Thomas F. Gimble told the Senate Armed Services Committee that the office headed by former Pentagon policy chief Douglas J. Feith took "inappropriate" actions in advancing conclusions on al Qaeda connections not backed up by the nation's intelligence agencies.

DOJ_NMG_0131021

Mr. Gimble said that while the actions of the Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy "were not illegal or unauthorized," they "did not provide the most accurate analysis of intelligence to senior decision makers" at a time when the White House was moving toward war with Iraq.

"I can't think of a more devastating commentary," said Armed Services Committee Chairman Sen. Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

He cited Mr. Gimble's findings that Mr. Feith's office was, despite doubts expressed by the intelligence community, pushing conclusions that September 11 hijacker Mohammed Atta had met an Iraqi intelligence officer in Prague five months before the attack, and that there were "multiple areas of cooperation" between Iraq and al Qaeda, including shared pursuit of weapons of mass destruction.

"That was the argument that was used to make the sale to the American people about the need to go to war," Mr. Levin said Thursday. He said the Pentagon's work, "which was wrong, which was distorted, which was inappropriate ... is something which is highly disturbing."

Republicans on the panel disagreed. Sen. James M. Inhofe, Oklahoma Republican, said the "probing questions" raised by Mr. Feith's policy group improved the intelligence process.

"I'm trying to figure out why we are here," said Sen. Saxby Chambliss, Georgia Republican, adding the office was doing its job of analyzing intelligence that the CIA and other intelligence agencies had gathered.

Mr. Gimble responded that at issue was that the information, supplied by Mr. Feith's office in briefings to the National Security Council and the office of Vice President Dick Cheney, was "provided without caveats" and that there were varying opinions on its reliability.

Mr. Gimble's report said Mr. Feith's office had made assertions "that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community."

At the White House, spokeswoman Dana Perino said President Bush has revamped the U.S. spy community to try avoiding a repeat of flawed intelligence affecting policy decisions by creating a director of national intelligence and making other changes.

"I think what he has said is that he took responsibility, and that the intel was wrong, and that we had to take measures to revamp the intel community to make sure that it never happened again," Mrs. Perino said.

Defense Department spokesman Bryan Whitman denied that the office was producing its own intelligence products, saying they were challenging what was coming in from intelligence-gathering professionals, "looking at it with a critical eye."

Levin: High-ranking DoD Officials Manipulated Iraq Intelligence (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

High-ranking Department of Defense officials "manipulated" intelligence to link al Qaeda and Iraq to bolster the case for an invasion, Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin (D-Mich.) charged Friday, citing a new Pentagon report.

The DoD inspector general released the results of the investigation Friday, and an unclassified summary of the document shows that the "Office of the Under Secretary of Defense for Policy [at the time being run by Douglas Feith] developed, produced, and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and al Qaeda relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the intelligence community, to senior decision makers."

While the inspector general said these actions "were not illegal or unauthorized," they were "inappropriate."

Levin called the report a "devastating condemnation of inappropriate activities by the DoD policy office that helped take this nation to war."

Sen. James Inhofe (R-Okla.), at the onset of a hearing on the issue, strongly opposed Levin's interpretation of the investigation.

"You can read the same report and come up with different conclusions, which is quite obvious and will be obvious," Inhofe said. "I don't think in any way that his report could be interpreted as a devastating condemnation."

Levin said he would seek a declassification of the entire report, which would make it available to the public.

Corrections (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

-- A Feb. 9 front-page article about a Pentagon inspector general's report regarding the office of former undersecretary of defense Douglas J. Feith incorrectly attributed quotations to that report. References to Feith's office producing "reporting of dubious quality or reliability" and that the office "was predisposed to finding a significant relationship between Iraq and al Qaeda" were from a report issued by Sen. Carl M. Levin (D-Mich.) in October 2004. Similarly, the quotes stating that Feith's office drew on "both reliable and unreliable reporting" to produce a link between al-Qaeda and Iraq "that was much stronger than that assessed by the IC [intelligence community] and more in accord with the policy views of senior officials in the Administration" were also from Levin's report. The article also stated that the intelligence provided by Feith's office supported the political views of senior administration officials, a conclusion that the inspector general's report did not draw.

The two reports employ similar language to characterize the activities of Feith's office: Levin's report refers to an "alternative intelligence assessment process" developed in that office, while an unclassified summary of the inspector general's report states that the office "developed, produced, and then disseminated alternative intelligence assessments on the Iraq and al Qaida relationship, which included some conclusions that were inconsistent with the consensus of the Intelligence Community, to senior decision-makers." The summary of the inspector general's report further states that Feith's briefing to the White House in 2002 "undercuts the Intelligence Community" and "did draw conclusions that were not fully supported by the available intelligence."

The Build-a-War Workshop (NYT)

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

It took far too long, but a report by the Pentagon inspector general has finally confirmed that Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld's do-it-yourself intelligence office cooked up a link between Iraq and Al Qaeda to help justify an unjustifiable war.

The report said the team headed by Douglas Feith, under secretary of defense for policy, developed "alternative" assessments of intelligence on Iraq that contradicted the intelligence community and drew conclusions "that were not supported by the available intelligence." Mr. Feith certainly knew the Central Intelligence Agency would cry foul, so he hid his findings from the C.I.A. Then Vice President Dick Cheney used them as proof of cloak-and-dagger meetings that never happened, long-term conspiracies between Saddam Hussein and Osama bin Laden that didn't exist, and — most unforgivable — "possible Iraqi coordination" on the 9/11 attacks, which no serious intelligence analyst believed.

The inspector general did not recommend criminal charges against Mr. Feith because Mr. Rumsfeld or his deputy, Paul Wolfowitz, approved their subordinate's "inappropriate" operations. The renegade intelligence buff said he was relieved.

We're sure he was. But there is no comfort in knowing that his dirty work was approved by his bosses. All that does is add to evidence that the Bush administration knowingly and repeatedly misled Americans about the intelligence on Iraq.

To understand this twisted tale, it is important to recall how Mr. Feith got into the creative writing business. Top administration officials, especially Mr. Cheney, had long been furious at the C.I.A. for refusing to confirm the delusion about a grand Iraqi terrorist conspiracy, something the Republican right had nursed for years. Their frustration only grew after 9/11 and the C.I.A. still refused to buy these theories.

Mr. Wolfowitz would feverishly sketch out charts showing how this Iraqi knew that Iraqi, who was connected through six more degrees of separation to terrorist attacks, all the way back to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing.

But the C.I.A. kept saying there was no reliable intelligence about an Iraq-Qaeda link. So Mr. Feith was sent to review the reports and come back with the answers Mr. Cheney wanted. The inspector general's report said Mr. Feith' s team gave a September 2002 briefing at the White House on the alleged Iraq-Qaeda connection that had not been vetted by the intelligence community (the director of central intelligence was pointedly not told it was happening) and "was not fully supported by the available intelligence."

The false information included a meeting in Prague in April 2001 between an Iraqi official and Mohamed Atta, one of the 9/11 pilots. It never happened. But Mr. Feith's report said it did, and Mr. Cheney will still not admit that the story is false.

In a statement released yesterday, Senator Carl Levin, the new chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, who has been dogged in pursuit of the truth about the Iraqi intelligence, noted that the cooked-up Feith briefing had been leaked to the conservative Weekly Standard magazine so Mr. Cheney could quote it as the "best source" of information about the supposed Iraq-Qaeda link.

The Pentagon report is one step in a long-delayed effort to figure out how the intelligence on Iraq was so badly twisted — and by whom. That work should have been finished before the 2004 elections, and it would have been if Pat Roberts, the obedient Republican who ran the Senate Intelligence Committee, had not helped the White House drag it out and load it in ways that would obscure the truth.

It is now up to Mr. Levin and Senator Jay Rockefeller, the current head of the intelligence panel, to give Americans the answers. Mr. Levin's desire to have the entire inspector general's report on the Feith scheme declassified is a good place to start. But it will be up to Mr. Rockefeller to finally determine how old, inconclusive, unsubstantiated and false intelligence was transformed into fresh, reliable and definitive reports — and then used by Mr. Bush and other top officials to drag the country into a disastrous and unnecessary war.

Evidence Links Iran, Insurgents (WT)

By Rowan Scarborough

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said yesterday there is solid circumstantial evidence that Iran is supplying insurgents with explosives that are killing U.S. troops in Iraq.

"I think there's some serial numbers, there may be some markings on some of the projectiles fragments that we found" that trace back to Iran, he told reporters while traveling to Germany for a NATO conference.

The White House and the U.S. command in Baghdad are preparing a report making the case that the regime in Tehran is supporting like-minded Shi'ite insurgents in Iraq. The United States says the aid includes improvised explosive devices, which the Army reports cause 80 percent of all soldier casualties.

The report was put on hold after some White House officials determined the evidence was not strong enough to back up some of its assertions. But they have not backed off the general charge that Iran is indirectly fighting the United States via Iraqi insurgents.

President Bush announced Jan. 10 that the United States would begin targeting Iranian networks working inside Iraq. But officials repeatedly have said they will not strike Iran inside its borders.

Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, said in a radio interview that aired yesterday that his country has "no interest" in providing weapons to any insurgent group in Iraq.

"But the problem is that the United States has decided on a policy and is trying to find or fabricate evidence if it cannot find one -- and I believe it hasn't been able to find any evidence -- in order to substantiate and corroborate that policy," Mr. Zarif said on National Public Radio's "All Things Considered."

Meanwhile in Iraq, joint Iraqi and American forces continued the new offensive designed to finally quell violence in Baghdad and tip the balance of battle in the coalition's favor.

The operation calls for three Iraqi brigades and five American ones to join forces in the city during the coming weeks. To date, one Iraqi brigade, at about 60 percent strength, is in the capital city. The second is en route, and a third will deploy later this month.

The first American brigade -- the 82nd Airborne Division's 2nd Brigade Combat Team -- is now in the city. The second of the five is heading to Kuwait. The remaining three are in the United States preparing to deploy.

"So far so good," said Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, director of operations for the Pentagon's Joint Staff. "But we're in the very early days of what will be a very deliberate campaign that will unfold only over several months, and we should not expect quick, easy or dramatic results."

In previous offensives in Iraq, the Shi'ite-dominated government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki never followed through on U.S. demands to target the Mahdi Army, a militia controlled by firebrand cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Gen. Lute said things are different this time.

"They said they were going to commit more troops to Baghdad. They have," he said. "They said they were going to have a no-holds-barred rules of engagement, set of rules of engagement, meaning that no geographic or political -- geographic location or political entity would be immune from law and order in Baghdad."

This week, he said, the al-Maliki government arrested a deputy health minister linked to death squads within the Mahdi Army. He said such action was unthinkable a few months ago.

Gen. Lute provided an update on the rash of American helicopter crashes in Iraq. Six helicopters -- four military and two civilian -- have gone down in less than three weeks.

The crashes have led to speculation that insurgents have perfected ways to locate and shoot down low-flying choppers, perhaps with shoulder-fired, heat-seeking missiles.

Gen. Lute said two aircraft were downed while in "close contact" with the enemy. Two others were also downed by groundfire, but not in battle. One crashed after hitting a wire, and the sixth had mechanical problems.

The general said investigations have not yet found a pattern of enemy activity that could explain the four that were shot down.

"It's a bit too soon to tell," he said.

Deadliest Bomb In Iraq Is Made By Iran, U.S. Says (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131024

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The most lethal weapon directed against American troops in Iraq is an explosive-packed cylinder that United States intelligence asserts is being supplied by Iran.

The assertion of an Iranian role in supplying the device to Shiite militias reflects broad agreement among American intelligence agencies, although officials acknowledge that the picture is not entirely complete.

In interviews, civilian and military officials from a broad range of government agencies provided specific details to support what until now has been a more generally worded claim, in a new National Intelligence Estimate, that Iran is providing "lethal support" to Shiite militants in Iraq.

The focus of American concern is known as an "explosively formed penetrator," a particularly deadly type of roadside bomb being used by Shiite groups in attacks on American troops in Iraq. Attacks using the device have doubled in the past year, and have prompted increasing concern among military officers. In the last three months of 2006, attacks using the weapons accounted for a significant portion of Americans killed and wounded in Iraq, though less than a quarter of the total, military officials say.

Because the weapon can be fired from roadsides and is favored by Shiite militias, it has become a serious threat in Baghdad. Only a small fraction of the roadside bombs used in Iraq are explosively formed penetrators. But the device produces more casualties per attack than other types of roadside bombs.

Any assertion of an Iranian contribution to attacks on Americans in Iraq is both politically and diplomatically volatile. The officials said they were willing to discuss the issue to respond to what they described as an increasingly worrisome threat to American forces in Iraq, and were not trying to lay the basis for an American attack on Iran.

The assessment was described in interviews over the past several weeks with American officials, including some whose agencies have previously been skeptical about the significance of Iran's role in Iraq. Administration officials said they recognized that intelligence failures related to prewar American claims about Iraq's weapons arsenal could make critics skeptical about the American claims.

The link that American intelligence has drawn to Iran is based on a number of factors, including an analysis of captured devices, examination of debris after attacks, and intelligence on training of Shiite militants in Iran and in Iraq by the Iranian Revolutionary Guard and by Hezbollah militants believed to be working at the behest of Tehran.

The Bush administration is expected to make public this weekend some of what intelligence agencies regard as an increasing body of evidence pointing to an Iranian link, including information gleaned from Iranians and Iraqis captured in recent American raids on an Iranian office in Erbil and another site in Baghdad.

The information includes interrogation reports from the raids indicating that money and weapons components are being brought into Iraq from across the Iranian border in vehicles that travel at night. One of the detainees has identified an Iranian operative as having supplied two of the bombs. The border crossing at Mehran is identified as a major crossing point for the smuggling of money and weapons for Shiite militants, according to the intelligence.

According to American intelligence, Iran has excelled in developing this type of bomb, and has provided similar technology to Hezbollah militants in southern Lebanon. The manufacture of the key metal components required sophisticated machinery, raw material and expertise that American intelligence agencies do not believe can be found in Iraq. In addition, some components of the bombs have been found with Iranian factory markings from 2006.

Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates appeared to allude to this intelligence on Friday when he told reporters in Seville, Spain, that serial numbers and other markings on weapon fragments found in Iraq point to Iran as a source.

Some American intelligence experts believe that Hezbollah has provided some of the logistical support and training to Shiite militias in Iraq, but they assert that such steps would not be taken without Iran's blessing.

"All source reporting since 2004 indicates that Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Corps-Quds Force is providing professionally-built EFPs and components to Iraqi Shia militants," notes a still-classified American intelligence report that was prepared in 2006.

"Based on forensic analysis of materials recovered in Iraq," the report continues, "Iran is assessed as the producer of these items."

The United States, using the Swiss Embassy in Tehran as an intermediary, has privately warned the Iranian government to stop providing the military technology to Iraqi militants, a senior administration official said. The British government has issued similar warnings to Iran, according to Western officials. Officials said that the Iranians had not responded.

An American intelligence assessment described to The New York Times said that "as part of its strategy in Iraq, Iran is implementing a deliberate, calibrated policy — approved by Supreme Leader Khamenei and carried out by the Quds Force — to provide explosives support and training to select Iraqi Shia militant groups to conduct attacks against coalition targets." The reference was to Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the Iranian leader, and to an elite branch of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guards Command that is assigned the task of carrying out paramilitary operations abroad.

"The likely aim is to make a military presence in Iraq more costly for the U.S.," the assessment said.

DOJ_NMG_0131025

Other officials believe Iran is using the attacks to send a warning to the United States that it can inflict casualties on American troops if the United States takes a more forceful posture toward it.

Iran has publicly denied the allegations that it is providing military support to Shiite militants in Iraq. Javad Zarif, Iran's ambassador to the United Nations, wrote in an Op-Ed article published on Thursday in The Times that the Bush administration was "trying to make Iran its scapegoat and fabricating evidence of Iranian activities in Iraq."

The explosively formed penetrator, detonated on the roadside as American vehicles pass by, is capable of blasting a metal projectile through the side of an armored Humvee with devastating consequences.

American military officers say that attacks using the weapon reached a high point in December, when it accounted for a significant portion of Americans killed and wounded in Iraq. For reasons that remain unclear, attacks using the device declined substantially in January, but the weapons remain one of the principal threats to American troops in and around Baghdad, where five additional brigades of American combat troops are to be deployed under the Bush administration's new plan.

"It is the most effective I.E.D out there," said Lt. Col. James Danna, who led the Second Battalion, Sixth Infantry Regiment in Baghdad last year, referring to improvised explosive devices, as the roadside bombs are known by the American military. "To me it is a political weapon. There are not a lot of them out there, but every time we crack down on the Shia militias that weapon comes out. They want to keep us on our bases, keep us out of their neighborhoods and prevent us from doing our main mission, which is protecting vulnerable portions of the population."

Adm. William Fallon, President Bush's choice to head the Central Command, alluded to the weapon's ability to punch through the side of armored Humvees in his testimony to Congress last month.

"Equipment that was, we thought, pretty effective in protecting our troops just a matter of months ago is now being challenged by some of the techniques and devices over there," Admiral Fallon said. "So I'm learning as we go in that this is a fast-moving ballgame."

Mr. Gates told reporters last week that he had heard there had been cases in which the weapon "can take out an Abrams tank."

The increasing use of the weapon is the latest twist in a lethal game of measure and countermeasure that has been carried out throughout the nearly four-year-old Iraq war. Using munitions from Iraq's vast and poorly guarded arsenal, insurgents developed an array of bombs to strike the more heavily armed and technologically superior American military.

In response, the United States military deployed armored Humvees, which in turn spawned the development of even more potent roadside bombs. American officials say that the first suspected use of the penetrator occurred in late 2003 and that attacks have risen steadily since then.

To make the weapon, a metal cylinder is filled with powerful explosives. A metal concave disk manufactured on a special press is fixed to the firing end.

Several of the cylinders are often grouped together in an array. The weapon is generally triggered when American vehicles drive by an infrared sensor, which operates on the same principle as a garage door opener. The sensor is impervious to the electronic jamming the American military uses to try to block other remote-control attacks.

When an American vehicle crosses the beam, the explosives in the cylinders are detonated, hurling their metal lids at targets at a tremendous speed. The metal changes shape in flight, forming into a slug that penetrate many types of armor.

In planning their attacks, Shiite militias have taken advantage of the tactics employed by American forces in Baghdad. To reduce the threat from suicide car bombs and minimize the risk of inadvertently killing Iraqi civilians, American patrols and convoys have been instructed to keep their distance from civilian traffic. But that has made it easier for the Shiite militias to attack American vehicles. When they see American vehicles approaching, they activate the infrared sensors.

According to American intelligence agencies, the Iranians are also believed to have provided Shiite militants with rocket-propelled grenades, shoulder-fired antiaircraft missiles, mortars, 122-millimeter rockets and TNT.

Among the intelligence that the United States is expected to make public this weekend is information indicating that some of these weapons said to have been made in Iran were carried into Iraq in recent years. Examples include a shoulder-fired antiaircraft missile that was fired at a plane flying near the Baghdad airport in 2004 but which failed to launch properly; an Iranian rocket-propelled grenade made in 2006; and an Iranian 81-millimeter mortar made in 2006.

Assessments by American intelligence agencies say there is no indication that there is any kind of black-market trade in the Iranian-linked roadside bombs, and that shipments of the components are being directed to Shiite militants who have close links to Iran. The American military has developed classified techniques to try to counter the sophisticated weapon.

Marine officials say that weapons have not been found in the Sunni-dominated Anbar Province, adding to the view that the device is an Iranian-supplied and Shiite-employed weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0131026

To try to cut off the supply, the American military has sought to focus on the cells of Iranian Revolutionary Guard operatives it asserts are in Iraq. American intelligence agencies are concerned that the Iranians may respond by increasing the supply of the weapons.

"We are working day and night to disassemble these networks that do everything from bring the explosives to the point of construction, to how they're put together, to who delivers them, to the mechanisms that are used to have them go off," Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, said last week. "It is instructive that at least twice in the last month, that in going after the networks, we have picked up Iranians."

Gates: Bombs Tie Iran To Iraq Extremists (AP)

By Lolita C. Baldor

AP, February 9, 2007

MUNICH, Germany — Serial numbers and other markings on bombs suggest that Iranians are linked to deadly explosives used by Iraqi militants, Defense Secretary Robert Gates said Friday in some of the administration's first public assertions on evidence the military has collected.

While the Bush administration and military officials have repeatedly said Iranians have been tied to terrorist bombings in Iraq, they have said little about evidence to bolster such claims, including any documents and other items collected in recent raids in Iraq.

National security officials in Washington and Iraq have been working for weeks on a presentation intended to provide evidence for Bush administration claims of what they say are Iran's meddlesome and deadly activities.

The materials — which in their classified form include slides and some two inches of documents — provide evidence of Iran's role in supplying Iraqi militants with highly sophisticated and lethal improvised explosive devices and other weaponry. Among the weapons is a roadside bomb known as an "explosively formed penetrator," which can pierce the armor of Abrams tanks with nearly molten-hot charges. One intelligence official said the U.S. is "fairly comfortable" that it knows with some precision the origin of those Iranian-made explosives.

The Iran dossier also lays out alleged Iranian efforts to train Iraqis in military techniques.

Yet, government officials say there is some disagreement about how much to make public to support the administration's case. Intelligence officials worry the sources of their information could dry up.

Among the evidence the administration will present are weapons that were seized in U.S.-led raids on caches around Iraq, one military official in Washington said on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak publicly.

Other evidence includes documents captured when U.S.-led forces raided an Iranian office Jan. 11 in Irbil in northern Iraq, the official said. Tehran said it was a government liaison office, but the U.S. military said five Iranians detained in the raid were connected to an Iranian Revolutionary Guard faction that funds and arms insurgents in Iraq.

The assertions have been met with skepticism by some lawmakers still fuming over intelligence reports used by the administration to propel the country to war with Iraq in 2003. Gates' comments came as a new Pentagon inspector general's report criticized prewar Defense Department assertions of al-Qaeda connections to Iraq.

Speaking with reporters in Seville, Spain, on Friday before traveling to Munich, Gates told reporters that markings on explosives provide "pretty good" evidence that Iranians are supplying either weapons or technology for Iraqi extremists.

"I think there's some serial numbers, there may be some markings on some of the projectile fragments that we found" that point to Iran, he said.

Gates' remarks left unclear how the U.S. knows the serial numbers are traceable to Iran and whether such weapons would have been sent to Iraq by the Iranian government or by private arms dealers.

Explosives have been a leading killer of U.S. forces in Iraq, where more than 3,000 U.S. troops have died in the nearly four-year-old war.

In Iraq on Friday, the military reported three more American soldiers killed in combat, pushing the U.S. death toll to 33 in the first eight days of the month.

Separately, U.S. helicopters targeting insurgents mistakenly killed at least five allied Kurdish militiamen in the northern city of Mosul early Friday.

Last week, Gates said that U.S. military officers in Baghdad had been planning to brief reporters on what was known about Iranian involvement in Iraq but that he and other senior officials had delayed the briefing to assure the information was accurate.

On Friday, White House spokeswoman Dana Perino said such information would come from U.S. officials in Iraq, though she did not say when.

"There has been discussion about how to detail out some of that evidence," she told reporters. "Decisions on that are being made out of Baghdad."

DOJ_NMG_0131027

State Department spokesman Tom Casey said Friday that officials hoping to publicly release the information face another problem as well.

He said, "Under the circumstances and given the attention that this has gotten, we want to make sure that we provide you the best information possible but do so in a way that doesn't compromise sources and methods, that doesn't make it harder for us to deal with the situation that's there."

Gates also told reporters that he was surprised that raids last month by coalition and Iraqi forces in Iraq swept up some Iranians.

"I don't think there was surprise that the Iranians were actually involved, I think there was surprise we actually picked up some," he said.

He and other U.S. officials have said for some time that Iranians, and possibly the government of Iran, have been providing weapons technology and perhaps some explosives to Iraqi fighters.

Gates, who attended his first NATO defense ministers meeting in Seville this week before flying to Munich for a security conference, said Iran is "very much involved in providing either the technology or the weapons themselves for these explosively formed projectiles."

He acknowledged the Iranian weapons are not a large percentage of the roadside bombs used in Iraq, but he said, "They're extremely lethal."

Gates said the recent raids combined with the movement of an additional U.S. aircraft carrier into the Persian Gulf have created a stir, but he said the Bush administration had no intention of attacking Iran.

Asked about the Defense Department inspector general's report criticizing the Pentagon's use of prewar intelligence, Gates said he hadn't yet read it.

But, he added, "based on my whole career, I believe that all intelligence activities need to be carried on through established institutions, and where there is appropriate oversight. And if the intelligence isn't adequate, then changes need to be made in these institutions to improve the intelligence."

Al-Qaeda Suspects Color White House Debate Over Iran (WP)

By Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Last week, the CIA sent an urgent report to President Bush's National Security Council: Iranian authorities had arrested two al-Qaeda operatives traveling through Iran on their way from Pakistan to Iraq. The suspects were caught along a well-worn, if little-noticed, route for militants determined to fight U.S. troops on Iraqi soil, according to a senior intelligence official.

The arrests were presented to Bush's senior policy advisers as evidence that Iran appears committed to stopping al-Qaeda foot traffic across its borders, the intelligence official said. That assessment comes at a time when the Bush administration, in an effort to push for further U.N. sanctions on the Islamic republic, is preparing to publicly accuse Tehran of cooperating with and harboring al-Qaeda suspects.

The strategy has sparked a growing debate within the administration and the intelligence community, according to U.S. intelligence and government officials. One faction is pressing for more economic embargoes against Iran, including asset freezes and travel bans for the country's top leaders. But several senior intelligence and counterterrorism officials worry that a public push regarding the al-Qaeda suspects held in Iran could jeopardize U.S. intelligence-gathering and prompt the Iranians to free some of the most wanted individuals.

"There was real debate about all this," said one counterterrorism official. "If we go public, the Iranians could turn them loose." The official added: "At this point, we know where these guys are and at least they are off the streets. We could lose them for years if we go down this path."

The administration's planned diplomatic offensive is part of an effort to pressure Tehran from multiple directions. Bush has given the U.S. military the authority to kill or capture Iranian government agents working with Shiite militias inside Iraq. Yesterday, Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates said serial numbers and markings on some explosives used in Iraq indicate that the material came from Iran, but he offered no evidence.

With the aim of shaking Tehran's commitment to its nuclear program, Bush also approved last fall secret operations to target Iranian influence in southern Lebanon, in western Afghanistan, in the Palestinian territories and inside Iran. The new strategy, a senior administration official said, aims to portray Iran as a "terror-producing country, instead of an oil-producing country," with links to al-Qaeda, Hezbollah and death squads in Iraq.

U.S. officials have asserted for years that several dozen al-Qaeda fighters, including Osama bin Laden's son, slipped across the Afghan border into Iran as U.S. troops hunted for the perpetrators of the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks. U.S. and allied intelligence services, which have monitored the men's presence inside Iran, reported that Tehran was holding them under house arrest as bargaining chips for potential deals with Washington.

Last fall, Bush administration officials asked the CIA to compile a list of those suspects so the White House could publicize their presence. For years, the administration has not revealed their names, in part because it sought to protect its intelligence sources but also because at the time the U.S. government was concealing the identities of suspects it was holding in secret CIA custody.

But the names of some of the men in Iran have become public, including "high-value" targets such as al-Qaeda spokesman Sulaiman Abu Ghaith of Kuwait and Saif al-Adel of Egypt. U.S. intelligence officials said they are members of the "al-Qaeda operational management committee." U.S. intelligence officials said there are suspicions, but no proof, that one of them may have been involved from afar in planning an attack in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia, in May 2003. Intelligence officials said bin Laden's son Saad is also being held with the other men in Iran.

Five administration officials were made available for interviews for this story on the condition that they not be identified. Other officials who spoke without permission -- including senior officials, career analysts and policymakers -- said their standing with the White House would be at risk if they were quoted by name.

The State Department, Pentagon and CIA referred all questions about the story to the National Security Council. In a written response to questions, NSC spokesman Gordon Johndroe said: "Iran's sponsorship of terrorism is one of the reasons for the sanctions now against it. We note that U.N. Security Council resolutions already oblige all states to ensure that members of terrorist groups, including al-Qaeda, are brought to justice."

Since al-Qaeda fighters began streaming into Iran from Afghanistan in the winter of 2001, Tehran had turned over hundreds of people to U.S. allies and provided U.S. intelligence with the names, photographs and fingerprints of those it held in custody, according to senior U.S. intelligence and administration officials. In early 2003, it offered to hand over the remaining high-value targets directly to the United States if Washington would turn over a group of exiled Iranian militants hiding in Iraq.

Some of Bush's top advisers pushed for the trade, arguing that taking custody of bin Laden's son and the others would produce new leads on al-Qaeda. They were also willing to trade away the exiles -- members of a group on the State Department's terrorist list -- who had aligned with Saddam Hussein in an effort to overthrow the Iranian government.

Officials have said Bush ultimately rejected the exchange on the advice of Vice President Cheney and then-Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, who argued that any engagement would legitimize Iran and other state sponsors of terrorism. Bush's National Security Council agreed to accept information from Iran on al-Qaeda but offer nothing in return, officials said.

But no information has been forthcoming, intelligence officials said. One official said the CIA and the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency have disagreed over how effectively the Iranians are controlling al-Qaeda members and whether the Tehran government is aware of the extent of al-Qaeda movements through the country.

Nevertheless, administration officials said they are determined to press Iran on the matter.

"We are not convinced that the Iranians have been honest or open about the level or degree of al-Qaeda presence in their midst," said one Bush adviser who was instrumental in coming up with a more confrontational U.S. approach to Iran. "They have not made proper accounting with respect to U.N. resolutions, have not been clear about who is in detention and have not been clear as to what is happening to individuals who might be in custody."

Bush administration officials pointed to U.N. Security Council Resolutions 1267 and 1373, which state that harboring al-Qaeda members constitutes a threat to international peace and security, and authorize force to combat that threat. The resolutions compel nations to share any information on al-Qaeda suspects and give the United Nations authority to freeze the assets of suspects and those who provide them with safe haven.

Two U.S. officials said the administration plans to argue that Iran is violating those resolutions. A team of senior U.S. officials has been holding briefings for visiting European diplomats on the issue while administration lawyers prepare options for holding Iran in violation of U.N. resolutions.

"We've started a more aggressive and major attempt to try to convince other countries to use their influence on this issue," a senior U.S. diplomat said. "Until now, the Europeans have been focused on the nuclear issue and we want this high up on the agenda."

But another government official predicted that no European country would support a call on Iran to turn the al-Qaeda group over to U.S. military detention at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, a facility widely condemned by Washington's closest allies. In the past year, U.S. officials said they successfully pushed Egypt, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia to seek extradition of their citizens held in Iran, but Tehran rebuffed the requests. Administration officials said they interpreted the refusal as evidence of cooperation between the Iranian government and the group.

"We'd be happy to see them face trial anywhere," a senior administration official said.

Target Iran: US Able To Strike In The Spring (GUARD)

By Ewen MacAskill

The Guardian, February 10, 2007

US preparations for an air strike against Iran are at an advanced stage, in spite of repeated public denials by the Bush administration, according to informed sources in Washington.

The present military build-up in the Gulf would allow the US to mount an attack by the spring. But the sources said that if there was an attack, it was more likely next year, just before Mr Bush leaves office.

Neo-conservatives, particularly at the Washington-based American Enterprise Institute, are urging Mr Bush to open a new front against Iran. So too is the vice-president, Dick Cheney. The state department and the Pentagon are opposed, as are Democratic congressmen and the overwhelming majority of Republicans. The sources said Mr Bush had not yet made a decision. The Bush administration insists the military build-up is not offensive but aimed at containing Iran and forcing it to make diplomatic concessions. The aim is to persuade Tehran to curb its suspect nuclear weapons programme and abandon ambitions for regional expansion.

Article continues

Robert Gates, the new US defence secretary, said yesterday: "I don't know how many times the president, secretary [of state Condoleezza] Rice and I have had to repeat that we have no intention of attacking Iran."

But Vincent Cannistraro, a Washington-based intelligence analyst, shared the sources' assessment that Pentagon planning was well under way. "Planning is going on, in spite of public disavowals by Gates. Targets have been selected. For a bombing campaign against nuclear sites, it is quite advanced. The military assets to carry this out are being put in place."

He added: "We are planning for war. It is incredibly dangerous."

Deployment

Mr Cannistraro, who worked for the CIA and the National Security Council, stressed that no decision had been made.

Last month Mr Bush ordered a second battle group led by the aircraft carrier USS John Stennis to the Gulf in support of the USS Eisenhower. The USS Stennis is due to arrive within the next 10 days. Extra US Patriot missiles have been sent to the region, as well as more minesweepers, in anticipation of Iranian retaliatory action.

In another sign that preparations are under way, Mr Bush has ordered oil reserves to be stockpiled.

The danger is that the build-up could spark an accidental war. Iranian officials said on Thursday that they had tested missiles capable of hitting warships in the Gulf.

Colonel Sam Gardiner, a former air force officer who has carried out war games with Iran as the target, supported the view that planning for an air strike was under way: "Gates said there is no planning for war. We know this is not true. He possibly meant there is no plan for an immediate strike. It was sloppy wording.

"All the moves being made over the last few weeks are consistent with what you would do if you were going to do an air strike. We have to throw away the notion the US could not do it because it is too tied up in Iraq. It is an air operation."

One of the main driving forces behind war, apart from the vice-president's office, is the AEI, headquarters of the neo-conservatives. A member of the AEI coined the slogan "axis of evil" that originally lumped Iran in with Iraq and North Korea. Its influence on the White House appeared to be in decline last year amid endless bad news from Iraq, for which it had been a cheerleader. But in the face of opposition from Congress, the Pentagon and state department, Mr Bush opted last month for an AEI plan to send more troops to Iraq. Will he support calls from within the AEI for a strike on Iran?

Josh Muravchik, a Middle East specialist at the AEI, is among its most vocal supporters of such a strike.

"I do not think anyone in the US is talking about invasion. We have been chastened by the experience of Iraq, even a hawk like myself." But an air strike was another matter. The danger of Iran having a nuclear weapon "is not just that it might use it out of the blue but as a shield to do all sorts of mischief. I do not believe there will be any way to stop this happening other than physical force."

Mr Bush is part of the American generation that refuses to forgive Iran for the 1979-81 hostage crisis. He leaves office in January 2009 and has said repeatedly that he does not want a legacy in which Iran has achieved superpower status in the region and come close to acquiring a nuclear weapon capability. The logic of this is that if diplomatic efforts fail to persuade Iran to stop uranium enrichment then the only alternative left is to turn to the military.

Mr Muravchik is intent on holding Mr Bush to his word: "The Bush administration have said they would not allow Iran nuclear weapons. That is either bullshit or they mean it as a clear code: we will do it if we have to. I would rather believe it is not hot air."

DOJ_NMG_0131030

Other neo-cons elsewhere in Washington are opposed to an air strike but advocate a different form of military action, supporting Iranian armed groups, in particular the Mujahideen-e Khalq (MEK), even though the state department has branded it a terrorist organisation.

Raymond Tanter, founder of the Iran Policy Committee, which includes former officials from the White House, state department and intelligence services, is a leading advocate of support for the MEK. If it comes to an air strike, he favours bunker-busting bombs. "I believe the only way to get at the deeply buried sites at Natanz and Arak is probably to use bunker-buster bombs, some of which are nuclear tipped. I do not believe the US would do that but it has sold them to Israel."

Opposition support

Another neo-conservative, Meyrav Wurmser, director of the centre for Middle East policy at the Hudson Institute, also favours supporting Iranian opposition groups. She is disappointed with the response of the Bush administration so far to Iran and said that if the aim of US policy after 9/11 was to make the Middle East safer for the US, it was not working because the administration had stopped at Iraq. "There is not enough political will for a strike. There seems to be various notions of what the policy should be."

In spite of the president's veto on negotiation with Tehran, the state department has been involved since 2003 in back-channel approaches and meetings involving Iranian officials and members of the Bush administration or individuals close to it. But when last year the Iranian president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, sent a letter as an overture, the state department dismissed it within hours of its arrival.

Support for negotiations comes from centrist and liberal thinktanks. Afshin Molavi, a fellow of the New America Foundation, said: "To argue diplomacy has not worked is false because it has not been tried. Post-90s and through to today, when Iran has been ready to dance, the US refused, and when the US has been ready to dance, Iran has refused. We are at a stage where Iran is ready to walk across the dance floor and the US is looking away."

He is worried about "a miscalculation that leads to an accidental war".

The catalyst could be Iraq. The Pentagon said yesterday that it had evidence - serial numbers of projectiles as well as explosives - of Iraqi militants' weapons that had come from Iran. In a further sign of the increased tension, Iran's main nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, cancelled a visit to Munich for what would have been the first formal meeting with his western counterparts since last year.

If it does come to war, Mr Muravchik said Iran would retaliate, but that on balance it would be worth it to stop a country that he said had "Death to America" as its official slogan.

"We have to gird our loins and prepare to absorb the counter-shock," he said.

World Atomic Agency Suspends 22 Programs Of Aid To Iran (NYT)

By William J. Broad

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

The International Atomic Energy Agency said yesterday that it had suspended 22 of its 55 technical aid programs with Iran, giving Washington a modest victory in its efforts to isolate Tehran internationally in the hope of curbing its nuclear ambitions.

The agency, in a report to its board, said it had also suspended a number of lesser activities, including three fellowships, participation in a training course and procurement of 15 pieces of equipment.

Washington objected to the programs and projects as aiding Tehran's nuclear efforts, which like many around the world could have military as well as civilian uses.

The agency's action is one of the few cases in which reluctant allies have joined Washington's efforts to confront Iran. Recently, the United States had Iranians seized in Iraq, strengthened its armada in the Persian Gulf and sought to starve Iran of money it needs to revitalize its oil industry.

Ali Asghar Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, based in Vienna, denounced the suspensions as "a very dangerous game" that would have no impact on its disputed nuclear program. Rather, he said in an interview, they will undermine the atomic energy agency's authority and many countries' desire to join it.

"This is a negative message to developing countries," Mr. Soltanieh said. "It will put in jeopardy their incentive to become members" of the agency and the treaty that seeks to halt the spread of nuclear weapons.

David Albright, president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private group in Washington that tracks nuclear arms, called the suspensions mostly symbolic. "I don't think they'll do serious harm to Iran," he said.

The United States lobbied hard to have the nuclear agency cut roughly in half its 55 programs of technical aid to Iran, but it faced stiff opposition. Developing countries feared that the cuts would set a bad precedent that could threaten their own aid. And the agency, which routinely grants requests for technical assistance, resisted any political meddling with a worldwide effort on which it spends roughly $100 million a year.

DOJ_NMG_0131031

"They've had a thankless task," a European diplomat, speaking on the condition of anonymity because of protocol, said Friday of the agency's rethinking of its cooperative efforts. The agency's officials, the diplomat added, "caved in to pressure."

An American official said Washington's position on the disputed projects was similar to that of Britain, France and Germany.

The agency, known as the world's nuclear policeman, has long enjoyed a mandate to promote the safe use of nuclear power and other nuclear technologies, through a complex system of technical aid programs with roughly a hundred countries. Although the aid is meant exclusively for civilian use, experts say that some of the knowledge involved can be useful in mastering the basic skills and technologies needed to make nuclear weapons.

Many experts say Iran is just years away from gaining the ability to make an atomic bomb, though Tehran insists that its nuclear program is strictly for generation of electricity and other peaceful ends.

In November, under pressure from the United States and its allies, the atomic agency denied an Iranian request for technical help in safely completing a heavy-water nuclear reactor. Tehran said it was to make isotopes for medical treatments. Critics said plutonium created by the reactor as a byproduct could fuel atomic bombs.

On Dec. 23, the United Nations Security Council imposed sanctions on Iran for refusing to stop its enrichment of uranium and called on the atomic agency, a United Nations body, to reconsider its aid to Tehran. The Council said such cooperation should center exclusively on projects related to food, agriculture, medicine, safety or other humanitarian purposes.

"No such technical cooperation," it said, "shall be provided that relates to the proliferation-sensitive nuclear activities."

On Friday, Mohamed ElBaradei, the agency's director, issued a report to its 35-nation board detailing the suspensions called for by the Security Council. It said Iran participated in 55 projects, including 15 individual and 40 regional and interregional endeavors.

It further said the agency's secretariat had determined that cooperation should continue for 33 projects but end for 22 others, including ones meant to aid Iran's development of nuclear power, its radiation processing of metals and plastics and its improvement of atomic management and strategic planning. The report added that the agency, on receiving Iranian requests for specific assistance, might grant exceptions for limited cooperation.

The report said, "The secretariat has evaluated, and established the necessary internal procedures to keep under review, all its technical assistance activities to ensure that none of them contribute to Iran's proliferation sensitive nuclear activities."

Mr. Soltanieh, Iran's ambassador to the agency, said the suspensions would be likely to have large political repercussions and strengthen the hand of those Iranians who wanted to cut off all cooperation with the atomic agency.

"This will give ammunition to those who are putting pressure on the government," he said. "This whole thing is making a more poisonous environment."

U.N. Nuclear Agency Plans To Cancel Some Aid To Iran (LAT)

By Kim Murphy

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

TEHRAN — The U.N. nuclear agency signaled Friday that it was preparing to cancel technical aid on nearly half its nuclear cooperation projects with Iran, a significant step toward implementing sanctions aimed at halting the nation's controversial uranium enrichment program.

In a report to the International Atomic Energy Agency's board of governors in Vienna, the agency leadership recommended stopping all assistance on projects that could contribute to enrichment and reprocessing work prohibited under a sanctions resolution adopted by the U.N. Security Council in December.

The cuts, expected to be approved by the agency's board of directors in March, end all technical aid for "safe and reliable nuclear power generation," for strategic planning and for a nuclear technology center under development. But they leave intact assistance for medicine development, radioactive waste disposal, wastewater treatment and agriculture.

They do not affect the agency's assistance on preparation to operate the civilian nuclear power reactor under construction at Bushehr, which is exempted from the U.N. resolution.

"No technical assistance … can be provided to Iran that relates to the proliferation-sensitive nuclear activities specified in the resolution. Technical assistance, however, can be provided to Iran when, after a case-by-case screening, it is found to be in conformity with the provisions of the resolution," says the report, prepared by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

In Vienna, Iran's ambassador to the IAEA, Ali Asghar Soltanieh, was critical of the agency's decision.

"Our cooperation with the IAEA was in agriculture, medicine and peaceful affairs. So why was this halt imposed to our peaceful cooperation as well?" he told the Islamic Republic News Agency. He said the "technical and legal paradox" in the Security Council resolution "has prompted the IAEA to take this decision."

DOJ_NMG_0131032

In all, the agency proposes to withdraw cooperation on as many as four of 15 national projects and as many as 14 of 34 regional projects, though a small number of those set for cancellation may be permitted after a case-by-case review.

Analysts said the IAEA action would probably not have a significant effect on Iran's nuclear program but would be likely to be perceived as a blow nonetheless. Iran is one of the largest recipients of U.N. nuclear technical cooperation.

"Iran will complain and say none of these projects are for enrichment or reprocessing, the sensitive technologies that were singled out in the resolution. But the agency is being careful to follow the letter of the Security Council resolution," said Mark Fitzpatrick, a nuclear specialist with the International Institute of Strategic Studies in London.

He said Iran, apparently caught by surprise by the Security Council's unanimous vote in favor of the sanctions resolution in December, has subsequently sought to downplay the measure's potential impact.

"They've been saying it wouldn't amount to anything. Well, here we have an indication that the IAEA says it does amount to something. Here's some projects that have to be stopped," he said. "It will contribute to the psychological discomfort of Iran."

David Albright, a former nuclear inspector who is president of the Washington-based Institute for Science and International Security, said the action "will certainly irritate" Iran, in part because Tehran may not have the funds to proceed with all the projects without U.N. help.

Shortly after the report's release, official Iranian sources said chief nuclear negotiator Ali Larijani had fallen ill and would not attend a security conference this weekend when informal talks on a negotiated solution to the standoff were planned.

But Iranian television later said Larijani would attend the meeting.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates is also scheduled to attend, but conference organizers said a direct meeting between the two men was unlikely.

Iran, which insists its nuclear program is intended to develop nuclear energy, not weapons, is hoping to avoid a second, escalated round of sanctions, and analysts here say it might look favorably on ElBaradei's proposal for a three-month "time out" on uranium enrichment in exchange for a similar suspension of sanctions.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad is supposed to make an announcement on the nuclear program during Sunday's planned street demonstrations in celebration of the anniversary of the 1979 Islamic Revolution. Many analysts believe he will announce some progress in setting up the first of 3,000 enrichment centrifuges Iran has said it is building at a major new underground facility in Natanz.

Once that milestone has been reached, there are signs some in Iran might advocate putting the centrifuge program on hold for a time. Abbas Maleki, a former deputy foreign minister, said the centrifuges could be placed on "warm standby," injected with warm air rather than uranium gas, until a decision was reached to use them for generating fuel.

"This would present a very strange case for the United States," he said in an interview. "The United States would then be in a corner. Because all of the maps and strategies in Washington have been designed for a defiant Iran. Not an Iran which is cooperating with the United Nations."

At the same time, he cautioned, Iran is still not prepared to make unilateral concessions.

"There are thousands of cameras watching what is going on with the nuclear program, and Iran is accepting," he said. "But at the same time, Iran wants to reach a face-saving solution. You cannot say to a government that they must say, 'I'm sorry, you are right.' Iran is not Libya."

IAEA Lifts More Nuclear Assistance (WT/AP)

By George Jahn

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- The U.N. nuclear watchdog agency yesterday suspended nearly half of the technical aid it now provides Iran, an action in line with sanctions imposed on the country for its refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

The Vienna-based International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) already suspended aid to Iran in five instances last month in line with Security Council sanctions calling for an end to assistance for programs that could be misused to make atomic weapons. Diplomats emphasized that the freeze was temporary and subject to review and approval by the 35-nation board of the IAEA next month.

Yesterday, the agency fully or partially suspended another 18 projects that it deemed could be misused. Those too were subject to review and approval by the board.

Iran gets IAEA technical aid for 15 projects and 40 more that involve other countries. The suspensions were across the board, but in the case of projects involving other countries affected only Iran.

A diplomat familiar with the issue said the United States -- along with key allies -- had been seeking to have up to half of the projects involving only Iran canceled, restricted or more closely monitored.

DOJ_NMG_0131033

A U.S. official said Washington's position on which projects should be affected was "very similar" to that of the European powers Britain, France and Germany.

The officials all spoke on the condition of anonymity in return for divulging confidential information.

Ali Larijani, Iran's top nuclear negotiator, was expected to attend a security conference in Munich this weekend, organizers said -- reversing an earlier announcement that he had pulled out.

Klaus Treude, a spokesman for the Munich Conference on Security Policy, did not give reasons for Mr. Larijani's decision to go ahead with his appearance. Earlier yesterday, conference officials said he had canceled because of sickness.

The United States, Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany all want Iran to suspend its enrichment program and have acted as a group in trying to engage Tehran on the issue. But their approaches and priorities have differed over the past year.

Russian and Chinese reluctance to impose harsh sanctions on Tehran -- as initially demanded by Washington -- have created the greatest pressure. Both nations share economic and strategic interests with Iran.

Differences over how severely to punish Tehran for its refusal to suspend enrichment led to months of disputes before agreement was reached in December on a Security Council resolution imposing limited sanctions that fell short of the harsher measures sought by the United States.

The sanctions include a review of technical aid to Iran -- programs meant to bolster the peaceful use of nuclear energy in medicine, agriculture or power generation.

IAEA Suspends Iran Aid Projects (BBC)

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The UN nuclear watchdog, the IAEA, says it has frozen almost half its technical aid projects involving Iran.

The IAEA says its move is to comply with UN sanctions imposed on Tehran late last year over its refusal to halt uranium enrichment.

Twenty-two projects have been suspended, according to an IAEA report.

Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, is to meet EU diplomats at a forum in Germany on Saturday, despite earlier reports to the contrary.

European officials hope to hold informal talks with him on the nuclear stand-off at the top-level security conference in Munich.

'Message of inducement'

The IAEA gives technical aid to dozens of countries on the peaceful use of nuclear energy in fields such as medicine, agriculture and power generation.

The nuclear watchdog has 55 projects that involve Iran.

Of these, 22 have now been frozen to comply with the UN sanctions, which call for an end to programmes that could be exploited by Iran to develop nuclear weapons.

The IAEA board is expected to formally back the move, recommended by IAEA chief Mohamed ElBaradei, when it meets next month.

The BBC's Kerry Skyring in Vienna says that the IAEA has been under pressure from the United States to take a tough line.

U.S. Accidentally Attacks Kurdish Outpost, Killing Several (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel, David S. Cloud

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 — An American military helicopter killed as many as nine Kurdish militia fighters early Friday in the northern city of Mosul when the aircraft mistakenly attacked a guard post.

The guard post protected the local offices of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, the political party of the Iraqi president, Jalal Talabani. The attack stunned Patriotic Union officials, whose leadership and militia are close allies of United States forces. They said their base and the surrounding guard posts were well known to the American military in Mosul.

“Everybody knows that it is a P.U.K. base and is used for protecting the main road between Mosul and Erbil,” said Kabir Goran, a senior Patriotic Union official, who added that the guard post was less than a mile from the party offices. “We have daily contacts with the Americans and they have been to the base.”

An aide to Mr. Talabani said he had asked the American military for information about the mistake.

The United States command in Baghdad said American troops erroneously believed that they had identified insurgents near the hide-out of a bomb-making cell linked to Al Qaeda in Mesopotamia. The command said the strike killed five Kurds, described as policemen; Kurdish officials said as many as nine were killed.

DOJ_NMG_0131034

Also on Friday, an insurgent group that has taken credit for several recent downings of United States helicopters released a video that it said showed a missile shooting down the Marine CH-46 Sea Knight transport that crashed Wednesday, killing all seven on board.

But Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute, a senior officer on the joint staff at the Pentagon, told reporters in Washington on Friday that early indications suggested that mechanical failure had caused the CH-46 crash; he warned against "drawing conclusions from things that are posted on the Internet."

The American helicopter attack in Mosul struck members of a militia force that is a crucial ally of the United States. The Kurds and their fighters, known as pesh merga, live in mountainous northeastern Iraq, but their control extends west to the Tigris River and Mosul, a city of close to two million. Sunni Arabs make up most of western Mosul, but Kurds dominate the eastern half.

In a statement, the American military said that after observing armed men near the guard post, American troops fired warning shots and called out in Arabic and Kurdish for the men to put down their arms.

An American helicopter then "observed hostile intention" and fired on the guard post. The military statement did not describe specifically what the soldiers saw the Kurdish troops do. But it said that as the helicopter attacked, American ground troops took fire from the bunker. Kurdish officials said six other pesh merga were wounded, some cared for later by American troops.

In the video posted on the Internet by a group calling itself the Islamic State of Iraq, the Sea Knight helicopter, distinctive for its two large rotors atop either end of its long, tube-shaped fuselage, is flying toward the camera. Then it banks hard right as if taking evasive action. After turning a half-circle, an object darts into the screen from the right, trailed by a curl of black smoke. The object comes close to the helicopter, though no impact is visible. But moments after the object enters the frame an explosion rips through the helicopter, which drifts to the ground in flames.

A senior defense official called into question the authenticity of the video, saying that a Cobra attack helicopter was close behind the Sea Knight in the moments before the crash, and that the Cobra pilot saw no sign of ground fire. The official also said the video appeared suspicious because there was no sign of the Cobra in any frame. "It does not show the wingman flying anywhere near the CH-46," the official said.

The helicopter crash, into an open field near the insurgent-heavy town of Karma, between Falluja and Baghdad in Anbar Province, was the latest of a half-dozen crashes or downings of aircraft over the past three weeks. Military officials are concerned that insurgents have devised new tactics or obtained new equipment that makes American aircraft more vulnerable.

Military investigators suspect that a shoulder-fired missile may have played a role in bringing down an American AH-64 helicopter on Feb. 2, according to a Pentagon document describing possible causes of the recent crashes.

Officials said there had not been a final determination of the cause of the AH-64 crash; no further details could be learned about the evidence suggesting a missile attack. The document noted that the helicopter also might have been struck by fire from a heavy-caliber machine gun.

General Lute said that four of the six helicopters that crashed recently were brought down by enemy fire, but that there was no "definitive evidence that there were missile attacks involved" in any of them. He added that it was too soon to say that attacks on helicopters had increased or that insurgents had adopted more effective tactics.

In addition to the Feb. 2 crash, those brought down by insurgents include a UH-60 that was hit by ground fire on Jan. 20 in Diyala Province; another AH-64 that was shot down near Najaf, on Jan. 28; and a Bell 412 helicopter belonging to an American contractor that was brought down south of Baghdad on Jan. 31, the document said.

U.S. Troops Kill Several Kurds In Mosul (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- U.S. forces killed eight Kurdish soldiers and wounded nine others at an established checkpoint in the northern Iraqi city of Mosul on Friday, Kurdish officials said.

A U.S. military statement offered a differing account of the incident, saying that U.S. troops killed five Kurdish police officers after the men ignored orders to lay down their weapons and exhibited "hostile intention."

"What the American statement said is not true," said Kabir Goran, deputy director of the Mosul office of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, a Kurdish political party. "They are trying to cover the massacre that they carried out at that military point," he said in a telephone interview.

"It is impossible that we attack the Americans," he said. "Their patrols are passing by that point every day, and we never attack them."

The U.S. statement said the American soldiers were in the al-Karama neighborhood of Mosul early Friday preparing for a raid against members of the Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0131035

U.S. soldiers saw a group of armed men in a "bunker" near the building where the soldiers suspected insurgents were housed and instructed them to put down their weapons, the statement said.

"They were called out in Arabic and in Kurdish," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman. "We had a Kurdish speaker out there."

A U.S. helicopter swooped in to take a closer look, and soldiers on board "observed hostile action from the bunker and exercised proper self-defense measures in response to the assessed threat," the statement said.

After the operation, the U.S. military turned over five bodies along with "nine detainees," to local police officials, the statement said. Garver said no insurgents were killed or wounded in the incident and no American troops were hurt.

Also Friday, the Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, issued a statement and released a video purporting to show the downing of a large transport helicopter that crashed Wednesday in Anbar province.

The video, posted on the Web site of the Search for International Terrorist Entities Institute, which tracks claims made by insurgent groups, shows a twin-rotor helicopter being struck by a missile. The helicopter wobbles in the air, catches on fire and slams into the ground.

Garver, the military spokesman, said investigators are skeptical of the authenticity of the video.

"We've seen the video, and there's nothing in the video that connects it to the helicopter crash on Wednesday," he said, referring to the incident in which a twin-rotor CH-46 Sea Knight came down, killing five Marines and two sailors. He said the account of the crash provided by the Sea Knight's wingman conflicts with what the video shows. Four military helicopters have crashed in Iraq this year, killing 23 service members. Five private security contractors aboard two civilian helicopters were killed in Baghdad Jan. 23 after they came under attack. One of those helicopters was downed.

On Jan. 31, another civilian helicopter came under attack but made an emergency landing, a U.S. official said, speaking on condition of anonymity because the investigation is ongoing. No one was injured in that incident, the official said.

Meanwhile, Iraqi police said a group of armed men wearing Iraqi National Guard uniforms kidnapped 13 men in a village north of Hilla on Friday morning. Eleven of the hostages were later killed, according to Capt. Muthanna Ahmed, a police spokesman in Babil province.

Police tracked the hostages and tried to free them, but had to retreat after being attacked with improvised explosive devices and small-arms fire, Ahmed said. Ten of the men killed were Sunnis and one was a Shiite, he said.

Also Friday, the U.S. military disclosed the deaths in combat Thursday of three U.S. soldiers in the western province of Anbar.

U.S. Friendly Fire Kills Kurd Security Force (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- A U.S. airstrike accidentally killed eight members of a Kurdish security force and injured another six who were manning an observation point near a political office in the northern city of Mosul, Iraqi officials said Friday.

The U.S. military said that five, not eight, Kurdish police officers died in the attack, which it said had been aimed at bomb-makers affiliated al-Qaida.

U.S. military officials also said that three American soldiers had been killed Thursday during combat in western Anbar province. The attacks brought to 3,118 the number of U.S. troops killed since 2003, according to the icasualties.org Web site. South of the capital in Basra, a British soldier died in a roadside bomb attack and three others were injured, according to a statement from the British Ministry of Defense.

A statement from the U.S. military said that American troops had received intelligence that bomb makers connected to al-Qaida were operating in the Karama neighborhood of Mosul. Seeing armed men near a targeted bunker, ground forces fired warning shots and made several calls in Arabic and Kurdish for the men to lay down their weapons, the statement said.

As the men began shooting at the ground forces, an American aircraft "observed hostile intention from the bunker and exercised proper self-defense measures in response to the assessed threat," said the statement. It expressed "deepest sympathies to the families of those individuals killed."

Kurdish officials reacted angrily, saying the airstrike on one of the main roads in Mosul was inexplicable.

"We don't have any explanation for what the Americans did," said Kabir Amir Koran, an official with a local Kurdish party.

Ali Sourchi, a 30-year-old grocer, said he had been watching a movie shortly before midnight when the power suddenly went out. He went outside to check his generator and saw the airstrike. He fled inside, fearing what might happen next, he said.

"Sounds of the bombings continued until 2:00 a.m.," he said. "In the morning, we found stone and rubble where the guards' position used to be."

Abdullah Bardi, an official with Kurdish militia forces, described the area as an insurgent stronghold.

DOJ_NMG_0131036

"We have placed checkpoints in the area to secure the office and those who come through this way," he said, adding that Kurdish officials are investigating the strike. "We are not satisfied with an apology."

The U.S. military increasingly relies on air support during missions.

Another airstrike killed eight suspected insurgents Thursday night in Baghdad, according to a separate statement from the U.S. military.

Baghdad authorities said Friday they had recovered the bodies of 32 people dumped in various neighborhoods. Elsewhere, bombings and kidnappings continued to spread death and destruction.

A car bomb went off south of Mosul near a police patrol, injuring eight. Also north of the capital, in the disputed city of Kirkuk, a car bomb injured a police official and seven others Friday afternoon. The previous night, another car bomb wounded a politician affiliated with the minority Turkmen party.

Authorities in Hillah, south of the capital, said Friday that armed men dressed as police commandos kidnapped 13 men the previous night. Two were freed, but the bodies of the remaining 11 were found nearby.

In Haswa, also south of Baghdad, a roadside bomb killed one civilian and injured seven others.

U.S. Strike Mistakenly Kills 5 Kurds (WT/AP)

By Kim Gamel

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD -- U.S. helicopters targeting insurgents mistakenly killed at least five allied Kurdish militiamen in the northern city of Mosul early yesterday. The military also reported three more American soldiers killed in combat, pushing the U.S. death toll to 33 in the first eight days of the month.

Officials said the Kurds were killed about midnight as they guarded a branch of the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, a political party led by Iraqi President Jalal Talabani, a key supporter of U.S. efforts in Iraq.

The U.S. military said the strike was carried out after American ground forces spotted armed men in a bunker near a building they thought was being used to make bombs for al Qaeda in Iraq. The troops called out in Arabic and Kurdish telling the men to put down their weapons and also fired warning shots before the helicopters opened fire, the military said.

Five men later determined to be Kurdish police officers were killed and nine others were wounded, the U.S. military said, offering condolences to the families of those who died. Kurdish officials put the casualty toll at eight killed and six wounded.

Kurdish lawmaker Mahmoud Othman denounced the air strike, but a spokesman for the Patriotic Union of Kurdistan, Azad Jundiyan, said the party realized the air strike was a mistake. "We are allied with the coalition; it was a friendly fire incident, not an intentionally hostile act," he said.

Mr. Jundiyan identified the dead as peshmerga -- Kurdish militiamen who once battled Saddam Hussein's regime. Many peshmerga have been incorporated into the Iraqi army since the U.S.-led invasion.

Three more American soldiers died Thursday in fighting in western Anbar province, the U.S. military said yesterday. More than half the 33 American deaths this month have been in Anbar.

In southern Iraq, a roadside bomb killed a British soldier, and wounded three.

Among the Americans killed this month were seven who died when a CH-46 Sea Knight helicopter crashed in Anbar on Wednesday.

An al Qaeda-linked insurgent group, the Islamic State in Iraq, posted an Internet video yesterday showing what it said was the downing of the Marine helicopter. The U.S. military has said it did not think the craft was shot down, although ground fire has brought down several helicopters recently.

Posted on a Web forum often used by Islamist militants, the two-minute video shows a helicopter that appears to be a Sea Knight in flight. An object trailing smoke is seen in the sky nearby, then the craft bursts into flames with a spray of debris. It is not clear, however, whether the streaking object is a missile, and it cannot be clearly seen hitting the helicopter.

Lt. Gen. Douglas E. Lute, chief operations officer for the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington, said there were indications the crash was caused by mechanical failure, although an investigation was still under way. He said militants have falsely claimed responsibility for aircraft crashes in the past.

In violence across Iraq yesterday, at least 36 persons were killed or found dead.

Added Troops Yield Few Results Yet In Baghdad (LAT)

By Louise Roug

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

A month after the Bush administration announced a "surge" in troops for Baghdad, Iraqis are still waiting for anything to change.

Fewer than 20% of the additional Iraqi and American troops have arrived so far. And the roughly 5,000 that have arrived have yet to make a visible impact in this sprawling city of 6 million people, where thousands of paramilitary gunmen patrol the streets.

U.S. officials are trying to manage expectations both domestically and in Iraq, continually asserting that the new forces will slowly take up positions in the capital over the coming months.

But after one of the bloodiest weeks since the U.S.-led invasion of 2003, Iraqis are increasingly impatient. A series of high-profile attacks on both civilians and security forces killed more than 1,000 Iraqis and at least 33 U.S. troops in the first nine days of the month.

U.S. Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates has said he is investigating whether he can speed the pace of the troop buildup. But a senior Pentagon official said this week that it was unlikely that U.S. troops could be sent to Baghdad any faster than planned. The five brigades going to the capital are due to arrive one per month, with the last coming in May.

So far, 3,000 U.S. troops and about 2,000 Iraqi counterparts have arrived here, according to U.S. officials. "I will be surprised if we can generate forces faster," said the senior official. Speeding the movement of U.S. forces into Baghdad would require a cut in training time, he said — a move resisted by Army officials.

In a handful of mostly Sunni Muslim neighborhoods, residents have noticed more American and Iraqi patrols. But many Iraqis interviewed said they saw no more security forces on the street than usual.

"The situation is the same or worse," said Hameed Abdullah, a 43-year-old from a southern Baghdad neighborhood. Abdullah heard about the security plan on TV but said he had seen little evidence of it in his area. Most shops are still closed, and security forces manning checkpoints do not search the cars.

Last week, he said, his neighbor of 10 years was killed in a drive-by shooting. "Every day someone I know is killed," Abdullah said.

Ahmed Samarie, a 26-year-old engineer who lives in Khadra, a predominantly Sunni neighborhood on the west side, offered an equally dark outlook. Militias and insurgents threaten residents in his neighborhood but face few consequences, he said.

"The Americans pass through the main street all the time, but they never actually patrol or ask what people want done here," he said. "They couldn't care less."

Samarie was skeptical of the Baghdad security plan, which he thought would target only Sunnis. One neighborhood close to his house, Adil, was recently raided by American and Iraqi troops, he said, but Hurriya, a troubled Shiite Muslim neighborhood nearby, was not.

"I will believe this security plan is for real if they start going into Shiite areas and purging them of gunmen," he said. "Otherwise, it's just another scam."

One American advisor to the Iraqi Defense Ministry said that, so far, additional troops have flowed into the least politically sensitive parts of the capital, which are typically Sunni, saving the more difficult Shiite neighborhoods for later. The U.S.-backed Iraqi government is dominated by Shiites and depends on radical Shiite cleric Muqtada Sadr for its majority in parliament, making any move against Shiite areas politically problematic.

A deadly maze

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, told reporters at a Baghdad news conference this week that the security plan "is not going to target any particular sector. It is going to be equitably enforced across the board, for all Iraqis." He specifically said that U.S. and Iraqi forces would have a presence in Sadr City, the huge Shiite neighborhood in northeastern Baghdad, which is Sadr's base.

Baghdad is already a deadly maze of checkpoints and concrete, manned by both legitimate security forces and gunmen posing as such. Moving through the city is difficult and dangerous. Many Iraqis are prisoners in their neighborhoods, if not their homes.

Before the troop buildup began, there were about 67,000 legitimate government security forces in the city — about 24,500 American troops, 17,500 Iraqi army soldiers and about 25,000 Iraqi police officers.

In addition, the city is home to an unknown number of private security contractors and a vast array of sectarian militiamen.

The 3,000 additional U.S. troops are among 21,500 that President Bush has pledged for Iraq, of whom 17,500 are to come to Baghdad. The Iraqi government is to commit between 8,000 and 10,000 additional troops to the capital, including the 2,000 who have already arrived.

But because Iraqi security forces suffer from widespread absenteeism, the total number may be much lower. U.S. officials have estimated that Iraqi brigades are deploying at about 60% of their full strength.

DOJ_NMG_0131038

According to the plan, mixed units of U.S. and Iraqi forces will be deployed throughout nine Baghdad districts. So far, 10 so-called Joint Security Stations have been established to house those units. There will be about three times as many once the troops are fully in place, which would be May at the earliest.

"We're just in the opening days," Lt. Gen. Douglas Lute said in a Pentagon briefing Friday. "We should not expect quick, easy or dramatic results."

No 'magic bullet' seen

U.S. Embassy spokesman Lou Fintor also counseled patience Friday.

"It's really important to caution people that it's going to take time," Fintor said during a call with reporters in Baghdad. "We're months away from seeing any concrete results. Right now we have to stress there's not going to be any magic bullet for solving Iraq's problems."

Caldwell acknowledged "some confusion" about the timing of the plan. "There is not a per se start date," he said. "You could say that the plan is ongoing. We're kind of rolling into this plan."

But as that happens, Iraqis have grown weary.

In Jamiya, formerly an upscale neighborhood bustling with cafes and dozens of shops, most places are shuttered after a series of bombings.

"The same Iraqi army checkpoints are on the main street and they don't do much," said Nawfal Sabbar, 29. "U.S. Humvees pass by on the same street but that's all they do — pass by."

He is one of the last young men in his area. Most others have left the country. Sabbar and his family are planning to leave for Qatar in a week but are having a hard time finding anyone to look after their house, even for money. He doesn't think the much-vaunted security plan will bring any change.

"Too many people have been killed, and many more people will want revenge for all these killings," he said. "Revenge is in the air. It will last a very long time."

US Iraq Forces Under New Command (BBC)

BBC.com, February 10, 2007

The new commander of US forces in Iraq, Lt Gen David Petraeus, is assuming control, ahead of a fresh push to quell violence in the capital, Baghdad.

Gen Petraeus will oversee President George W Bush's security plan, under which 21,500 extra American troops will be sent to Iraq.

Gen Petraeus, a veteran of the conflict, has called his task "hard but not hopeless".

Hundreds of Iraqis have been killed in bombings in Baghdad this year alone.

Gen Petraeus was named as Gen George Casey's replacement last month - part of a major shake-up of the US military tackling the conflict in Iraq.

Gen Casey has been promoted to US Army chief of staff.

"The situation in Iraq is dire. The stakes are high. There are no easy choices. The way ahead will be very hard," he said, testifying to the Senate armed forces committee last month.

"But hard is not hopeless."

The BBC's Jane Peel in Baghdad says Gen Petraeus' chances of success could be helped by an apparently changed attitude from the Iraqi Prime Minister, Nouri Maliki.

Mr Maliki has promised that all those involved in the violence will be legitimate targets, she says.

In the past, his Shia dominated government has been accused of protecting the Shia militias.

No-one in Baghdad expects an overnight transformation, but both the Iraqis and the Americans will be desperate for some early and tangible results, our correspondent adds.

US and Iraqi forces have been carrying out a low-level offensive against Shia militias in the capital for weeks, seen as a prelude to a major campaign.

The new offensive will involve US and Iraqi forces, thousands of whom are already on the ground, sweeping Baghdad for militants and illegally held weapons, US military officials say.

The Iraqi government has said it will announce guidelines for the new plan in the coming days.

However Mr Bush's plan continues to face considerable opposition both from Democrats and members of his own Republican party, who want an earlier transfer of security to Iraqi leaders.

America's Striving General (FT)

By Demetri Sevastopulo

DOJ_NMG_0131039

Financial Times, February 10, 2007

When a US army officer receives his fourth star, under normal circumstances it would be the crowning moment in a distinguished career. But the circumstances surrounding the promotion of General David Petraeus were anything but normal.

After President George W. Bush nominated Gen Petraeus to command US forces in Iraq, the 54-year-old West Point graduate received a slew of e-mails with messages that said it all: "Congratulations - I think."

By then, however, the general was under no illusions about the mission he had accepted, arguably one of the most unenviable jobs on the planet. Arriving back in Baghdad this week, the -warrior-intellectual - he has a PhD in international relations from Princeton University but revels in challenging men half his age to push-up competitions - was beginning his third tour.

When he commanded the 101st Airborne Division during the 2003 invasion of Iraq, Gen Petraeus would repeatedly ask: "Tell me how this ends?" Four years later, the question is his to answer.

Most people agree that theman who wrote a PhD dissertation entitled "The American Military and the Lessons of Vietnam" is uniquely qualified to oversee the controversial military "surge" that Mr Bush has ordered for Iraq.

Since graduating from West Point in 1974, in the closing stages of the Vietnam war, Gen Petraeus has maintained the reputation - enshrined in the academy's yearbook - as a "striver to the max". The 5ft 9in fitness fanatic and marathon runner won several prizes at the highly competitive US Army ranger school and later graduated top of his class at the Army Command and General Staff College.

After US-led forces toppled Saddam Hussein in Baghdad in 2003, Gen Petraeus took the 101st Airborne Division to the northern city of Mosul, where he gained accolades for establishing and overseeing Taskforce Tom Sawyer. The US effort to win the hearts and minds of the local population focused on rebuilding the city and restoring stability rather than kicking in doors.

Iraqis referred to Gen Petraeus as "King David", a sobriquet some officers use to refer to his perceived arrogance. But some have privately argued that his arrogance and ambition will be an asset since he will take risks that his more cautious predecessor, General George Casey, would have avoided.

Robert Gates, the new US de-fence secretary, yesterday des-cribed that suggestion as "baloney", insisting that he consulted many senior officers about who should lead the US effort in Iraq. "In virtually every case, Gen Petraeus was their first choice . . . even Casey," said Mr Gates.

Whether Gen Petraeus will again be crowned King David remains to be seen. In the 16 months since his last tour, conditions in Iraq have deteriorated sharply. The US military death toll has risen to more than 3,100 and even conservative estimates put Iraqi deaths at about 60,000.

The magnitude of the challenge was underscored last week when the US intelligence community issued a bleak assessment concluding Iraq had des-cended into what could be des-cribed as "civil war plus" be-cause of the different concurrent conflicts.

Gen Petraeus last served in Iraq as the US commander responsible for training Iraqi security forces. While Mr Bush was hoping American troops could "stand down" as Iraqi forces "stood up", the escalating violence has forced him to send Gen Petraeus to Iraq to oversee the entry of 21,500 extra US troops in a last-ditch effort to pacify Baghdad.

Gen Petraeus is aware that the US domestic political landscape has changed dramatically. Many military officers are concerned that the American public will not tolerate the war much longer and that still-supportive politicians will abandon ship.

Democrats opposing the surge have increasingly been joined by influential Republicans, such as John Warner, the respected Virginia senator, who is concerned that US soldiers are being caught in the crossfire of a civil war.

Before leaving Fort Leavenworth, on the banks of the Missouri, for his new home on the less placid banks of the Euphrates, Gen Petraeus had a taste of what it feels like to be caught between warring factions.

Senators used his nomination hearing before the armed services committee last month as a proxy issue to debate the planned surge. However, while there was intense disagreement over the policy, Gen Petraeus was lavished with praise.

The general must have known his promotion was safe when Edward Kennedy, the Massachusetts Democratic senator who specialised in lambasting Donald Rumsfeld, the recently ousted defence secretary, called him an "outstanding military officer". The Senate later overwhelmingly confirmed Gen Petraeus. In contrast, Gen Casey's nomination for army chief of staff drew opposition from a number of senators.

Gen Petraeus appeared calm and confident before the sometimes bellicose politicians on the committee, including heavyweights such as Republican John McCain and Democrat Hillary Clinton.

Displaying political skills that may help navigate the more treacherous political waters of Baghdad, Gen Petraeus mollified the senators by admitting past failures in Iraq. Taking full advantage of their post-Rumsfeld world, many senators asked whether the general would give his honest opinion to Congress.

DOJ_NMG_0131040

"I will give you my best professional military advice and if people don't like it, then they can find someone else to give better professional military advice," he replied. "I am not a politician. I'm a guy who wears a uniform and has for 32 years plus . . . I'd just really like to leave it at that . . . learning that minefields are best avoided and gone around rather than walked through on some occasions."

There were also bursts of humour - notably absent when Mr Rumsfeld used to testify. Asked whether a resolution against the surge would affect troop morale, Gen Petraeus joked: "I seriously doubt that our troops are sitting watching C-Span 3 in Iraq right now," in reference to the US public television channel that was broadcasting the hearing.

While Gen Petraeus won over the senators, however, the real battle is in Iraq. While he has called for patience, politicians in the US, who are becoming increasingly sceptical as the 2008 presidential election season opens, may not give him the time he says he needs. "You wrote the book, general, but the policy is not by the book," said Mrs Clinton. "You are being asked to square the circle, to find a military solution to a political crisis."

New US General In Iraq Hotseat (AFP)

By Bill Ickes

AFP, February 10, 2007

General David Petraeus, a 54-year-old paratrooper with a reputation as a deep thinker, has taken on the toughest job in the US military as head of American-led forces in Iraq.

Petraeus was named commander of the 140,000-strong force at a ceremony Saturday in Camp Victory, a massive American base on the outskirts of Baghdad, the violent epicentre of a bitter sectarian war.

He is tasked with turning around a faltering mission which faces mounting US casualties and a dramatic collapse in domestic political support.

"Now is the time for all Iraqis to reject violence and crime and corruption and to rise up against those who employ such methods to further their goals," the general told assembled dignitaries.

"The rucksack of responsibility is very heavy. In truth, it's too heavy for any one person to bear, and we will all have to share the burden and move forward together," he said, adding "the prospects for success are good."

"Failing that, Iraq will be doomed to continued violence and civil strife," he warned, promising to provide "the best leadership I can muster."

Petraeus, who has a doctorate in international relations, took over command from General George Casey, who has been promoted to army chief of staff.

The ceremony, conducted under a crystal chandelier in the grandiose rotunda of one of ousted Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein's former palaces, was presided over by US Central Command leader General John Abizaid.

Even as the handover took place, violence continued around Iraq, with police reporting at least nine Iraqis killed in various attacks.

Four people were killed in central Baghdad and nine wounded, including two policemen, when a car bomb exploded, according to security sources.

South of the capital, in the town of Al-Mussayib, two women and a man were killed in a gun attack on their house, said police Captain Mthanna Hassan.

A suicide car bomber killed one Iraqi soldier and wounded five people, including two troops, in an attack on a patrol near the northern town of Tall Afar, Colonel Abdelkarim Al-Juburi told AFP.

In nearby Mosul a policeman was shot dead in his car, he added.

Petraeus's chances of success hang on the latest in a series of what have so far been failed US attempts to regain control of Baghdad and central Iraq, a region plagued by Shiite militias and roving gangs of Sunni insurgents.

Daily attacks on US-led forces and Iraqi civilians have increased steadily since the fall of Saddam Hussein in April 2003, and more than doubled in the 12 months since Sunni bombers destroyed a revered Shiite shrine in Samarra.

Ahead of the ceremony, Casey told reporters: "My greatest fear is that the Iraqis can't put the past behind them.

"We liberated them from 35 years of tyranny. We can't liberate them from the fears and prejudices that grew up in that 35 years. They have to do that themselves," he said.

Handing command to Petraeus, he smiled: "Dave, as we say in Iraq, 'Lots done, lots to do'. You won't want for hard work."

More than 3,100 US soldiers have died since the invasion and support for a continuing US presence in Iraq among American voters is at an all-time low, despite President George W. Bush's promise of a new strategy.

At least 16 US, British and Polish troops have died this week alone.

As one of the architects of the new plan, which will see 21,500 extra US troops flown in to work with Iraqi units trying to pacify Baghdad and Anbar province, Petraeus is now the figurehead for a controversial gamble.

DOJ_NMG_0131041

Petraeus -- who has spent a total of two-and-a-half years in Iraq since the invasion as commander of the 101 Airborne Division and head of the mission to train Iraqi forces -- is hailed as an intellectual and Iraq's best hope.

But critics of the "surge strategy" of pouring in more troops to kill off the sectarian war and impose Iraqi government authority warn the situation may already have spun beyond the control of the brightest minds.

"Some disasters are irretrievable," warned a report from the influential Washington think-tank, the Council on Foreign Relations, released Friday.

According to a new counter-insurgency manual drafted under Petraeus himself, for victory he would need "at least double the number of troops the United States will have on the ground once the surge is implemented."

Resolution Good For Surge (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

TWO WEEKS AGO, the Senate seemed poised to approve a nonbinding resolution criticizing President Bush's planned deployment of 21,500 additional troops to Iraq. Such a resolution was viewed — even by some of its supporters — as less a policy prescription than a warning to Bush to live up to his promise that, "surge" or no surge, the U.S. mission in Iraq isn't "open-ended."

But thanks to parliamentary missteps by the new majority, some shrewd maneuvering by the Republican minority and Democratic skittishness about being accused of not supporting the troops, an anti-surge resolution is on hold in the Senate and instead gathering momentum in the House of Representatives. Meanwhile, supporters of the administration are suggesting that Congress should mind its own business.

We disagree. Congress should go on record as a way of pressing Bush and the Iraqi government to make the most of what may be the last politically realistic chance of pacifying that country and keeping it together.

An anti-surge resolution is one way for Congress to make Bush choose between two competing interpretations of his Jan. 10 speech unveiling a "new way forward" in Iraq: (1) That "if the Iraqi government does not follow through on its promises, it will lose the support of the American people"; and (2) that "failure in Iraq would be a disaster for the United States." Like many in Congress who support an anti-surge resolution, we believe the first message is the only tenable one. That the Bush administration itself might be leaning in that direction was suggested this week by Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates' testimony before the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Gates expressed hope that the surge would succeed in pacifying Baghdad and ramping up the ability of Iraqi forces to maintain order on their own. But he also acknowledged that the Pentagon was studying alternatives — notably a redeployment of U.S. combat troops to Iraqi Kurdistan or Kuwait — in case the new strategy fails. Gates said the surge wasn't the "last chance" to salvage Iraq, but the backup plan he described was to move U.S. troops "out of harm's way."

Perhaps most revealingly, Gates told Sen. Robert C. Byrd (D-W. Va.) that "if the plan to quiet Baghdad is successful and the Iraqis step up, I would hope we would be able to begin drawing down our troops later this year." The implication is that the success — or failure — of the surge will be pronounced sooner rather than later. Gates' comments irritated Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.), who told the defense secretary that "if you're asking somebody in eight months to solve a 1,400-year-old religious dispute, bring people together who have suffered a dictatorship for 30 years, reconstruct an economy that was raped by a dictator — that's a pretty tall order."

Too tall, we would reply, if it requires the open-ended commitment that even Bush now seems to disavow. The president, Gates and Gen. David H. Petraeus should be given time to make a success of their new approach, but that time should be measured in months, not years. If it takes a resolution from Congress to make that point to the president, so be it.

For Eminent Sunni, Lessons In Weakness (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 9 -- Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Salam Z. al-Zobaee's cousin has been in government custody for eight months.

He hasn't been charged, Zobaee said, and the formal inquiries he himself has made to have the oil engineer released, or at least get the case before a judge, have been rebuffed.

"He was detained because they looked at him like he didn't belong here," Zobaee said during a recent interview in his spacious office in the fortified Green Zone. "He has been in detention for eight months -- and I am a deputy prime minister."

Zobaee, in principle one of Iraq's most powerful men, offers the anecdote to illustrate his powerlessness, which he says is a product of the Shiite-led government's efforts to cast aside high-ranking Sunnis like him.

Shiite political leaders say Zobaee, one of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's two deputies, deserves his placeholder status.

DOJ_NMG_0131042

"He does not deserve power," said Ali al-Adeeb, a Shiite lawmaker and a senior member of Maliki's Dawa party. "His group is accused of committing terrorism, and he always gets himself involved in defending terrorism. We have [Sunni] parties that are participating in the government during the day, but they are working at night cooperating with terrorists."

The marginalization of Zobaee -- who denies being an instigator of violence -- is a prominent example of the strained relationship between Sunni and Shiite leaders, an acrimony that many see as the main obstacle to deterring violence and laying the foundation for reconciliation in Iraq.

"We need, first, reconciliation inside the government," Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish member of parliament, said in an interview. "They have never sat together to have a sound dialogue to agree on who the enemy is."

Maliki and U.S. military officials say Iraqis are taking the lead role in a security plan to pacify the capital and other parts of the country. But Zobaee, who nominally oversees security affairs, said he has been all but left out of preparations for and implementation of the plan. He said it is foolhardy to put Iraqi officials at the helm.

"If you ask me, 'Do you think the multinational forces can put their faith in the hands of the Iraqi government,' I will answer you: 'No. We don't have the right army.' "

In Zobaee's estimation, Iraq is not even "50 percent" ready to roll out the plan. And he accused the Shiite-dominated government of keeping him out of the loop on matters that should be among his primary responsibilities.

"I don't have any authority," he said during an hour-long interview in which he often sounded exasperated. "And always there are obstacles in our way, and we don't find someone to listen to us."

Zobaee also accused the Interior Ministry, which Maliki oversees, of unduly detaining tens of thousands of Sunnis, some of whom, Zobaee said, have been tortured in detention centers. Tens of thousands of Iraqis have been detained in recent years without charges or judicial oversight.

Sunni leaders say the Shiite-led government is only appearing to crack down on Shiite militias -- including the Mahdi Army, which is led by anti-American cleric Moqtada al-Sadr -- in order to appease the United States. But they acknowledge that it does so with trepidation, recognizing the considerable political power of Sadr and other Shiite militia leaders. Sadr is one of Maliki's key backers.

Shiites, on the other hand, say they cannot share details about security operations with Sunni leaders because of fears that the Sunnis will disclose the plans to insurgent groups.

U.S. officials say reconciliation is vital to ending violence in Iraq.

"The only way we will achieve peace and bring real stability in this country is the political process," Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a senior U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said Wednesday. "And the political process will allow the reconciliation to take place."

The culture of distrust and finger-pointing in the Iraqi government plays out frequently in parliament, where shouting matches are common and sessions often end in walkouts.

Maliki has repeatedly stressed the importance of overcoming sectarian differences.

"Observers will hopefully conclude that the operations are Iraqi ones aimed at achieving a joint goal," he told military commanders in a speech televised Tuesday. "When operations are carried out based on equality and justice, they will be respected by all of the Iraqis and will silence the voices that will allege that a certain operation has targeted this or that sect."

But Maliki himself hasn't always remained above the sectarian fray. During a parliamentary session Jan. 25, he dressed down a Sunni lawmaker who criticized Maliki's security plan.

Abdul Nasser al-Janabi, who belongs to a Sunni bloc that has pressed for a withdrawal of U.S. troops, demanded parliamentary oversight of the security effort.

An irritated Maliki admonished him: "This brother will trust the prime ministry when I bring your file forward and hold you responsible."

Maliki took the most powerful job in the Iraqi government after a coalition of Shiite political parties won the most seats in December 2005 elections.

He had virtually no control over the appointment of his deputies, who were selected based on the number of votes their parties received. Deputy Prime Minister Barham Salih, a Kurd, chairs a panel that oversees energy and oil policy.

Zobaee, a former university professor and union leader who has a doctorate in agronomy, was given the social services and defense portfolios. The latter in theory gives him oversight of the armed forces.

Maliki kept control of the Ministry of Interior, which oversees the police forces as well as detention facilities not run by the U.S. military.

The sectarian antipathy has made lawmaking an arduous and contentious task, even on issues that don't touch on security.

DOJ_NMG_0131043

"It is preventing the parliament from doing anything," said Othman, the Kurdish lawmaker. And instead of curbing sectarian tension, he said, government leaders are exacerbating it. "The problem is with the leadership, the religious leadership and the political leadership. It is preventing the parliament from doing anything."

Mahmoud al-Mashhadani, a Sunni Kurd and speaker of parliament, said the impact of sectarian differences on the political process could be worse.

"Iraq has not been dismembered into three countries," Mashhadani said during a recent roundtable discussion with reporters. "The presence of a united parliament under the same dome amid bombings is a hopeful and encouraging sign."

With Rumsfeld Gone, Rice Now Target Of War Anger (CNN)

By Elise Labott

CNN.com, February 9, 2007

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- Condoleezza Rice's appearance Wednesday before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee was downright tame compared with the reception she got last month, when she sat before the same committee to explain President Bush's "way forward" in Iraq.

On January 11, the secretary of state got an earful from both sides of the aisle. Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut, a Democrat who is running for president, called the Bush administration's Iraq policy "a fool's paradise," and Sen. Chuck Hagel, another possible White House hopeful, called Bush's plan "the most dangerous foreign policy blunder since Vietnam."

The tone this week was friendlier, but the criticism was much more pointed at Rice's diplomacy and her stewardship of the State Department. Committee Chairman Joe Biden, another Democratic contender for president, warned Rice that Iraq was sucking up the government's time, attention and resources and wondered aloud whether the secretary had the time to address the myriad other problems facing the United States. (Watch how Rice's star has dimmed)

Republican Sen. George Voinovich took Rice to task for not filling high-level vacancies at the State Department. Nobody, he said, was minding the store.

These are rough and uncharted waters for Rice, who sailed through the first six years of the Bush administration relatively unsullied as her colleagues -- particularly former Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld -- took the heat for the quagmire in Iraq.A perfect mix of substance and style

It wasn't always this hard.

After serving as national security adviser during President Bush's first term, Rice arrived at the State Department in 2005 a celebrity -- epitomizing that perfect mix of substance and style. She graced the pages of Vogue magazine and landed on Vanity Fair's best-dressed list.

During her first year she was praised for repairing the Bush administration's "go it alone image" by engaging Europe on the Iran nuclear issue and Asian allies on North Korea.

But it wasn't all smooth sailing. As the war in Iraq went south, so did Rice's plan to spread democracy throughout the Middle East. Her comments about sectarian tensions in the region being the result of the "birth pangs of the Middle East" were followed by a lackluster diplomatic attempt to intervene in Israel's war with Hezbollah.

As the problems in the Middle East mounted, Rice turned to old authoritarian allies, like Saudi Arabia and Egypt, for help.Lightning rod for criticism

Rice remains the most popular member of the Bush administration; her approval ratings in polls are higher than Bush's.

But the honeymoon is clearly over. Rice has inherited the role Rumsfeld played as a primary spokesman of the Iraq war -- and the primary lightning rod for criticism about it.

At a time when the American public and Congress have soured deeply on the war, they are now taking their frustrations out on the administration as a whole, and Rice in particular.

Even her predecessors are getting in on the game. During a rare series of hearings with former secretaries of state and national security advisers -- including James Baker, Henry Kissinger, Madeline Albright, Brent Scowcroft and Zbigniew Brzezinski -- Rice was taken to task for failing to practice the art of diplomacy.

"That's what we hire a secretary of state for, not to sit there and proclaim categorical statements, but to engage in the process," former national security adviser Brzezinski said.

Baker and Albright, both former secretaries of state, were particularly critical of Rice's refusal to engage with Iran and Syria.

Rice told The Washington Post in December that the "compensation" required to strike a deal with Iran and Syria would be too high.

But Baker, co-chairman of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group that recommended U.S. officials open a diplomatic front with Iran and Syria, told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that when he was secretary of state "we practiced diplomacy full time, and it paid off."

DOJ_NMG_0131044

Said Albright, "Talking to governments about hard problems is what diplomacy is all about."Losing her mojo?

Now the headlines are asking whether Rice has lost her mojo.

A recent Economist editorial, entitled "The Falling Star of Condoleezza Rice," said the secretary of state "is not the woman she once was."

But there are signs Rice is trying to turn things around. Next week she will embark on a new push to resolve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, seen as key to keeping Arab support for the war in Iraq and for a more robust policy to deal with Iran's nuclear program and its support for Islamic extremists in the region.

Beating back Tehran diplomatically may prove to be Rice's other primary challenge in her last two years in office. While the Bush administration insists it does not want a military conflict with Tehran, the rhetoric from Washington sounds very similar to that in the months leading up to the invasion of Iraq.

If she pulls off either, Rice could save the Bush administration's foreign policy legacy from being merely an indictment of the mess in Iraq. If she fails on both, she may leave the State Department with a much more dangerous world to deal with than the one she found when she arrived.

Appeals Court Backs Detainee (WP)

By Josh White

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

A federal appeals court in Washington ruled yesterday that a U.S. citizen in U.S. military custody in Iraq has the right to challenge his detention in a federal court.

The judges said all American citizens, regardless of where they are captured and imprisoned, are entitled to federal court review of their cases through habeas corpus petitions if they are in U.S. custody.

The three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia said a U.S. court should review the circumstances of Shawqi Ahmad Omar's more than two years of incarceration in Iraq. It rejected the Bush administration's claim that the executive branch has nearly unlimited authority during wartime and its assertion that the United States can hold citizens indefinitely if they are in custody overseas.

The court also found that the U.S. military cannot transfer Omar to the Iraqi government to avoid a habeas corpus hearing. Circuit Judge Janice Rogers Brown, who dissented in part, agreed that the district court has jurisdiction over Omar's habeas case.

"Today's opinion says that when at the end of the day the buck is stopping with a U.S. official, the federal court gets a look into whether it is lawful," said Aziz Huq, a lawyer at New York University's Brennan Center for Justice, who represents Omar. "It prevents an area of darkness in which the government could consign both citizens and noncitizens to detention without judicial review."

The ruling applies only to U.S. citizens. It does not delve into whether captured foreign nationals who the government considers enemy combatants -- such as the 393 detainees at the military prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba -- are entitled to the same protection. The Military Commissions Act of 2006 prevents enemy combatants who are foreign nationals from filing habeas corpus petitions. That law also has been challenged in the courts.

Carl Tobias, a law professor at the University of Richmond, said yesterday's decision appears to be a "fairly straightforward application of habeas corpus" that "says the courts are open." But the case is likely to apply only to a few U.S. citizens, he said.

Justice Department officials said yesterday that they are evaluating the decision and how to proceed.

"It is important to remember that this case concerns an alleged enemy combatant captured by our military and held by a multinational force in a war zone," said Justice Department spokesman Erik Ablin. "We believe the court's decision will inappropriately interfere with the executive branch's prerogative to prosecute a war and to make good on its commitments to our allies."

Omar, a dual citizen of Jordan and the United States, was arrested in October 2004 amid allegations that he was aiding Abu Musab al-Zarqawi's terrorist network in Baghdad. Omar has said that he traveled to Baghdad to do reconstruction work and had been planning to leave in November 2004 but was arrested before his departure.

U.S. authorities wanted to transfer him to Iraqi criminal courts for trial, but a U.S. district court stepped in when attorneys argued he could lose his rights to challenge his detention. Omar has been jailed in various U.S. facilities in Iraq. He has told his attorneys he was abused.

One other U.S. citizen detained in Iraq has filed a habeas corpus petition, which is scheduled for a hearing in U.S. federal court next week. Mohammad Munaf was arrested and charged with taking part in a terrorist plot to kidnap a group of Romanian journalists. He was convicted in an Iraqi court and sentenced to death, but before the sentence could be carried out, a U.S. court in October prevented the U.S. military from transferring Munaf to Iraqi custody.

Court Blocks Moving American's Case To Iraq Court (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 (AP) — A federal appeals court blocked the Pentagon on Friday from transferring an imprisoned American to an Iraqi court to face charges that he supported terrorists and insurgents.

A three-judge panel of the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia ruled unanimously that the prisoner, Shawqi Omar, a citizen of Jordan and the United States, had a right to argue for his release before a United States court.

By a 2-to-1 vote, the panel also upheld an injunction issued last year by Judge Ricardo M. Urbina of Federal District Court here that blocked the military from turning over Mr. Omar, 45, for trial in an Iraqi court.

"This is a case about whether a U.S. citizen can be cast into a legal black hole with no means to challenge the basis for his detention," Aziz Huq, Mr. Omar's lawyer, said. "The court today reaffirmed the Supreme Court's view that war is not a blank check as far as a citizen's liberty is concerned."

A spokesman for the Justice Department, Erik Ablin, said it believed that the decision would "inappropriately interfere with the executive branch's prerogative to prosecute a war and to make good on its commitments to our allies."

Mr. Ablin noted that the partial dissent called the ruling unprecedented and said it would effectively block a foreign government from making an arrest on its own soil. He said department lawyers were evaluating their next legal step.

American forces captured Mr. Omar in 2004 at his home in Baghdad in a raid on associates of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the Qaeda leader killed last year in an airstrike. He has been held without formal charges. Mr. Omar has not had access to counsel, his family says.

The military says Mr. Omar was harboring insurgents and had bomb-making materials when he was arrested. The military decided in 2005 to transfer him to the Central Criminal Court of Iraq for trial, but United States courts have blocked that. Lawyers for Mr. Omar's family say he is innocent and is likely to be tortured if transferred to the Iraqis. They say he is a businessman who sought rebuilding contracts in Iraq.

Writing the majority opinion, Judge David S. Tatel said the Supreme Court had held in three cases involving detainees after Sept. 11, 2001, that American courts had jurisdiction to review their detention.

KBR, The Military Honor Civilian Sacrifices (HC)

By Brett Clanton, David Ivanovich

Houston Chronicle, February 10, 2007

The Defense Department and KBR on Friday honored 28 contractors who were killed or wounded in the Middle East with the agency's civilian version of the Purple Heart.

But some honorees at the event said citizen contractors still are not getting the same recognition as the military for sacrifices they make serving their country in Iraq.

"The contractors are every bit as important as the military," said Lloyd Dagit, who lost his 42-year-old son Keven in Iraq on Sept. 20, 2005. But they are rarely treated that way, he said.

Yet on Friday, Dagit was more concerned with remembering his son — and that midnight call from KBR that shattered his world.

"I thought I was prepared for anything that happened," he said. "But I wasn't."

Dagit of Jefferson, Iowa, and the relatives of eight other slain contractors, as well as 19 others who were wounded gathered in Houston on Friday for a private ceremony honoring the KBR workers.

All received the Defense of Freedom medal.

The Pentagon does not include civilian contractor deaths in its casualty figures for Iraq. The tally of war dead roughly stands at 3,100.

The Labor Department — through its division of Longshore and Harbor Workers' Compensation division — says at least 770 civilian contractors working for U.S. firms had died in Iraq as of Dec. 31, while another 7,761 had been injured.

Supporting troopsKBR, which is in the process of being spun off by Houston-based Halliburton, is the largest military contractor operating in Iraq. Under a multibillion-dollar logistics contract with the Army, some 50,000 KBR employees and subcontractors provide an array of support services for U.S. troops, from building bases to serving food.

And while workers operate under protection by the U.S. military or private security officers, they still come into harm's way.

Ninety-eight KBR employees and subcontractors have been killed in Iraq, Kuwait and Afghanistan since the two U.S.-led invasions began. Another 450 have been wounded in hostile action, said company spokeswoman Melissa Norcross.

DOJ_NMG_0131046

KBR has received approval to grant Defense of Freedom medals to 95 of its wounded or slain workers, and is seeking permission for more awards, she said.

Some of those medals will be given to KBR employees while they are still serving in the Middle East. But the company has also been quietly hosting U.S. ceremonies like the one Friday morning at the Hilton Houston Post Oak hotel.

Though a government-sponsored award was being given, KBR said "out of respect to the families" it would not allow news media to attend.

After the event, KBR went so far as to surround honorees with security officers, escorting them to a private reception. Two uniformed Houston Police Department officers were also standing outside the hotel's lobby.

Norcross said it was a "joint decision" by the company and the U.S. Army to keep the event closed to the public.

But KBR sent out the invitations, helped with travel arrangements and paid for air fare and rooms for the recipients and up to three guests per invitation.

During the award ceremony, Maj. Gen. Jerome Johnson, commanding general of the Army Sustainment Command, handed each worker or surviving family member a plaque containing the Defense of Freedom medal, along with a certificate signed by Army Secretary Francis Harvey.

Established after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks to honor civilians killed or wounded while aiding the military, the medals feature a bald eagle holding a shield on one side, and the words "On Behalf of a Grateful Nation" along with the recipient's name on the reverse.

Among the wounded KBR workers receiving the award was Jeff Hayson, 50, of Yakima, Wash.

Sitting in the hotel's lobby before the ceremony, Hayson struggled to remember how many surgeries he had undergone after shrapnel from a July 2005 roadside bomb cut through his mouth and severed his carotid artery.

"I'm really lucky to be alive," said Hayson, who attended the event with his wife, Valarie.

Across the lobby, in the hotel's lounge, was James Blackwood, another one of KBR's wounded being honored Friday.

'Lucky to be alive'Blackwood, 54, was shot four times during an ambush of his truck convoy in the spring of 2004. One bullet blew off a finger on his right hand, one hit his right arm, another pierced his right shoulder and one landed in his left leg.

"Nobody got out of it without getting hit," said Blackwood, who lives in Fort Worth and is one of a number of former KBR workers pursuing litigation against the company.

But wounded KBR workers such as Wallace McNabb would just like to see contractors receive as much credit as the military for their work in Iraq.

"We get killed and wounded right alongside them," said McNabb, 51, of Lincoln, Neb., who was shot in his left hand while working for KBR as a truck driver in Iraq.

Yet Earnest Cook said he was happy just to be getting any award for his time driving a truck for KBR in Iraq. While the 48-year-old from Troy, Texas, had part of his left elbow blown off in an insurgent attack, he remains matter-of-fact about the whole thing.

"I was just doing what I was supposed to do," he said.

Help For The Intrepid (WSJ)

By Jonathan Gurwitz

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

SAN ANTONIO -- The word "sacrifice," like the word "war," lends itself to political and rhetorical excess. There are symbolic sacrifices in metaphorical wars. Then there are genuine sacrifices in real wars.

The latter was on display last week at Fort Sam Houston in San Antonio, as representatives of a grateful nation dedicated the Center for the Intrepid and two new Fisher Houses to those wounded in the global war on terror.

The center is a 65,000-square-foot, state-of-the-art physical rehabilitation facility. The Fisher Houses are homes away from home for the families of military personnel being treated at military medical centers and Veterans Administration hospitals. The center and the houses were built entirely with private funds. More than 600,000 Americans contributed $50 million to construct the Center for the Intrepid. Thousands more donated the $8.3 million needed to build the new Fisher Houses for Brooke Army Medical Center, home to the sole Army Burn Center and one of two Army Amputee Care Centers. BAMC has treated more than 2,600 service members injured in Afghanistan and Iraq. Only Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, D.C. has cared for more casualties.

As the dedication ceremonies commenced, 300 wounded military personnel walked, staggered and rolled beneath the drawn swords of an honor guard to take their seats in the front rows. One of them was Staff Sgt. Jon Arnold-Garcia.

Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia of the 101st Airborne Division lost the lower half of his right leg to a grenade when insurgents struck his convoy in Hawija, Iraq. Not yet fitted with a prosthesis, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia was on crutches.

As the Joint Service Color Guard of the Military District of Washington presented colors, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia rose to attention, without crutches, on one leg.

Next to him was a soldier I knew. Staff Sgt. Steve Bosson of the 1st Cavalry Division is a bear of a man. Looking at his frame, you wouldn't know he's been through three years of surgeries, prosthetic fittings and rehabilitation. Staff Sgt. Bosson lost the lower half of his left leg to a grenade in an ambush west of Baghdad.

At moments during the National Anthem, Staff Sgt. Arnold-Garcia would teeter a bit. To keep his balance, he would occasionally touch the elbow of his right arm, drawn up in salute, to the shoulder of Staff Sgt. Bosson. It was a fleeting yet moving portrait of genuine sacrifice.

Representatives of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund and the Fisher House Foundation spoke at the ceremony, as did Secretary of Veterans Affairs Jim Nicholson and Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Gen. Peter Pace. So did Sens. Hillary Clinton and John McCain. The speakers, however, were merely paying tribute. The true dignitaries were the wounded warriors who sat in the front rows.

Mr. McCain's comments were stately. "What you have done for us, we can never do for you," he told the injured. "But we are mindful of that distinction and humbled by it. And our appreciation for your service demands us all to do what we can, in less trying circumstances, to help keep this nation a place and an idea worthy of the hardships, danger and sacrifices you have born for us so valiantly."

Some critics have questioned the propriety of individuals and businesses, rather than the government, building the Center for the Intrepid and the Fisher Houses. Democratic strategist Paul Begala told my colleague Scott Huddleston, "It is an obscenity that a government that can find billions in no-bid contracts for Halliburton and trillions in tax cuts for the wealthy cannot find a few million dollars to bind up the wounds of its heroes."

Mr. Begala is of course correct that the government has an inviolable obligation to care for military personnel and veterans. But do the thanks of citizens end with the filing of tax returns?

Arnold Fisher, the philanthropic force behind the center, who saw it through from groundbreaking to completion in fewer than 15 months, provided a rhetorical answer: "Why would we want our government to do that which we could do ourselves in half the time, at half the cost and twice the quality?"

Everywhere one turned were examples of men and women inspired to give of their own accord, to show gratitude worthy of the sacrifice of the citizen soldiers of the volunteer military.

John Melia is a Marine veteran who was severely wounded in a helicopter crash in Somalia in 1992. After his recuperation at BAMC, he began the Wounded Warrior Project, a nonprofit organization that places veterans at the bedside of wounded military personnel to support them and their families.

Kirk Bauer is an Army veteran who lost a leg in a grenade attack in Vietnam in 1969. A year later, he began working with Disabled Sports USA, a nonprofit that provides adaptive sports opportunities for individuals, military or civilian, with permanent physical disabilities. Today Mr. Bauer is executive director of the organization, which now has 87 chapters in 35 states.

Janis Roznowski is a flight attendant for American Airlines. After volunteering on a government-chartered flight bringing troops home from the Middle East, Ms. Roznowski felt compelled to follow up on the needs of the wounded. She started Operation Comfort, a nonprofit organization that plans recreational projects and events for convalescing personnel and their families.

"We're not done yet," Mr. Fisher told me in the gleaming lobby of the Center for the Intrepid. With more combat troops headed for Iraq and a spring offensive expected from the Taliban in Afghanistan, the ranks of the wounded will grow.

Have these men and women earned the government's commitment to provide them the finest care available? Of course. Do they also deserve -- beyond the payment of taxes and vapid talk about national sacrifice -- some measure of support from the American people?

"We can never give them back what they lost," said Richard Santulli, chairman and CEO of NetJets and chairman of the board of trustees of the Intrepid Fallen Heroes Fund. "But it is our duty as Americans to give them back as much normalcy in their lives as we can. That will be the best legacy this center can provide."

Survival Of Ancient Faith Threatened By Fighting In Iraq (WP/AP)

By Chris Newmarker

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

TRENTON, N.J. -- Among the casualties of the Iraq war is a little-known religious faith called Mandaeanism that has survived roughly two millennia and whose adherents believe that John the Baptist was their great teacher.

DOJ_NMG_0131048

While there were more than 60,000 Mandaeans in Iraq in the early 1990s, only about 5,000 to 7,000 remain. Many have fled amid targeted killings, rapes, forced conversions and property confiscation by Islamic extremists, according to a report released last week by the New Jersey-based Mandaean Society of America.

Among the roughly 1,500 Mandaeans in the United States, there have been continual phone calls with endangered friends and relatives, fundraisers and unsuccessful lobbying efforts in Washington to get Mandaeans out of Iraq, as well as neighboring Jordan and Syria.

"Unfortunately, we're not big in numbers, and numbers talk," said Suhaib Nashi, a 53-year-old pediatrician who helps run the Mandaean Society of America out of his Morristown, N.J., home.

Mandaean leaders say tens of thousands of their brethren are scattered around the world, including a U.S. community centered around New York and Detroit.

With the dispersion comes concern that the faith is withering, especially as more Mandaeans marry non-Mandaeans, with no mechanism to bring their children into the fold.

"There's not much hope for us to survive to two or three generations," Nashi said.

Scholars who study the Mandaean religion and culture say its extinction would be a great loss, the end of an ancient religious movement. Dating to the time of the Roman Empire, it survived primarily in what is today Iraq and Iran, a branch of the Gnostic movement that borrowed elements of Christianity.

Mandaeans view John the Baptist as a great teacher, and engage in baptisms to come in closer contact with a "world of light" that is better than the material world on Earth.

"It represents a slice of the culture of the Middle East before the rise of Islam. It's a view to a former world. And frankly, we don't know very much about it," said Charles G. Haberl, an instructor in Middle Eastern studies at Rutgers University.

Haberl, who says he's trying to arrange a reprint of one of the Mandaeans' main holy books for the first time in about 150 years, laments that an "enormous literary tradition" may soon disappear.

"It would be as if a museum or library were put to the torch," Haberl said.

Driven from Iraq and Iran, many Mandaeans have adapted to their new homes, enjoying financial success as medical doctors, civil engineers and jewelers, Nashi said.

But being scattered means that many in the younger generation have found spouses outside the community. And since a Mandaean has to be born a Mandaean, the children of such marriages have a questionable status in the religion.

Mamoon Aldulaimi, 60, of Lake Grove, N.Y., is a civil engineer who's a leader in the Mandaean community. Aldulaimi's son, 20-year-old Hani Aldulaimi, married an American raised as a Baptist.

At the wedding last May in the Phoenix area, where the newlyweds live, Mamoon Aldulaimi's daughter-in-law prominently displayed a darfash, a cross with cloth hanging off of it that's a symbol of Mandaeanism.

"She took that initiative as a matter of respect for us," Aldulaimi said.

But with the religion's few dozen priests reluctant to agree on a mechanism to bring in the children of mixed marriages, Aldulaimi and others wonder how long Mandaeanism will survive.

Meanwhile, the few thousand Mandaeans still living in Iraq are finding their lives increasingly in danger, targeted by extremists of every political stripe and religious faith.

Nashi said a cousin on his father's side, Suhail Jani Sahar, was killed by Shiite fighters in November. A more distant cousin on his mother's side, Yahya al-Chuhaily, was killed by Sunnis in June.

"Where there are areas where the Shia are the majority, they'll kill the Mandaeans and the Christians along with the Sunnis. Where there are areas where the Sunni are the majority, they'll kill the Mandaeans and the Christians along with the Shia," Nashi said.

Jorunn Buckley, an assistant professor of religion at Bowdoin College in Brunswick, Maine, has studied Mandaeans for decades and has testified for them in U.S. immigration courts. She said the United States could do much more to get Mandaeans out of the Middle East.

"It's not that many people," Buckley said. "It's not 5 million people."

When contacted about the issue, a State Department spokesman cited Jan. 17 congressional testimony by Ellen R. Sauerbrey, assistant secretary of state for population, refugees, and migration, who said the department has been expanding the ability of the United States to bring in more Iraqi refugees, including the "special populations" of religious minorities.

"We intend to ensure that these special populations receive the same consideration and access to the U.S. resettlement program as others," Sauerbrey told the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Pentagon To Extend Troops In Afghanistan (AP)

By Robert Burns

DOJ_NMG_0131049

AP, February 10, 2007

The Pentagon plans to extend its buildup of several thousand combat troops in Afghanistan, initially announced as lasting until late spring, well into next year, a senior U.S. military official said Friday.

The move comes as U.S. and allied commanders anticipate a renewed offensive this spring by the Taliban, and as they seek additional reinforcements from NATO countries. The effort to bolster forces there so far has brought only limited success, with a few nations promising handfuls of additional troops and equipment.

The extension of the U.S. buildup means American troop levels in Afghanistan, which increased this month to about 26,000 — the highest of the war — will remain roughly the same until at least spring 2008. Until now, a level of 22,000 to 23,000 had prevailed through much of last year.

The decision, expected to be announced in Washington as early as next week, entails sending an Army combat brigade to replace the 3rd Brigade of the 10th Mountain Division when it leaves this spring.

Without replacing that brigade, the number of U.S. troops in Afghanistan would have receded to the lower level. That is because the U.S. has had extra troops in the country since earlier this month, when a brigade of the 82nd Airborne Division arrived.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision has not been announced, declined to identify the replacement brigade. There are about 3,500 soldiers in a brigade.

The move comes as the United States is also adding 21,500 troops to its forces in Iraq, which totaled around 130,000 before that buildup started.

While President Bush's troop increase in Iraq has aroused widespread public and congressional opposition, there has been little dissent over efforts to intensify U.S. operations in Afghanistan. Both conflicts, however, are continuing to put severe strains on a military that is constantly scrambling to find fresh troops and equipment to send to the war zones.

The increase in the U.S. force in Afghanistan comes as NATO's new top commander, Gen. John Craddock, is seeking 1,500 to 2,000 extra combat troops for the campaign, plus about 800 more from the British.

Decisions about adjusting U.S. troop levels next year will depend in part on whether the United States' NATO partners send all the combat and support forces they have promised.

About 15,000 of the American troops in Afghanistan are serving in the NATO-led force, which now totals about 36,000. The other 12,000 are special operations forces or are training Afghan troops.

The 3rd Brigade originally was to go home this month, as it turned over command to the brigade of the 82nd Airborne, but the Pentagon announced in January that it instead will be kept in place four extra months.

Until now, it was not clear whether the Pentagon would replace the 3rd Brigade when it went home.

The senior official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because the decision to extend the buildup has not been announced, said the unit that replaces the 3rd Brigade in late spring will remain for a year.

Thus the number of brigades in Afghanistan, which increased from one to two this month with the 82nd Airborne's arrival, will remain at that level until the spring of 2008 and possibly beyond, he said.

4 Afghan Police Killed In Taliban Ambush (AP)

Associated Press, February 10, 2007

Taliban militants ambushed a truck full of Afghan police in southern Afghanistan, killing four officers and injuring three, an official said Saturday.

The attack occurred Friday evening in the Panjwayi district of Kandahar province, said provincial police chief Afmatullah Alizai. The three injured were in serious condition, he said.

NATO forces in September killed more than 500 militants in the Panjwayi area, largely clearing the region of militants in an offensive dubbed Operation Medusa.

Canadian and U.S. Special Forces are now working in Panjwayi to increase security. More Afghan security checkpoints have been put up, a new road is being built and schools and clinics are re-opening.

But small groups of fighters remain.

The attack on the police happened near the village of Talukan. Militants in December beheaded two men in Talukan, saying the two were working with NATO forces.

Attacks spiked in Afghanistan last year, with some 4,000 people killed in insurgency-related violence, according to an Associated Press count based on numbers from U.S., NATO and Afghan officials.

NATO officials are bracing for more violence this spring, when fighters typically step up attacks after a winter lull.

Eleven Taliban, Four Police Killed In New Afghan Violence (AFP)

AFP, February 10, 2007

Four policemen and 11 Taliban have been killed in fresh violence in southern Afghanistan, as a suicide car bomb narrowly missed a NATO military convoy.

The Taliban fighters were killed Friday in an Afghan and International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) operation in Kajaki district of the southern province of Helmand, provincial police chief Mohammad Nabi Mullahkhail said Saturday.

British forces with ISAF have been trying to clear the area of militants to allow the resumption of work to rehabilitate a hydropower project that could supply power to 1.8 million people.

The violence follows the death of 10 Taliban on Thursday in the same area, who were killed in clashes with Afghan and British troops, police said.

A purported Taliban spokesman, Yousuf Ahmadi, confirmed the fighting in Kajaki but denied any losses on his side claiming instead that several Afghan and NATO soldiers were killed.

The security forces said they did not suffer any casualties.

Overnight Saturday Taliban militants ambushed a police patrol in Panjwayi district of neighbouring Kandahar province, killing four police and wounding three more, provincial police chief Assmatullah Alizay told AFP.

The police were on patrol late Friday when Taliban fighters opened fire, kicking off a gunbattle. There was no information on any Taliban casualties, he said.

Ahmadi claimed in a telephone call from an undisclosed location that around 10 police were killed and wounded.

Also in Kandahar, a suicide attacker detonated a car bomb as he tried to approach a NATO convoy near the southern city of Kandahar but he missed by metres and killed only himself.

The attacker was blown to pieces and body parts were flung across the area as was the shattered vehicle used to carry the bomber, Alizay said.

The blast was on a major highway that has seen many of the regular attacks in the city, including a February 4 suicide bombing targeted at a Canadian convoy that also caused no casualties besides the bomber.

The militants stepped up their bloody insurgency in 2006, with the violence claiming more than 4,000 lives. The religious extremists were toppled from power in a US-led offensive in late 2001.

Gates To Meet Musharraf In Pakistan Next Week: Officials (AFP)

AFP, February 10, 2007

US Defence Secretary Robert Gates will visit Pakistan early next week for talks with President Pervez Musharraf on the threat from Taliban insurgents in Afghanistan, official sources said.

It will be Gates' first visit to the key US ally in the "war on terror" since he came to office late last year. He is expected to fly to Afghanistan afterwards.

Gates' visit will be closely followed by separate visits to the region by NATO Secretary General Jaap de Hoop Scheffer and two top diplomats from the United States and Britain, the sources said.

"These visits are part of a renewed focus on Afghanistan, how to deal with the threat posed by Taliban," a senior Pakistani official told AFP on Saturday.

Afghanistan suffered its bloodiest year in 2006 with more than 4,000 people killed, mostly rebels, sometimes in pitched battles between Taliban-led insurgents and NATO-led troops in regions bordering Pakistan.

Pakistan has faced mounting accusations it has not stopped Taliban using its territory as a sanctuary and launching pad for attacks inside Afghanistan, where the hardliners were ousted from power in late 2001 by US-led forces.

The foreign forces in Afghanistan are bracing for expected surge in Taliban violence in the coming months and NATO has said it wants to reinforce its 35,000 troop-deployment in the war-torn country.

Musharraf recently said security along the porous Pakistan-Afghanistan border was the joint responsibility of all the forces nearby, and Pakistan could not win the fight against militancy on its own.

Camouflaged Defense Spending (LAT)

By Veronique DeRugy

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

AT THE SAME TIME that President Bush requested more than $700 billion for the Pentagon budget this week, he managed to create the impression that he was asking for the much smaller amount of $481 billion. The trick he used — socking about $235 billion into two "emergency supplemental" funding requests for the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan — didn't fool the public for very long. But the longer the White House and Congress continue to treat "war-related" funding as a separate item from the budget for the Department of Defense, the harder it will be to control a ballooning federal budget.

DOJ_NMG_0131051

Here's how the supplemental shell game works. The official defense budget for 2008 comes to $481 billion. That's a 10% increase over last year and a 62% increase over 2001. And it conveniently fails to include a supplemental request of $141.7 billion, which brings the 2008 defense total to $622.7 billion. On top of that, the president requested a 2007 supplemental in the amount of $93.4 billion, bringing this week's entire defense "budget authority request" to $716 billion (the figure of actual outlays is even higher because it includes billions already committed to the Pentagon).

Both of these supplemental items are part of the true cost of defense, and the one piece of good news is that they were mentioned in Monday's $2.9-trillion budget proposal. That's a big improvement over recent practice, in which supplementals were requested throughout the year but never mentioned in official proposed budgets. (That $93.4 billion for 2007 comes on top of a $70-billion "bridge supplemental" appropriated in November.)

However, the underlying problem — the use of supplementals to paper over the real costs of defense and domestic programs and to avoid making tough budget choices — is very much alive.

Supplemental budget requests are supposed to provide funding that cannot wait until the next appropriations cycle. Congress uses them to foot unexpected costs because of natural disaster or war. Thus, supplementals provided the initial funding for conflicts including the Persian Gulf War, Bosnia and Kosovo. However, the continued funding for these conflicts came through regular budget horse-trading. Traditionally, supplemental spending makes up less than 1% of defense spending, and it rarely rises above 3%.

By contrast, in 2007, at least 16.4% of new defense spending will go through supplemental bills. And yet, after four years of engagement, the cost of the war in Iraq is by no means unpredictable or sudden. The largest expenditures in the supplementals are the salaries and benefits of Army National Guard personnel and Reservists called to active duty.

So why abuse supplemental appropriations? Because Congress and the president have discovered that they are an effective way to discreetly increase spending for a long and painful war. As important, supplemental spending does not count against budget caps or automatically trigger offsetting cuts. Thus, the Pentagon can have money for the war while keeping space available in the regular budget for pet projects.

Last year, Army Chief of Staff Gen. Peter Schoomaker gave the game away when he testified before a Senate committee that the Army preferred to fund 30,000 additional troops through supplementals because including the funds in its annual budget request "would have to displace other things that are too important to us as we transform."

But that trade-off is exactly what should be happening. In the 2008 budget, instead of one defense budget request that has to balance and justify the need for war-fighting funds with such Cold War-era weapons boondoggles as the Air Force's F-22 stealth fighter, the Marine Corps' tilt-wing V-22 Osprey and the Navy's DDG-1000 stealth destroyer and Virginia-class attack submarine, the Pentagon separates the two and gets to have its cake and eat it too.

Nor is the Pentagon the only player in the shell game. By trimming the administration's formal defense spending request (while relying on supplemental spending to make up the difference), Congress can free up the amount "saved" for non-defense appropriations.

That's why, in 2006, then-House Appropriations Committee Chairman Jerry Lewis (R-Redlands) asked that $6 billion be cut from the proposed 2007 defense budget and shifted over to erase almost $4 billion in cuts proposed for the departments of Labor and Health and Human Services. That made Congress look fiscally responsible. In the 2007 fiscal year, this bipartisan practice will make it possible for Congress to spend an extra $170 billion.

The Democratic Congress could use Iraq spending as leverage for some long-overdue cutting of waste at the Pentagon. Or Congress may decide that more than $700 billion for defense is worth every penny. But we must stop pretending that war-related costs are somehow separate from the budget of a department whose only mission is to fight and win the nation's wars. That won't happen until Washington stops hiding major defense spending increases — years after this "emergency" practice should have stopped.

Ousted U.S. Attorney Blames Policy Disputes With Bosses (AZREP)

By Billy House And Dennis Wagner, The Arizona Republic

Arizona Republic, February 10, 2007

Former U.S. Attorney for Arizona Paul Charlton said Friday that he left office in January for "principled reasons, not performance issues," as a deputy attorney general suggested this week.

Charlton, who was one of six top federal prosecutors across the country forced to resign, said there had been "policy disputes" with his Justice Department higher-ups. Charlton spoke to The Arizona Republic on Friday in his first public comments since being asked to step down.

Although Charlton declined to elaborate, two sources said a main disagreement between Charlton and officials in Washington centered on when to seek the death penalty in federal murder cases.

As a U.S attorney, Charlton has pursed the death penalty in some cases. But his insistence on determining whether to push for capital punishment on a case-by-case basis clashed on at least two instances with a Justice Department effort to centralize decisions nationally and to seek the death penalty in a uniform way.

Charlton acknowledged that he was among the prosecutors who received a telephone call on Dec. 7 from Michael Battle, director of the Justice Department's executive office for U.S. attorneys, asking him to resign.

"I certainly was given no indication there were performance concerns," Charlton said.

Like all U.S. attorneys, Charlton served at the pleasure of the president. He was appointed in November 2001.

Even so, Charlton said that he told Arizona GOP Sen. Jon Kyl, a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, of the call and that Kyl agreed to speak to officials at the department on his behalf.

"Senator Kyl informed me that after his conversation with the Department of Justice that the department agreed they would reconsider their asking me to resign," Charlton said.

But, Charlton said, "it then became apparent to me that our views had become so divergent and disparate that I would resign."

"I left for principled reasons, not performance issues," said Charlton, now a partner in the firm of Gallagher and Kennedy.

'Issue of semantics' A Justice Department official in Washington who asked not to be identified said that Charlton's distinction between policy and performance "may be an issue of semantics."

"Policy is set at a national level," the official said. "Individual U.S. attorneys around the country can't just make up their own policy agendas. Such a situation would result in chaos with 93 different U.S. attorneys implementing different policy decisions around the country. That is no way to run an organization."

Kyl, in a statement released by his office on Friday, said he had "been assured that both Attorney General (Alberto) Gonzales and Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty are grateful for Paul Charlton's five years of service, as am I."

"My understanding is that Paul Charlton's departure resulted from disagreements with the Department of Justice about some office policies," Kyl added. A spokeswoman for Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he also believes Charlton "was an exemplary U.S. attorney."

Charlton's comments come amid a growing controversy over the forced resignations of six top prosecutors.

McNulty testified this week before the Senate Judiciary Committee, which is looking into the dismissals, and suggested that the Republican-appointed U.S. attorneys were asked to resign for "performance-related" reasons.

The ousters have prompted a Senate battle over a provision quietly slipped into the Patriot Act reauthorization last year to allow the Justice Department to replace prosecutors with interim successors for indefinite terms, viewed by some as a Bush administration end-around past Congress.

On Thursday, the Senate Judiciary Committee in a bipartisan vote passed a measure opposed by Kyl to repeal that provision.

One of the ousted U.S. attorneys, John McKay of Seattle, said earlier this week that his office received glowing performance reviews as recently as last fall. And another, Daniel Bogden of Nevada, has also told a newspaper that he had not been told of any problems with his performance.

The suggestion that Charl- ton was asked to leave for performance-related reasons stunned one former supervisor, former Deputy Attorney General James Comey. Comey was McNulty's predecessor in that job, leaving in August 2005.

Charlton "was one of the stars of the U.S. attorney community," Comey, now general counsel for Lockheed Martin, said Friday. "His office handled a staggering caseload and number of crimes."

Arizona case Wyn Hornbuckle, a spokesman for the U.S. Attorney's Office in Arizona, said there has been only one person sentenced under the Federal Death Penalty Act in Arizona. Lezmond Charles Mitchell, 25, is being held at the Special Confinement Unit in Terre Haute, Ind., one of 44 inmates there facing execution.

Mitchell was convicted in the October 2001 murder of Alyce Slim, 65, and Tiffany Lee, 9, during a kidnapping. Mitchell and a co-defendant, Johnny Orsinger, stabbed the victims to death after catching a ride as hitchhikers. Mitchell is reportedly the first and only Native American facing federal execution. The Navajo Nation has criticized his sentence, which is scheduled for appeal Thursday in the 9th Circuit Court of Appeals.

Hornbuckle said federal prosecutors are seeking the death penalty against Jose Rios Rico, who faces trial for murder during a drug-trafficking crime, as well as numerous other felony offenses related to meth deals.

In one case, four members of the New Mexican Mafia, or New Eme, faced execution for murder and other crimes. The defendants, including brothers Luis and Felipe Cisneros, accepted last-minute plea bargains. Three received life sentences; the fourth got 16 years.

Larry Hammond, a Phoenix attorney who represented Felipe Cisneros, said Charlton was an "honest broker" in the case, deciding to give up capital punishment because the government would have faced an expensive six-month trial with severe effect on victims and an unknown verdict.

"It was true that, for a long time, main Justice was not prepared to go along" with the plea deal, Hammond said, adding that authorities in Washington, D.C., finally relented.

Under Charlton's administration, several other death-penalty actions were initiated but later dropped.

Richard Dieter, executive director of the Death Penalty Information Center in Washington, said that the Bush administration has become more aggressive in pursuing executions.

Dieter noted that the federal Death Penalty Act was expanded in 1994 to make numerous offenses eligible for capital punishment, including virtually any murder committed as part of another federal crime.

He said Justice Department officials have sought to deal with inconsistent death-penalty prosecutions from state to state by creating national protocols.

At the same time, he noted, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales and Bush's first attorney general, John Ashcroft, are also solid backers of capital punishment while their predecessor, Janet Reno, philosophically opposed the law.

As a result, new protocols have been imposed requiring Justice Department review of all cases that are death- penalty eligible, reducing the autonomy of local U.S. at- torneys.

Charlton Exit Linked To Death Penalty Push (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - Supporters of former U.S. Attorney Paul K. Charlton say that the former federal prosecutor clashed with the Bush administration over the death penalty before he resigned in December.

Former Arizona Attorney General Grant Woods said Friday the Justice Department in Washington pressed Charlton to apply the death penalty in certain cases, but Charlton resisted because he didn't believe it was the right thing to do. Charlton resigned in December and left office at the end of last month.

"It's obvious that they may have felt there were more circumstances where (the death penalty) was warranted than he did," said Woods, who has spoken with Charlton recently. "I think he should get credit for standing on principle rather than just doing what he was told so he didn't make waves. A lot of people don't have the guts to stand up and say 'no.' "

Woods did not know whether the conflicts led directly to Charlton's departure after serving as the U.S. attorney for Arizona since 2001. Charlton took a job with a Phoenix law firm.

Charlton did not respond to repeated requests for comment throughout the week. The 46-year-old career prosecutor told The Associated Press in December that he had decided it was time to leave.

A Justice Department spokesman was not immediately available for comment Friday evening.

Charlton's resignation came as accusations swirled on Capitol Hill that the Bush administration had used a provision of the USA Patriot Act to oust federal prosecutors and replace them with White House allies without Senate confirmation.

Democrats have accused the administration of punishing prosecutors whose work targeted Republican allies. Charlton's office handled preliminary investigations into Republican Reps. Jim Kolbe and Rick Renzi before the November election.

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales has denied the charge and promised to submit every replacement for Senate confirmation. Seven federal prosecutors have left office in the last year; most, like Charlton, stepped down in December.

Editorial: Call McKay's Firing What It Is: A Political Purge (TACNT)

Tacoma (WA) News Tribune, February 10, 2007

John McKay, by all accounts, was a stellar U.S. attorney.

Since becoming Western Wash- ington's top federal prosecutor in 2001, he led an aggressive team that filed charges against twice as many defendants and posted a higher conviction rate despite the bigger case-load.

McKay won admiration of federal judges and state law enforcement officials, and earned the Navy's highest civilian honor for creating an interagency information-sharing system that has become a national model.

Even his bosses seemed to think McKay was doing a topnotch job. Just last March, Justice Department evaluators gave McKay's office a glowing review, calling him an "effective, well-regarded and capable leader."

So it came as quite the surprise when McKay announced in December that he was stepping down. There was no plum appointment or job waiting in the wings, only a chance to pursue other opportunities — usually code for "I was shown the door."

As so, it turns out, McKay was. He spoke out this week in defense of himself and his former employees after Deputy Attorney General Paul McNulty told a Senate judiciary panel that McKay and five other Republican U.S. attorneys were forced to resign for "performance-related" issues.

McKay says no one ever raised performance issues with him, not even on Dec. 7 when a senior Justice Department official called out of the blue to tell him he had to resign by the end of January.

The truth behind the mass exodus has a lot more to do with the politicization of the U.S. Attorney's Office than it does with poor lawyering. A Justice Department source told the Seattle Post-Intelligencer that President Bush and the Republican Party want to "build their bench" by replacing top prosecutors with younger conservatives to enhance their résumés for future positions.

Come to find out, Congress did the administration a big favor last year when it gave Attorney Gen. Alberto Gonzales the power to appoint interim prosecutors indefinitely. Now the administration doesn't have to go to the trouble of seeking Senate confirmation.

The Senate Judiciary Committee voted this week to repeal that new authority; the rest of the Senate and House should follow its lead. U.S. attorneys may serve at the pleasure of the president, but the interests of justice demand that they be shielded from the brute machinations of political retribution and cronyism.

Editorial: Firings Reek Of Politics (SPT)

St Petersburg (FL) Times, February 10, 2007

Former U.S. Attorney John McKay's last performance appraisal gave him a highly favorable rating and said he is "an effective, well-regarded and capable leader." But McKay, of the Justice Department's Western Washington office, got kicked out the door. He is one of at least seven U.S. attorneys across the country who have been removed for what appear to be political reasons.

U.S. attorneys act as chief federal prosecutors within the states and are charged with being fair and independent. But there is no job that can't be filled by political loyalists.

In a hearing before the Senate Judiciary Committee, Paul McNulty, the deputy attorney general, claimed that most of the incumbents had been replaced for performance issues. Yet he admitted to Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., that H.E. Cummins III, a former U.S. attorney in Arkansas, had done nothing to justify being removed. Cummins was replaced with a former political director for the Republican National Committee.

Schumer is investigating the removals. The administration is exploiting a provision of the reauthorized Patriot Act, which allows it to ignore the Senate confirmation process.

Previously, the president could name an interim U.S. attorney for 120 days. After that, a federal judge would appoint a substitute who would fill the job until the Senate confirmed the administration's choice. The Patriot Act allows the president's appointee to stay in the job indefinitely.

An administration prone to putting partisans and political hacks in key public posts could use this loophole to fill its top prosecutor ranks with party activists who are less than shining legal lights. It also may use this unilateral power to intimidate those prosecutors who remain.

In ousting San Diego U.S. Attorney Carol Lam, the Bush administration has signaled to others in its corps that investigating public corruption comes at a price. Lam headed the office that unearthed the misdeeds of congressman Randy "Duke" Cunningham, who is now in prison after admitting taking more than $2-million in bribes. The probe had been continuing under her leadership and included other members of Congress.

Senate confirmation is integral to reducing the partisanship of presidential appointments and is especially important for posts where impartiality and independence are needed qualifications. The new law that makes it possible to cut the Senate out should be repealed, as a measure introduced by Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., would do. Meanwhile, Schumer and other senators should continue to press for better explanations for the removal of people who seemed to be doing their job.

Gregg Herrington Column: U.S. Attorney's 'Resignation' Doesn't Wash (VANCC)

By Gregg Herrington, Columbian staff writer

Vancouver (WA) Columbian, February 10, 2007

This ought to teach U.S. Rep. Brian Baird and Clark County Prosecutor Art Curtis to keep their mouths shut.

The two Democrats have liberally praised a Bush administration Republican appointee, John McKay, for doing a heckuva job as U.S. attorney for Western Washington. Now McKay is no longer in that job. He's toast. Out on his ear.

When he announced in December that he was moving on, McKay didn't say much. He played the Colin Powell role of an obedient and noncomplaining soldier. He said something gauzy about pursuing other interests.

At least he spared us tergiversation about spending more time with his family or catching up on reading back copies of National Geographic.

Then came Wednesday's revelation before the Senate Judiciary Committee: Seven U.S. attorneys around the country had been asked to resign in recent months. Later in the day, McKay told The Associated Press, "I was ordered (in December) to resign. ... I was given no explanation. I certainly was told of no performance issues."

Just seven months earlier McKay "received a glowing performance review from Justice Department evaluators," The Seattle Times reported Thursday.

I figure the Baird-Curtis praise was a nail in McKay's career coffin.

Some 90 U.S. attorneys around the country serve at the pleasure of the president, prosecuting, or not, federal crimes.

But the Bush White House likes its minions to be attuned to the greater vision: moving the blue states into the red column. And how can one do that if one is working closely with the other side, sharing credit with Democrats while beefing up the federal crime-fighting apparatus in Southwest Washington?

Too politically moderate?

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer said Thursday that a former Justice Department source said McKay is "too politically moderate" for the Bush administration. Other theories boil down to McKay not being enough of a partisan. The Justice Department doesn't comment on specific attorneys but cited performance as an issue for those it sent packing.

Nobody's buying it.

Chief U.S. District Judge Robert Lasnik told The Times that among federal judges in Western Washington, "it was unanimous that ... John McKay was an absolutely superb U.S. attorney, and by every measure the performance of his office improved during his tenure."

Norm Maleng, the moderate Republican King County prosecutor, said McKay "took the U.S. attorney's office to a higher level. He reached out to every prosecutor in Western Washington, and renewed connections. ..."

Sen. Patty Murray, D-Wash., somewhere between suspicious and outraged, called for a Judiciary Committee probe of McKay's dismissal. That was Wednesday. By Thursday she was closer to outrage and wrote the attorney general, asking for an explanation.

Friend to Southwest Washington

In Vancouver, Curtis, the Democratic county prosecutor for 26 years, said, "John McKay did more for law enforcement in Southwest Washington than any U.S. attorney I've ever worked with. I was saddened when I heard he resigned and saddened that he was asked to resign."

Baird, whose public praise for McKay has been free-flowing for several years, said, "John McKay is an outstanding individual and a great friend to Southwest Washington. He's probably the best U.S. attorney we've ever had, for this region."

Much of their regard for McKay stems from his paying attention to Clark County, long a backwater in the world of federal criminal prosecution. McKay, in 2003, was instrumental in getting a Federal Investigative Center in Vancouver, staffed with people from various federal crime-fighting agencies who historically have served this area mostly out of Tacoma and Seattle.

Maybe the next time local Democrats feel the urge to say something critical of a Bush appointee, they ought to say something nice instead. That'd fix him.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Prosecutors Eye Jobs' Role In Pixar Stock Options (SFC)

By Jessica Guynn, Chronicle Staff Writer

San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2007

Film director Lasseter reportedly received many that offered advantageous timing

These days, the most animated discussions about Steve Jobs have nothing to do with his high-tech wizardry and everything to do with his alleged involvement in a growing stock-options manipulation scandal that has engulfed Apple Inc., the Cupertino technology giant he runs, and Pixar Animation Studios, the Emeryville movie company he sold to Walt Disney Co. last year.

DOJ_NMG_0131056

Federal prosecutors in San Francisco are scrutinizing options awarded to top Pixar executives on dates that guaranteed them the highest potential profits. Among the grants being reviewed: Two-time Oscar-winning animated film director John Lasseter and former Pixar President Edwin Catmull received options that allowed them to buy Pixar stock at the lowest price in 2000. In 1997, Lasseter received options just before a production agreement with Disney that pumped up shares nearly 50 percent.

A spokesman for the U.S. attorney's office in San Francisco declined to comment.

The Wall Street Journal reported Friday that Jobs, then Pixar's chairman and CEO, signed the 2001 employment contract with Lasseter that included a large options grant on a date more than three months before the contract was signed. The Journal cited a person familiar with the matter.

It remains unclear what role if any Jobs played in selecting the favorable date, according to the Journal. But the timing grabbed the attention of federal authorities, prompting an investigation by Disney that has not been completed. Washington lawyer William McLucas, a former Securities and Exchange Commission official heading the investigation, could not be reached for comment. In a conference call with investors in November, Disney CEO Bob Iger said the board began the investigation after being contacted by the SEC and the Justice Department.

Federal investigations of both Apple and Pixar have put Jobs on the hot seat. An internal Apple probe cleared Jobs of wrongdoing but acknowledged that he was aware and even recommended the selection of "favorable" dates to potentially inflate the value of stock options to key executives. Jobs sits on Disney's board and is its largest individual shareholder. Lasseter is now chief creative officer of Disney's animation studios. A Disney spokesman could not be reached for comment.

"This is yet another incident of really questionable ethical conduct by Steve Jobs," said James Post, a Boston University management professor who teaches corporate governance and ethics. "Steve Jobs is too smart a guy to just have stumbled multiple times into this kind of behavior. Now it will be up to the U.S. attorney or the SEC to decide what to do about that."

In March 2001, Jobs signed a 10-year employment contract with Lasseter, who had delivered box-office gold for Pixar with "Toy Story" and other animated films. Jobs was eager to lock Lasseter into a long-term contract, fearing Disney might try to recruit the director, the Journal reported.

The new contract included a $5 million signing bonus and a $2.5 million annual salary. An SEC filing said 1 million stock options were "previously" granted "at the fair market value" on Dec. 5, 2000, the day before the options were dated. That price was the lowest of 2000. By that March, Pixar's shares had rebounded dramatically.

From 2003 through last year, Lasseter cashed in about 880,000 of the options, adjusted for a 2-for-1 split, at various prices before converting the remaining shares to Disney shares when Pixar was sold, the Journal reported.

Revelations of Jobs' potential involvement in the suspect timing of stock-option grants at Apple and Pixar are becoming cumulative, said Adam Pritchard, a University of Michigan law professor who used to work for the SEC. It remains to be seen if prosecutors can make the case that Jobs understood that the practice ran afoul of securities laws.

"There was no effort to disguise what's being done, which suggests he didn't think there was anything wrong with it," Pritchard said.

Former Colorado U.S. Attorney William Leone cautions against a rush to judgment. "There are 1,000 facts that could make one of these stock-options cases turn 180 degrees," he said.

SEC Formalizes KLA Probe (SJMN)

By Mark Schwanhausser And Ryan Blitstein

San Jose Mercury News, February 10, 2007

The Securities and Exchange Commission has elevated its probe into stock option backdating at KLA-Tencor into a formal investigation, the company said Friday.

The San Jose maker of chip-inspection equipment, which said it learned the news Feb. 2, has faced an informal investigation by the SEC and a separate probe by the Justice Department since last May, when newspaper reports raised questions about the fortunate timing of options awarded to Chairman Kenneth Levy.

Last week, KLA acknowledged in its 2006 annual report that the company intentionally priced stock options ``retroactively," falsified documents and violated its stock plan rules about issuing discounted options. The company said that some former executives selected the ``fortuitously low" prices, while others were aware of the abuses.

The internal inquiry led to the ouster of Levy, a Silicon Valley pioneer, General Counsel Stuart Nichols, and director Jon Tompkins, the former CEO of Tencor before it merged with KLA.

DOJ_NMG_0131057

The company also fired Kenneth Schroeder, a former chief executive who most recently served as a senior adviser, and canceled all tainted options he held. Although KLA-Tencor hasn't said so explicitly, its reports appear to blame Schroeder for much of the options abuses. Schroeder plans to fight his firing and the cancellation of his options, KLA-Tencor said.

A formal investigation means the SEC can issue subpoenas to force the disclosure of information, rather than asking for information to be provided voluntarily during an informal inquiry.

But it doesn't necessarily indicate a dramatic shift by the SEC, said Darryl P. Rains, a partner with Morrison & Foerster in Palo Alto. For example, the SEC might formalize an investigation in order to subpoena an uncooperative former executive or a financial institution that can't otherwise turn over an executive's private banking or brokerage statements.

``People often mistake it to mean it's more serious," Rains said. ``KLA's case is quite serious, but I don't think it became more serious all of a sudden."

KLA is ``cooperating fully" with the SEC and Justice Department investigations ``and intends to continue to do so," it said in its quarterly report to the SEC.

The company recently restated results from 1994 through 2005 to include $370 million in charges related to those backdated options. KLA-Tencor expects to record up to $6 million in additional charges in coming financial periods related to the backdating.

The SEC filing released Friday also provides details about what the company is doing to help rank-and-file employees deal with the fallout of the backdating scandal. The company said that all employees who got options got tainted options.

If workers hold discounted options, the company intends to offer to reprice them so that workers can avoid a new 20 percent tax and interest on discounted options. In turn, it intends to pay bonuses to compensate workers for the lost discount. It also might consider paying tax penalties that workers incur. If workers exercised tainted options in 2006, the company intends to pay any additional taxes they incur.

Such payments are expected to cost the company about $30 million.

The company also will compensate employees who were unable to buy discounted stock in the employee stock purchase plan, or ESPP. The company had to suspend the ESPP last year because it was prohibited from issuing stock while it was behind in releasing up-to-date earnings information. KLA-Tencor began making such payments last year, and it decided Jan. 24 to continue doing so into 2007.

KLA also disclosed that the Department of Labor is examining its 401(k) plan in connection to the backdating, but a company spokeswoman declined to elaborate late Friday.

GM Accounting Issues Still Unresolved (WSJ)

By John D. Stoll

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

General Motors Corp. said late Friday it still isn't ready to say when it will resolve accounting issues that forced it to delay filing its fourth-quarter and full-year financial results for 2006.

Separately, shares of GM and Ford Motor Co. rose Friday after Deutsche Bank upgraded the auto giants' shares to "buy," citing optimism that the companies can win health-care-cost savings from the United Auto Workers union this fall. Shares of GM were up 6.5% to $36.01 in 4 p.m. composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange, while shares of Ford were at $8.73, up 2.1%, on the NYSE.

GM was originally scheduled to report preliminary fourth-quarter results Jan. 30 but announced two weeks ago that it would postpone the release. The company said it would provide further information on the progress of its financial reporting during the week of Feb. 5 and that it would submit its 10-k report with the Securities and Exchange Commission by the Mar. 1 deadline.

GM spokeswoman Renee-Rashid Merem said "it's still our intent to file by the due date." She said the company is still looking into various issues that forced the earnings delay.

The Detroit auto maker needs to review its accounting for previously disclosed deferred-tax liabilities that were overstated dating back to 2001 and for certain derivatives transactions and hedging activities. In addition, the company said it needed more time to finalize financial results and re-evaluate the value for GMAC Financial Services, the lending arm in which GM sold a majority stake last year.

Sallie Chairman Sold Shares Ahead Of Cuts (WP)

By Amit R. Paley, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131058

Sallie Mae Chairman Albert L. Lord sold $18.3 million worth of company stock last week, just days before the Bush administration unveiled a multibillion-dollar cut in subsidies to the lending industry that caused Sallie Mae shares to plummet.

Lord sold 400,000 shares of company stock Thursday, Feb. 1, and Friday, Feb. 2. The following Monday, after President Bush announced a budget that would cut subsidies to the student-lending industry by about $19 billion over five years, Sallie Mae's stock plunged about 9 percent, to $42.37 from $46.46, its lowest closing price in more than two years.

In a Securities and Exchange Commission filing that night, SLM Corp., as Sallie Mae is formally known, disclosed Lord's sale of the shares, which it said was done to fund unspecified personal projects.

Tom Joyce, a spokesman for Sallie Mae, said this week that Lord had planned to sell the shares for weeks and told the company about his plans to sell the stock, which represented about 29 percent of the Sallie Mae shares he owns outright, nine days before the sale.

Democrats in Congress have been calling for changes in student loan programs that would hurt Sallie Mae. The Reston-based student lending company has opposed the changes. But, Joyce said, Lord had no idea Bush would propose such huge rollbacks of lender subsidies. "Nobody had these cuts on their radar screen," he said. "The student lending community did not see this coming."

"I can understand that people are raising questions, but the timing was just completely coincidental," Joyce said. "He had been thinking of doing this for many weeks. He was watching the market and just elected to do it on Thursday and Friday."

If Lord had sold his shares at Monday's closing price of $42.37, he would have received about $1.4 million less. Lord sold the shares in a series of transactions over the two days at prices that ranged from $45.75 to $46.03.

"It certainly seems to raise some fairly significant questions," said Larry P. Ellsworth, a former lawyer with the SEC's trial unit. He said company executives generally cannot trade on potentially market-moving information if they receive the information in their official roles and it is not available to the public.

Lord, who was traveling yesterday and could not be reached for comment, did not act on such information, Joyce said.

William M. Diefenderfer III, chairman of the Sallie Mae board's audit committee, said Lord told the directors at the end of a meeting Jan. 25 that that he planned to sell up to $30 million worth of company stock. "Everybody said fine, and that was it," Diefenderfer said yesterday.

"Al is as honest as the day is long," Diefenderfer added. "If he knew the cuts were coming, he would not have sold."

Chad Colby, a spokesman for the Education Department, said some Capitol Hill staff members were briefed on the proposed budget last Thursday but that the suggested cuts were not shared with Sallie Mae officials before Monday's announcement.

There were signs that the White House would propose cutting subsidies for the lending industry in its budget, said Matt Snowling, an analyst at Arlington investment bank Friedman, Billings, Ramsey Group.

"We downgraded Sallie Mae about three or four weeks ago because we had heard that the administration was looking at cutting into lender subsidies," he said. "It's not completely a surprise to us, although it clearly was a surprise to a lot of investors."

The company's stock has been declining for months, though this week's drop was particularly precipitous.

The day after the president's budget and Lord's sale were disclosed, Sallie Mae stock closed at $41.96 per share, a 52-week low. The stock rebounded yesterday, closing at $42.55.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Trial Exposes White House Crisis Machine (AP)

By Pete Yost, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

David Addington, chief legal adviser to Vice President Dick Cheney, says he was taken aback when the White House started making public pronouncements about the CIA leak investigation.

In the fall of 2003, President Bush's press secretary was categorically denying that either Karl Rove or I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby was involved in exposing the identity of Valerie Plame, a CIA employee married to a critic of the war in Iraq.

"Why are you making these statements?" Addington asked White House communications director Dan Bartlett.

"Your boss is the one who wanted" them, Bartlett replied, referring to Cheney.

With that, "I shut up," Addington recalled recently for jurors in Libby's CIA leak trial, which begins its fourth week on Monday with Libby's lawyers calling their first witnesses.

So far, the testimony of Addington and other administration aides, along with documents and Libby's audiotaped grand jury testimony, have provided a rare glimpse of how the Bush White House scrambled to respond to a political crisis as it intersected a criminal investigation.

At the intersection was Cheney, along with Rove and Libby, who were working in the summer of 2003 to rebut claims by Plame's husband, former Ambassador Joseph Wilson, that Bush had misled the nation about prewar intelligence on Iraq.

The White House denials on behalf of Rove and Libby came just before Rove secretly began acknowledging to the FBI that he had confirmed Plame's identity for conservative columnist Bob Novak, who first published her name and relationship to Wilson.

About the same time, Libby came under suspicion because NBC News Washington bureau chief Tim Russert had talked to the FBI, contradicting Libby's version of a conversation between the two men that would become the heart of the perjury and obstruction charges against Libby.

Bush and Cheney made a common mistake in their public handling of the Plame affair, says presidential scholar and University of Texas government professor Bruce Buchanan, who has watched Bush's career since his days as Texas governor.

"They're in a high-stakes game of poker, the immediate pressure is political and the people in charge are political people," Buchanan said. "If there is a legal issue it will dawn, but by then someone is out on a limb."

Testimony and documents in the trial show Rove joining Cheney in trying to undercut Wilson's claim that the administration had twisted prewar intelligence to exaggerate the Iraqi threat.

"We're a day late in getting responses to the story," Rove told a staff meeting, according to Libby's notes.

"Get the full story out," Cheney told aides, according to Libby's grand jury testimony.

There were glitches in the leak campaign against Wilson.

New York Times reporter Judith Miller never wrote a story about it, even after Cheney persuaded Bush to declassify prewar intelligence so it could be shared with Miller. The intelligence report said Iraq was vigorously trying to acquire uranium from the African nation of Niger.

"It was a totally failed effort," Libby told the grand jury of his meetings with Miller.

But there were successes too.

Libby recalled asking Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz to reach out to The Wall Street Journal.

"I don't have as good a relationship with The Wall Street Journal as Secretary Wolfowitz did," Libby told the grand jury. "I talked to Secretary Wolfowitz about trying to get that point across, and he undertook to do so."

The Journal ran an editorial focusing on the theme Libby wanted. The editorial stated that the prewar intelligence the newspaper was describing had not come from the White House, "which to our mind has handled this story in a hamhanded fashion."

In the Libby trial, Bush comes across mostly as an interested observer.

According to Libby's notes, some of which surfaced at the trial, Bush expressed interest in a May 6, 2003 New York Times column critical of the administration and referencing an unnamed former ambassador, who turned out to be Wilson.

In questioning Libby before the grand jury, Special Counsel Patrick Fitzgerald juxtaposed Bush's public statements condemning leakers and Libby's contacts with reporters, some of whom have testified against him.

"Were you at all concerned that while the president was stating that there's no White House involvement in any leaks whatsoever, that you were one of the people who may have been referred to" in press reports about possible White House leakers? asked Fitzgerald.

In the grand jury recordings, the prosecutor also asked Libby about his interaction with Rove a few days before Novak exposed Plame's CIA identity. Libby said Rove "was animated that Novak was animated about this." Libby added that Rove "thought it was a good thing that somebody was writing about" Wilson and his wife.

Cheney told Libby early in the effort to deal with Wilson that his wife worked at the CIA. And while the Cheney-Libby team worked in lockstep attacking Wilson in July 2003, Libby said he faced a somewhat distant vice president when the affair came under investigation, first by the Justice Department, then by Fitzgerald.

Regarding his discussions with reporters about Wilson's wife, "I would have been happy to unburden myself" to Cheney, Libby told the grand jury, but "he didn't want to hear it."

Taking The Bait On A Phish Scam (WP)

By Annys Shin, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

Job Seekers Are Targets, Victims of Sophisticated Ploy

DOJ_NMG_0131060

The online news site USA Voice isn't going to win any kudos from media critics. Not for its top story Monday, "Super Bowl Ads Don't Live Up to the Hype." And not for its Fox News-style slogan, "USA Voice: Honest and Unfiltered."

As a phishing scheme, however, privacy experts say it's a winner.

The Web site for the "world's fastest growing news organization" looked good enough to fool Katherine Brinton, an aspiring journalist in Philadelphia. After posting her r?sum? on Monster.com nine months ago, the 23-year old received an e-mail from USA Voice in November that said it was looking for reporters with "excellent writing skills" and an "innate ability to find the truth."

Brinton filled out an online application with her name, address and telephone number. But instead of job offers, she began receiving a stream of unsolicited e-mails hawking Viagra, payday loans and penny stocks.

"I felt like I was being scammed," she said.

Brinton fell victim to a sophisticated phishing scam, which, in recent months, targeted thousands of job seekers on such popular Web sites as Monster.com and CareerBuilder.com. Phishers send out seemingly legitimate e-mail in an attempt to get people to reply with personal information then used in a variety of scams.

Since June, the Better Business Bureau serving Metro Washington has logged more than 8,000 inquiries about USA Voice and a related entity, Instant Human Resources. USA Voice lists a downtown Washington address; Instant Human Resources lists an address in Rockville. Both locations turned out to be a service that forwards mail for other businesses. Instant Human Resources' parent company, Internet Solutions, says it is based in Orlando.

The Better Business Bureau has received 20 complaints about the three companies, and all share similarities. USA Voice, Instant Human Resources and Internet Solutions advertised such positions as "gossip reporter," "IT assistant" and "quality control administrator" on employment sites such as Monster, CareerBuilder and Yahoo HotJobs, and contacted people who had posted r?sum?s there. But after being enticed to give up personal information, job seekers never heard from the companies again and instead began getting inundated with spam.

"These firms purport to provide employment opportunities. Consumers allege that the only thing they have received is bulk unsolicited e-mail. Based on this, it would appear that the given companies are . . . a scheme to amass and sell personal contact information," said Edward J. Johnson III, chief executive of the Better Business Bureau of Washington.

None of the companies responded to Better Business Bureau inquiries. They also did not respond to a reporter's e-mails or to notes left in their Washington-area mailboxes.

In 2006, about 109 million U.S. adults received phishing e-mails, up from 57 million in 2004, according to research firm Gartner, of Stamford, Conn. About one in six phishing e-mails are opened -- a better rate than for e-mails from legitimate businesses, said Jeff Wilbur, vice president of marketing for e-mail security firm Iconix.

The majority of phishing e-mails claim to be from financial institutions, but phishers have also switched to mimicking dating, social networking and other kinds of online services. In those cases, victims might let their guard down because they are not giving out financial information, Wilbur said. But such attacks can leave them just as vulnerable to identity theft.

"Sometimes these phishing attacks look innocent because you're not giving up what you consider huge personal information. But it might be the final piece of the puzzle of the information they have on you," Wilbur said.

Job search sites offer identity thieves a rich source of personal information and a pool of potential victims willing to divulge even more in hopes of landing employment. Since 2004, some of the largest online job search firms, such as Monster and CareerBuilder, have taken more precautions against criminals looking to collect personal information from their users.

Privacy experts say the job sites could do more to weed out fraudulent ads. "People, when looking for work, are at their most vulnerable. Job sites owe it to consumers to take that extra step to make sure these scams don't slip through the net," said Pam Dixon, executive director of the World Privacy Forum, a nonprofit research and consumer group.

Spokespeople for Monster, CareerBuilder, and Yahoo said they include warnings about fraud on their sites, screen employment listings and employer Web sites and monitor job postings daily.

CareerBuilder removed job ads by USA Voice eight months ago, said spokeswoman Jennifer Sullivan. Monster removed ads by USA Voice and Instant Human Resources in December and ads by Internet Solutions last week, said spokeswoman Danielle Perry. Yahoo removed ads from Internet Solutions last week.

Privacy experts and security officials at the job sites agreed that the three Web sites in question are "particularly clever" and "very slick." Internet Solutions, for example, requires users to create a password. Dixon said this was probably a ploy to collect access codes for online bank and e-commerce accounts. Most people use the same password for everything, security experts said, and criminals know that.

USA Voice's victims were persuaded to harvest personal information from others. After posting her r?sum? on CareerBuilder, Emma Ward of Collegeville, Pa., was contacted by e-mail by USA Voice. The 24-year-old was told she qualified to be an editor and was responsible for recruiting her own writers. She just had to collect and send their e-mail addresses to the company. The writers, in turn, would be paid by the number of hits their stories received, giving them incentive to direct more people to the USA Voice site.

Ward never got around to recruiting anyone. She stopped hearing from USA Voice and started receiving spam.

Job seekers got offers, but not for legitimate employment. Instant Human Resources told Michael Coleman of Bronxville, N.Y., after seeing his r?sum? on Monster or CareerBuilder, that he could be the U.S. representative for an overseas firm. The 34-year-old Web project manager signed onto the Instant Human Resources' Web site, which required him to enter his name, address, phone number, and Social Security number and create a password.

Coleman followed the instructions but entered a fake Social Security number. The job, he said, "didn't sound right." He didn't pursue it any further after online research confirmed his suspicions: The position sounded like a scam involving cashing old money orders.

"For anyone looking for a job, it's a tough economy," Coleman said. "You don't want to go to a site and see some scam."

California: Elie Wiesel Is Attacked (NYT)

By Jesse Mckinley

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

Elie Wiesel, the Holocaust survivor, author and winner of the Nobel Peace Prize, was attacked at a San Francisco hotel last week by an unknown assailant, the police said yesterday. Sgt. Neville Gittens, a police spokesman, said Mr. Wiesel, 78, was attending a conference when a man approached him in an elevator and asked to interview him. After a brief discussion, the man dragged Mr. Wiesel off the elevator and tried to restrain him, but Mr. Wiesel screamed, and the attacker fled. Mr. Wiesel was not injured. No arrests were made, though Sergeant Gittens said the police had a “person of interest” in the case. The Associated Press reported that a Holocaust denier calling himself Eric Hunt had claimed credit on an anti-Semitic Web site for accosting Mr. Wiesel, but the police could not confirm whether he was the suspect.

Elie Wiesel Accosted At Peace Conference (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO, California (AP) -- Nobel laureate and Holocaust scholar Elie Wiesel was dragged from an elevator and roughed up during a peace conference at a San Francisco hotel last week, police said Friday. The author was not injured.

The assailant approached Wiesel in an elevator February 1 at the Argent Hotel and requested an interview, police Sgt. Neville Gittens said.

When Wiesel consented to talk in the hotel's lobby, the man insisted it be done in a hotel room and dragged the 78-year-old off the elevator on the sixth floor, Gittens said.

The assailant fled after Wiesel began to scream, and Wiesel went to the lobby and called police.

Gittens said police are investigating the incident as a crime. He said investigators were aware of a posting at an anti-Semitic Web site in which a man claimed responsibility for the attack, but declined to comment further.

Wiesel couldn't be immediately reached for comment at Boston University, where he teaches, or through his institute in New York.

Wiesel, who survived the Nazi death camps at Auschwitz and Buchenwald during World War II, has worked for human rights in many parts of the world and was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 1986.

California: Sex Offender Law Not Retroactive (AP)

By The Associated Press

AP, February 10, 2007

A federal judge ruled that a voter-approved restriction on where sex offenders can live could not be applied retroactively, potentially freeing thousands of parolees from a ban on living within 2,000 feet of a school or other place where children gather.

The judge, Lawrence K. Karlton of Federal District Court, said there was nothing in the law, Proposition 83, that specified its provisions were to be applied retroactively.

The proposition, known as Jessica’s Law, was approved Nov. 7 by 70.5 percent of voters and took effect the next day. It also increases prison terms for sex offenders and requires lifetime satellite tracking of rapists and other felony sex criminals after their release from prison.

Coca-Cola Spy Goes To Jail After Apartment Fire, Judge Doesn't Wait Until Her May 23 Sentencing To Put (AJC)

By Duane D. Stanford, The Atlanta Journal-constitution

The Atlanta Journal-Constitution, February 10, 2007

A federal judge ordered ex-Coke secretary Joya Williams to jail Friday, saying she had an "utter disregard for the law."

Williams, who faces 10 years in prison for trying to sell Coke trade secrets to Pepsi, has been free on a $3,000 bond since her conviction Feb. 2. She will be sentenced May 23.

But prosecutors this week asked Judge J. Owen Forrester to revoke the bond following a fire at Williams' apartment that started within an hour of a jury finding her guilty last week.

Assistant U.S. Attorney BJay Pak told Forrester during a hearing Friday that Williams, 41, admitted being "high as a kite" on Vicks cough medicine as the jury read the guilty verdict last week. Pak said she had drunk an entire bottle of the medication.

Jurors convicted Williams under the federal Corporate Espionage Act of trying to sell confidential Coke documents and sample test products for $1.5 million to an undercover FBI agent posing as a Pepsi go-between.

After the verdict, Williams drove home to her apartment in Norcross, which burned down a short time later. Gwinnett investigators have ruled the fire an accident, but Pak told the judge that Williams has made conflicting statements about how the fire started.

Williams first told fire investigators she saw the fire when she drove up to the apartment building, Pak said. Then she told them she opened her apartment door and saw smoke. On Monday, Williams told investigators she lit candles to stay warm and that the candles caused the blaze that displaced nine families, Pak said.

"In stressful situations, she's prone to act like this in an unpredictable behavior," Pak said. "I'm not clearly convinced if she drives out of the courthouse today she's not capable of making irrational decisions that put the public at risk."

Pak said the stiff sentence Williams faces also could prompt her to flee. He also was concerned about the fact that she had no place to live and no job.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, said there was no evidence Williams set the apartment fire on purpose. Singer asked the judge to put Williams on electronic monitoring and argued she had a strong support system.

Williams' parents, George and Karen Williams, each testified that they were willing to take Williams into their home in Rex until her sentencing.

"I'll do whatever is necessary," George Williams told the judge.

"She will eat when I eat. She will have a place to sleep when I have a place to sleep."

Several among the two dozen friends, family and church members who attended the hearing Friday testified she was not a danger.

The judge disagreed and told U.S. marshals to take Williams into custody.

"These hearings are never pleasant," the judge said. "This is federal court. In federal court, we don't play."

Forrester said he was swayed by the fact that Williams "showed absolutely no regard for the truth" at trial and an "utter disregard for the law" in general.

"She attacked Mr. Pak and accused him of manipulating the evidence," Forrester said of Williams' often-defiant testimony during her two-week trial.

Forrester said Williams' conflicting statements about the fire could be construed under federal law as "guilty knowledge." He said he was skeptical of Williams' explanation that she lit candles in the middle of the day to keep warm.

Forrester also said he was concerned about threatening text messages Williams sent to a government witness prior to trial. In one of the messages, Williams told the witness, a former boyfriend, "I will pay u back."

Prosecutors said Williams sent the message after the witness resisted her attempts to influence his testimony.

"You just can't do anything more serious than that," Forrester said after reading the series of text messages aloud. "I think you are a danger."

Williams showed no emotion as she was taken into custody Friday. She removed a hair clip and was led away. Her parents were somber as they watched their daughter slip away behind a door.

In the hallway outside court, Williams' family and friends hugged her parents. Someone hummed a hymn.

All declined to comment, as did Singer, Williams' attorney.

Williams' plot was exposed last year after Pepsi executives received a solicitation and turned it over to Coke executives, who called the FBI.

Two accomplices, Ibrahim Dimson of New York and Edmund Duhaney of Decatur, pleaded guilty in October and also will be sentenced in May.

At trial, Williams said she took documents from Coke because she was behind on her work. She then tried to convince jurors that Dimson and Duhaney stole the documents and product samples from her apartment and masterminded the scheme behind her back.

Coke Thief Jailed As Flight Risk (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

ATLANTA — A former Coca-Cola secretary who was convicted of conspiring to steal trade secrets from the beverage giant was ordered to jail Friday over concerns that she could be a flight risk.

U.S. District Judge J. Owen Forrester told Joya Williams that her behavior since her arrest in July has showed that she "would do anything to avoid going to jail."

"You have utter disregard for the law," Forrester said during the two-hour hearing in federal court. "I could not trust you on your word."

Williams, 41, who had been free on bond pending sentencing, was immediately taken into custody.

She faces up to 10 years in prison for conspiring to steal trade secrets from

Atlanta-based Coca-Cola Co. and sell them to rival PepsiCo. Inc. The sentencing for Williams and two co-defendants who pleaded guilty to conspiracy — Ibrahim Dimson and Edmund Duhaney — is set for May 23.

Federal prosecutors filed papers Tuesday asking for the immediate jailing of Williams after investigators found clothing, prescription medication, papers and other personal items in her Mustang following a fire that destroyed her apartment at Hunter's Pointe Apartments in Norcross a week ago.

The fire, which was ruled accidental, occurred nearly 90 minutes after Williams was found guilty in federal court in Atlanta. Ten units, including one that was vacant, were destroyed by the blaze.

Gwinnett County fire investigators found a lit candle ignited some bedroom curtains in apartment No. 1009, which is Williams' listed address. Gwinnett officials said they could not confirm the name of the apartment's occupants.

U.S. Attorney Byung J. Pak said that Williams told fire investigators that she was "high as a kite" from mixing prescription medications with an entire bottle of cough medicine before the verdict last week. Pak said Williams also lied to fire investigators several times about her whereabouts when the fire started.

He also pointed to threatening text messages Williams sent to her former boyfriend Sedrick Wilson after he declined her requests that he lie on the witness stand.

"In stressful situations, she is proven to act unpredictably," Pak told the judge.

Williams' attorney, Janice Singer, called the government's claim that her client is a risk to the community and a risk of flight "more than offensive."

"She has met all of the conditions of her bond," Singer told the judge.

She pointed to witness testimony that Williams' car was "junky" and always full of clothing and other items. She said Williams had no intention of fleeing after the fire because she left her keys and cell phone in her apartment.

Singer declined further comment after the hearing.

Given A Fine, Hevesi Praises His Successor (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

ALBANY, Feb. 9 — The former state comptroller, Alan G. Hevesi, praised his replacement on Friday, after a hearing at which a judge sentenced him to pay a $5,000 fine for his use of state employees to chauffeur his wife.

The State Legislature voted on Wednesday to appoint Thomas P. DiNapoli, an assemblyman from Nassau County, as the new comptroller, two months after Mr. Hevesi resigned as part of a plea deal with the Albany County district attorney, P. David Soares.

Speaking after his courtroom appearance, Mr. Hevesi praised Mr. DiNapoli, whom Gov. Eliot Spitzer has criticized as unqualified.

"He's a very smart public official, and I think he will make an excellent comptroller," Mr. Hevesi said.

Before resigning last year, Mr. Hevesi agreed to plead guilty to a felony charge of defrauding the government and to submit a DNA sample for the state's criminal database.

In delivering the sentence, Judge Stephen W. Herrick described Mr. Hevesi's actions as "unexplainable and totally unacceptable," but cited Mr. Hevesi's decades of public service, cooperation with the investigation and agreement to leave politics as reasons for the mild sentence.

"Your fall from grace here has been total and from a very great height," Judge Herrick said. Mr. Hevesi served for more than two decades in the Assembly and later as New York City comptroller before he won election to the state comptroller's job in 2002.

In accepting the sentence, Mr. Hevesi apologized to his family, to voters and to his former office staff, saying he took full and sole responsibility for his actions. "I'm culpable, I'm responsible, and I apologize," he said, before a courtroom filled mostly with reporters.

But Mr. Hevesi's lawyer, Joel Cohen, was less meek. Before Mr. Hevesi's statement of regret, Mr. Cohen delivered what amounted to a defense of his client. Conceding that Mr. Hevesi's "judgment eluded him," he nevertheless criticized the press for describing Mr. Hevesi as "disgraced." He also hinted that Mr. Soares had been overly eager for publicity, saying that the district attorney "is now very well known."

Leaving the courthouse, Mr. Hevesi said he had not decided what to do next.

"I was waiting for today to decide what to do with the rest of my life," he said.

Jury Votes Against Execution In Trial Of Drug Dealer Convicted In 2 Killings (NYT)

By William K. Rashbaum

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

A notorious street-corner crack kingpin with ties to the rap music industry was spared the death penalty yesterday in federal court in Brooklyn when a jury failed to reach a unanimous verdict to execute him for ordering the killing of two rivals.

The jury's action will result in a sentence of life without the possibility of release for the convicted drug dealer, Kenneth McGriff, 46, who was known as Supreme and whose drug crew, the Supreme Team, held sway on the streets of southeast Queens in the 1980s.

After the panel delivered its verdict and the jurors were ushered from the courtroom, Mr. McGriff's tearful brother apologized to the families of the two murdered men. In the courtroom's gallery, he embraced the aunt of Troy Singleton, one of his brother's two victims, saying, "So sorry, so sorry."

Moments later, the aunt, Rita Williams, with tears in her eyes, hugged each of the three prosecutors in the case, reaching over the balustrade that separates the gallery from the well of the courtroom.

She also hugged and kissed the two New York Police Department detectives who had been investigating the killings since 2001. One of the detectives, Anthony Castiglia, who retired last year, whispered to her, "It's over now."

Last week, after the same anonymous jury found Mr. McGriff guilty of ordering the murders, Mr. Singleton's mother, Bessie Singleton, and Karen Cameron, the mother of Mr. McGriff's other victim, Eric Smith, said they would be uncomfortable with a death sentence.

All the jurors, who were questioned by the judge before being selected to serve on the case, had said they were willing to sentence the defendant to death if the evidence warranted it. On the verdict sheet, the jury noted that "execution would not be an option" if the case had been tried in state court.

One of Mr. McGriff's lawyers, David A. Ruhnke, who defended the case with Jean Barrett, said his client was relieved by the jury's action.

"And we feel relieved to have gotten to death's door and not had it open," he said.

He contended that the case should never have been prosecuted in federal court and suggested that the government's decision to seek the death penalty was inappropriate.

"The chances of securing the death penalty in this case were almost zero from the beginning," he said. "The rest of the country is falling out of love with the death penalty, and the Bush administration is still in the infatuation stage."

Robert Nardoza, a spokesman for the United States attorney in Brooklyn, Roslynn R. Mauskopf, whose office prosecuted the case, would not directly address Mr. Ruhnke's comments, saying only, "The decision to impose the death penalty is solely within the province of the jury, and we respect their decision."

As the jury delivered its verdict in United States District Court in Brooklyn, with the forewoman responding to the clerk's questions on the lengthy verdict sheet, Mr. McGriff appeared impassive. He leaned his chin on his hand, stroked his goatee and pushed his glasses up the bridge of his nose.

Mr. McGriff was convicted on Feb. 1 of ordering the two 2001 murders and a range of other crimes.

The verdict in the penalty phase, which the jury returned after deliberating for about three and a half hours, came two weeks after the judge in the case, Frederic Block, called the government's effort to seek the death penalty "absurd" and a waste of taxpayers' money. In unusually blunt language, he urged the prosecutors, outside the presence of the jury, to forward his remarks to their Justice Department superiors in Washington and to ask them to abandon the endeavor.

Yesterday, as he was being led from the courtroom, Mr. McGriff, who had always behaved courteously during the lengthy investigation, the detectives have said, nodded at Mr. Castiglia's partner, William Courtney, who nodded back.

NYC Drug Lord Spared Death Penalty (AP)

By Larry Mcshane, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-A remorseless drug lord with ties to hip hop and Hollywood was spared the death penalty Friday by a jury that instead sentenced him to life in prison without parole for having two rivals killed.

Kenneth "Supreme" McGriff, 46, who had listened calmly as federal prosecutors called for his death, showed no reaction as the jury announced he would not receive a lethal injection.

Jurors, who deliberated just over 2 1/2 hours on the sentence, convicted him last week of paying $50,000 for the 2001 killings of an obscure rapper named Eric "E-Money Bags" Smith and Troy Singleton.

Prosecutors said Smith was killed for his fatal 1999 shooting of a McGriff associate, while Singleton was targeted because McGriff felt he might retaliate on Smith's behalf.

McGriff was the founder of the Supreme Crew, a brutal drug gang that operated in Queens during the 1980s. At its peak, the Supreme Team's network of dealers was making $200,000 a day, authorities said.

After McGriff did prison time on a drug conviction, he was released in 1997 and aligned himself with neighborhood friend and music mogul Irv "Gotti" Lorenzo. Defense attorneys claimed this was part of McGriff's plan to create movies and music.

The one-time street thugs produced one film, "Crime Partners 2000," a straight to video affair that featured rappers Ja Rule, Snoop Dogg and Ice-T.

Prosecutors said McGriff returned to the drug business in New York and Baltimore. Lorenzo and his brother, Chris, were indicted with McGriff but acquitted at a separate trial of using their label Murder Inc. to launder $1 million in drug money.

After Smith's slaying in a hail of gunfire, McGriff text messaged a friend: "You missed the party."

McGriff also was convicted of drug dealing but acquitted of lesser drug and weapons charges.

DISTRICT BRIEFING (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

COURTS

Conviction of Former Detective Overturned

By a 7 to 5 vote, a federal appeals court yesterday overturned the conviction of a former D.C. police detective arrested in an FBI sting.

Nelson Valdes was convicted in October 2002 of three counts of receiving illegal gratuities. Prosecutors said he passed along information from restricted law enforcement databases to an FBI informant who paid him $450. Valdes provided the informant with names and addresses in March 2001 to match four license plates and checked on warrants on another person, prosecutors said.

Valdes was tried for bribery, and the jury in U.S. District Court returned guilty verdicts on the gratuities charge, a lesser offense.

A three-judge panel of the U.S. Court of Appeals reversed the conviction a year ago, ruling in a 2 to 1 decision that the gratuities charge -- which bars seeking or accepting gratuities "for or because of any official act" -- did not apply to Valdes's conduct in the case.

Acting en banc, or as a full appellate court, the court ruled yesterday that the conviction must be overturned. The majority found that Valdes's actions did not constitute an "official act" under the law. Valdes's queries, the judges said, were not used to launch a police investigation, action or decision.

The dissenters said that such a strict interpretation will harm the ability to conduct stings of corrupt public officials.

Valdes has faced other trouble: He was indicted in 2001 on two counts of cocaine distribution. He was acquitted of those charges after a month-long trial in 2002.

Douglas Development Official Pleads Guilty

The chief financial officer for one of Washington's most prominent development companies pleaded guilty Thursday to tax evasion, the U.S. attorney's office said.

John E. Brownell, 45, is the third top official from Douglas Development Corp. to be found guilty of felony charges. Prosecutors said Douglas Development made payments to a credit-line account to disguise compensation for Brownell, and he received other unreported income through various financial maneuverings.

A jury convicted Douglas Jemal, president and owner of Douglas Development, of wire fraud in the fall but acquitted him of more serious bribery and conspiracy charges.

Blake Esherick, the company's vice president, was convicted by the same jury of wire fraud and two counts of tax evasion.

Jemal and Esherick are awaiting sentencing.

Brownell, of Rockville, is to be sentenced June 7 by U.S. District Judge Ricardo M. Urbina.

Sex Probe Targets Inglewood Officers (LAT)

By Ashley Surdin And Greg Krikorian, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

The department is looking into allegations of massage parlor visits.

At least six current or former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex with female employees of massage parlors and other adult businesses that have been the target of a high-profile law enforcement crackdown.

The internal affairs investigation by the Inglewood Police Department began after federal authorities launched an investigation of money laundering and prostitution involving women smuggled into Los Angeles from Asia.

That probe, which resulted in charges against more than two dozen people, led to allegations that Inglewood officers engaged in the sexual liaisons — sometimes in uniform — during work hours and off duty, according to several local and federal sources familiar with the case.

Evidence seized by federal agents and local investigators included "very detailed ledgers" that suggested Inglewood officers were receiving sexual favors at the businesses without paying, according to one source close to the investigation.

The ledgers, the source said, had the names of customers and the amounts they paid except when the customers were police officers. In those cases the women allegedly entered a symbol.

Word of the inquiry comes less than two months after the FBI confirmed that it was investigating two Inglewood police officers in the alleged rape of a woman they stopped on suspicion of prostitution. The woman's attorney said this week that he has filed a claim against the city and is awaiting an answer from authorities on whether the two officers have been arrested or charged.

Though he and other city officials would not disclose details about the new inquiry, Inglewood Councilman Ralph L. Franklin said it was aimed at determining whether the alleged sexual misconduct involved a large number of officers over an extended period of time. He said the FBI was assisting police in the investigation.

Franklin also said the department was trying to determine if any ranking officers in the department were involved in collusion with the officers suspected of misconduct.

Numerous law enforcement officials and city leaders said the Inglewood Police Department's internal affairs unit will ultimately recommend whether any officers should face criminal charges.

To date, sources say, none of the officers has been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments.

The internal affairs investigation began more than a year ago when several Inglewood massage parlors and tanning salons were the focus of federal allegations of money laundering and prostitution. To date, 18 people have pleaded guilty in that investigation, and four others — including the alleged owner of the brothels, Kimberly Mao — are awaiting trial.

Mao has pleaded not guilty to the federal charges and has repeatedly denied involvement in prostitution or money laundering.

But last week, in a group interview organized by Mao, a dozen women who worked for her at the businesses told The Times that they had seen or heard of officers coming into the massage parlors and sometimes demanding sexual services.

The women, who denied they were prostitutes, recalled several specific incidents, including one in which officers donned masks to hide their identities and pointed guns at employees. Another employee told The Times that an older officer exposed himself in an unsuccessful effort to have her engage in sex with him.

Sources familiar with the misconduct allegations said that federal authorities, including the U.S. attorney's office and the Immigration and Customs Enforcement agency, began hearing about the alleged involvement of police officers last year.

But Assistant U.S. Atty. Carmen Luege, who is prosecuting Mao and her co-defendants, said she was not aware of any federal probe of the Inglewood officers.

Customs agency spokeswoman Virginia Kice declined to comment other than to say that if the agency uncovered evidence of misconduct or criminal activity by other law enforcement officers, it would refer the matter to the appropriate law enforcement agency for investigation. Given the nature of the allegations, that agency would probably be the FBI. An FBI spokeswoman said she could not confirm nor deny that an expanded investigation was underway.

Inglewood Mayor Roosevelt Dorn would not address specific questions about the investigation other than to say no officers have been fired and that he was confident the department would do a thorough job investigating the alleged misconduct.

"They are on top of it and doing their due diligence," Dorn said. "They are doing what you would expect our police force to do. You have to be very careful when you're doing this type of investigation. You don't want to ruin anyone's career or create problems with families without having actual proof and proof that would stand up in a court of law."

Inglewood interim Police Chief J. I. Davis, who took over the department after the investigation was underway, would only say that his agency was actively pursuing a "difficult and sensitive" inquiry.

Inglewood, a working-class city of 112,000, has long struggled with prostitution problems. Because of its proximity to Los Angeles International Airport, Inglewood has numerous hotels lining its main commercial streets.

The investigation comes as the department, the seventh-largest police agency in the county, struggles to fill two dozen vacancies in its 213-officer force.

At a town hall meeting Thursday night, police commanders said they were doing everything possible to fill the positions, and many citizens applauded the efforts to increase the size of the force.

During the meeting, police officials said a top priority has been to combat prostitution in the city by dramatically reducing the number of massage parlors that could serve as fronts for sexual encounters. Since 2004, the department's efforts have cut the number of massage parlors from 23 to seven, a police official told the town hall meeting. There was no mention of the internal investigation.

Since that investigation began, Inglewood police as well as the FBI have begun a separate inquiry into the alleged rape of a Florida woman who was stopped by two patrol officers on suspicion of prostitution.

In that incident, which is also under investigation by the Los Angeles County district attorney's office, a 23-year-old woman alleged that the officers confronted her on Century Boulevard on a Sunday night as she left her hotel to have dinner at a fast-food restaurant. The thoroughfare has pockets that have long been known for prostitution.

The woman, who has said she was in town with her boyfriend to visit her mother for the holidays, alleged that the officers accused her of being a prostitute and demanded that she take them back to her hotel to prove she was not a streetwalker.

At the hotel, according to her attorney, the night manager verified that the woman was from Florida and a registered guest at the hotel. But one officer insisted that she take him to her room while the other officer waited by the patrol car, attorney Dylan Pollard said.

It was there, the woman has said, that she was raped.

Inglewood Officers Suspected Of Having Sex At Massage Parlors (SDUT/AP)

The San Diego Union-Tribune, February 10, 2007

INGLEWOOD – As many as six current and former Inglewood police officers are under investigation for allegedly having sex at massage parlors and other adult businesses targeted in a recent crackdown.

The police department became aware of the allegations after federal agents began investigating Asian women being smuggled into Los Angeles, according to Saturday's Los Angeles Times.

Evidence includes “very detailed ledgers” that indicate officers were given sexual favors without paying, one source told the newspaper.

None of the officers under investigation have been fired, though some have retired or left the city for other departments, sources told the newspaper.

In the prostitution and money-laundering investigation involving massage parlors and tanning salons, 18 people have pleaded guilty to federal charges, and four others are awaiting trial.

Man Faces Fraud Charges Related To Hurricane Relief (TEXGAZ)

By Lynn LaRowe, Texarkana Gazette

Texarkana (TX) Gazette, February 10, 2007

A Texarkana man has been indicted by a federal grand jury in Texas in a fraud case related to hurricane relief in the Eastern District of Texas.

Gary Williams Trice, 36, has been charged with mail fraud after he allegedly illegally acquired $36,000 in FEMA hurricane assistance money. Trice is alleged to have submitted as many as 14 fraudulent applications for assistance based on hurricanes Katrina, Rita and Wilma by using different names, addresses and Social Security numbers.

The investigation was conducted jointly by the United States Department of Labor's Office of the Inspector General, the United States Postal Service and the Department of Homeland Security.

"Hurricane-related fraud remains a priority of the Department of Justice," said United States Attorney Matthew Orwig in a press release issued this week. "Applications for assistance are continuing to be reviewed and any appearances of fraud will be thoroughly investigated."

The Hurricane Katrina Fraud Task Force was created by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales in September 2005 to deter, investigate and prosecute disaster-related federal crimes such as charity fraud, identity theft, procurement fraud and insurance fraud.

The case is being prosecuted by Special Assistant United States Attorney Denise Simpson in Tyler, Texas.

If convicted, Trice faces up to 20 years in federal prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

Death Penalty Bears Down On O'Malley, Kaine (WP)

By John Wagner, Tim Craig

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The governors of Maryland and Virginia have much in common: Both Martin O'Malley and Timothy M. Kaine are considered rising stars in the Democratic Party. Both grappled with violent crime as big-city mayors and have wives who have served as judges. And both are practicing Catholics who have voiced personal opposition to the death penalty.

Now they share something else: Both face decisions on that divisive issue that will be watched closely in their states and beyond.

O'Malley, who was sworn in last month, has pledged to work with lawmakers to repeal Maryland's death penalty -- and could effectively halt executions through the end of his tenure even without their support, given a recent court ruling.

Kaine, who was sworn in last year, presides over a state where executions are far more frequent. He soon could have to decide whether to sign bills to expand capital punishment in Virginia.

With Maryland lawmakers preparing to debate the death penalty in coming weeks, O'Malley said in an interview yesterday that his office has started researching the amount of money that the state has spent prosecuting such cases.

"I think the facts are on the side of those who say this is neither a deterrent nor is it cost-effective and in fact we may be wasting dollars that could be spent saving lives," O'Malley said.

Kaine, who has allowed four executions to proceed, would not say in a recent interview what he would do when the anticipated legislation reaches his desk, but he allowed that he does "not look at the expansion of the death penalty with a favorable eye."

"I would not say the problem in Virginia is that the death penalty is not applied enough," Kaine said.

The posture on both sides of the Potomac River -- and the openness of the governors on the issue -- is testament to the changing politics of the death penalty, analysts say.

"It wasn't long ago that if you were a Democrat and against the death penalty, you'd run a hundred miles from it," said Steve Jarding, a party strategist who gained prominence running Mark Warner's successful 2001 bid for Virginia governor. "It's still a polarizing issue, and you never want the polarizing issues to be the dominant ones. But the climate really has changed."

Although polls show that a majority of Americans support capital punishment, there is also evidence of growing unease about executions. That may make O'Malley's and Kaine's views less of a political liability than they would have been in years past.

Nationally, the number of death sentences dropped last year to the lowest level since capital punishment was reinstated by the U.S. Supreme Court 30 years ago. Of the 38 states that allow capital punishment, only 14 carried it out last year.

A dozen states, including Maryland, have suspended executions amid questions about the use of lethal injection. And last month, a New Jersey commission recommended that the state abandon capital punishment altogether, an idea embraced by the state's Democratic governor, Jon S. Corzine.

Anita Dunn, a national Democratic consultant, said "a sea shift" started in 2000 when Illinois's Republican governor, George Ryan, imposed a moratorium after a series of cases in which people sentenced to death had been wrongly convicted.

Opposition to the death penalty "used to be used against Democrats to show they were out-of-touch liberals," said Dunn, whose recent clients included O'Malley's Democratic primary opponent, former Montgomery County Executive Douglas M. Duncan.

Dunn said using the death penalty against a Democrat like O'Malley would be difficult because the former Baltimore mayor "built his career as a crime fighter."

Unlike Kaine, who has called his Catholic faith the underpinning of his opposition to the death penalty, O'Malley has not cast his opposition in religious terms. "Certainly on an issue like this, there's absolutely a moral aspect to it," he said. "But there are good people on both sides of this debate."

During last year's campaign in Maryland, neither Duncan nor then-Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. (R) sought to use O'Malley's views on the death penalty against him, and the issue rarely came up. O'Malley offered his views when asked, but he did not make any promises about repealing the death penalty.

Aides say O'Malley likely would not have joined the debate so early in his term if not for a December court ruling that effectively halts executions until the state adopts new regulations on lethal injection. The ruling emboldened death penalty opponents, who introduced legislation last month that would replace the death penalty with life without parole.

Even with O'Malley's involvement, some supporters of a repeal are skeptical that it could survive a likely filibuster on the Senate floor -- if it gets that far.

"On the death penalty, I don't think people are persuadable or malleable," said Sen. Brian E. Frosh (D-Montgomery), chairman of the Judicial Proceedings Committee.

If the legislation fails, the short-term future of Maryland's death penalty is likely to rest squarely on O'Malley.

Under the court ruling, executions cannot resume until his administration drafts new regulations or until the legislature passes a bill allowing executions without new regulations. There is widespread speculation that O'Malley may decide not to put forward regulations, leaving a de facto moratorium in place as long as he is in office. He declined to discuss that prospect yesterday.

Capital punishment has also been a sensitive subject for Kaine, Virginia's first Catholic governor.

Since 1976, Virginia has put 98 people to death, second only to Texas, according to the Death Penalty Information Center. (Maryland has executed five.)

Kaine was dogged during his 2005 bid for governor about whether he would implement the state's ultimate punishment. In an interview a month before the election, he made it clear that he embraced the Catholic Church's teachings that the death penalty is inhumane. He referred to Pope John Paul II, who said in 1999 that the United States' use of the death penalty was "cruel and unnecessary."

But Kaine also sought to draw distinctions between his personal beliefs and the policy of the state, saying the law requires the governor to implement the death penalty unless there are extraordinary circumstances.

Virginia's Republican nominee for governor, Jerry W. Kilgore, then the attorney general, seized on Kaine's personal opposition, running an ad stating, "Tim Kaine says that Adolf Hitler doesn't qualify for the death penalty."

Even though a Washington Poll that year showed that 76 percent of Virginia voters favored capital punishment, many observers believe the ads backfired and helped Kaine win the election.

Kaine has continued to wrestle with the death penalty since taking office last January. In interviews, he said the hardest part of his job is having to decide whether to let an execution proceed.

But he has largely done what he campaigned on. Four times, he has said he found no "compelling reason" to overturn the decision of the jury and appellate courts. Kaine has so far spared one man, at least temporarily.

Kaine has also spoken out against a state policy that allows death row inmates to decide if they want to die by lethal injection or the electric chair.

Last summer, convicted killer Brandon W. Hedrick chose to die by electric chair, making national headlines.

Kaine will soon face another tough decision relating to the death penalty: The Virginia Senate and House, both dominated by law-and-order conservatives, have approved bills to expand the use of capital punishment by making accomplices and the killers of judges and court witnesses eligible for the penalty.

"It's like how many ways can you ban gay marriage?" Kaine said. "Virginia would like to do it nine times rather than eight times. The death penalty statute is kind of the same way. . . . I've got to be convinced there is a problem, and I've got to be convinced that the bill fixes a problem."

Catholic Lawmakers Oppose Death-penalty Repeal (WT)

By Tom Lobianco

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

ANNAPOLIS -- Key Catholic lawmakers in the General Assembly are splitting with major Catholic groups over an attempt to abolish the death penalty in Maryland.

"I know it's a little inconsistent, but I do feel [the death penalty] is a deterrent," said Sen. Norman R. Stone Jr., Baltimore County Democrat and a Catholic.

DOJ_NMG_0131070

"Maybe you don't reconcile it until you meet your maker," said Delegate Susan K. McComas, Harford County Republican and a Catholic who is a member of the House Judiciary Committee.

The Maryland Catholic Conference is supporting a bill to repeal the death penalty this session, but some of its strongest opposition is coming from Catholic lawmakers.

Mr. Stone will weigh the bill with 10 other members of the Senate Judicial Proceedings Committee, including Sen. Alex X. Mooney, Frederick County Republican and the committee's other Catholic.

Mr. Mooney, who supported a death penalty moratorium in 2003 and has been lobbied by death penalty opponents in past sessions, said he will oppose a repeal this session.

Two Baltimore Democrats proposed a repeal after a Maryland Court of Appeals ruling barred executions until the state develops a protocol for administering lethal injections.

Death penalty opponents received a boost when Gov. Martin O'Malley, a Democrat and Catholic, said he would sign a repeal if it reaches his desk.

"It helps give the legislation a head of steam we can build on," said Richard J. Dowling, executive director of the Maryland Catholic Conference.

Mr. Dowling said he is actively lobbying members of all faiths and remains optimistic that the repeal will move this year.

Mrs. McComas, a ranking minority member of the House Judiciary Committee that must vet the proposal, has spoken with Mr. Dowling about the death penalty, but said she remains steadfast in her support of capital punishment.

"To take that option off the table really tips the balance in favor of some very terrible people," she said.

Delegate Samuel I. Rosenberg, Baltimore Democrat and lead sponsor of the repeal legislation, said the issue is a "very high priority."

"We are working with every member to get the votes necessary to pass the [legislation]," he said.

While there might be enough support to move the repeal through the House, Senate Republicans said they have enough votes to kill the proposal in the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Of the 11 members on the Senate committee, six support the death penalty.

If the repeal passes, a pair of Catholic delegates said they will push to have a referendum vote to reinstate the death penalty.

Delegate Patrick L. McDonough, Baltimore County Republican and a Catholic, said he will work with Delegate Richard K. Impallaria, Baltimore County Republican and a Catholic, to reinstate the death penalty if it is repealed.

Backlog Of Healthcare Fraud Cases Tops 150 (FWST/COX)

By Julia Malone, Cox News Service

The Fort Worth Star-Telegram, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON - Federal prosecutors admitted having a backlog of more than 150 cases in which pharmaceutical companies are accused of defrauding federal and state healthcare programs, a Justice Department lawyer acknowledged to a congressional panel Friday.

Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, said his department has recovered $5.3 billion since 1999 from major drug manufacturers in a variety of kickback schemes and overcharges that defrauded Medicaid and Medicare.

But when asked by House Committee on Oversight Chairman Henry Waxman, D-Calif., why the government doesn't move faster on these cases to recoup even more taxpayer money, Tenpas said his office is short on lawyers and investigators.

"These are very complex cases," he said, adding that his office has not added new positions, despite estimates that the prescription drug fraud cases produce $15 in payments and penalties for every $1 spent on prosecution.

Patrick J. O'Connell, chief of a Medicaid task force for the Texas attorney general's office, said at the congressional hearing that his team of lawyers had more than paid its way by recovering $64.1 million from just four manufacturers that had overcharged the state and federal government for prescription drugs.

O'Connell, in an interview later, estimated that his office has collected more than $100 million from drug companies since his anti-fraud office was set up in 1999. Expenses for his task force, recently expanded to 10 lawyers, have added up to $5 million to $7 million, he said.

O'Connell said he has pursued claims against doctors, dentists and hospitals.

But whistle-blowers with inside knowledge about prescription drug companies have given them the biggest cases by far, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0131071

He recalled that one company had billed the government $21.40 for an inhaler that investigators later discovered had a real cost of $2.

James W. Moorman, president of the watchdog group Taxpayers Against Fraud, said, "Texas has by far the most successful Medicaid anti-fraud program" of the states.

However, Moorman said the federal government's effort has been "overwhelmed" by the fraud cases.

Waxman repeatedly raised concerns about the new prescription drug benefit, known as "Part D" for Medicare recipients.

The new program "is going to cost $1 trillion over 10 years -- $50 billion over this next year," Waxman said. "That program's got to be as ripe for fraud as any other."

Tenpas said officials at the Justice Department are "clearly concerned there could be fraud in that program" but added that after only one year of operation and not enough data "we don't have many conclusions yet."

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America issued a statement defending the industry.

Federal health programs that provide prescription drugs provide a "critical safety net for low-income patients, seniors and the disabled," the trade group said.

GAO Warns Of Medicare Drug Overcharging (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON --Federal law makers should consider doing more to ensure the government is not overcharged for prescription drugs, according to a government watch dog.

A director for the Government Accountability Office told members of Congress Friday that the Medicare drug benefit program is vulnerable to false billing schemes because it relies on private companies to report drug prices. Under the program, about 42 million eligible senior citizens can choose between thousands of prescription drug plans offered by health insurers that individually negotiate drug prices with manufacturers.

GAO's health care director John Dicken said the Medicare drug program's "complex set of relationships and transactions with private entities" makes it difficult to verify the accuracy of drug prices charged to the government. Dicken told members of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform that Medicare needs to have systems in place to spot inflated price reporting.

In 2006, plans offered by UnitedHealth Group and Humana had the highest enrollment numbers although the GAO report did not single out any companies or providers by names. Representatives from Humana and UnitedHealth were not able to provide immediate comment for this story.

The hearing comes nearly one month after Democrats in the House pushed through legislation that would require the government to negotiate Medicare drug prices directly with drug manufacturers. The bill is pending in the Senate but President Bush has promised to veto it, saying the current system is already reducing prices for seniors.

Last year one drug maker agreed to settle charges brought by state and federal prosecutors that it allegedly inflated prices of its products.

Last August, GlaxoSmithKline paid $41 million to settle claims by more than 40 state Medicaid programs. Several months earlier, the Justice Department opened a suit against Abbott Laboratories, alleging the company's billing schemes cost government health programs more than $175 million over 10 years. The case is currently pending in U.S. District Court of Massachusetts.

House Chairman Vows Probe Of Drugmaker `Profiteering' (BLOOM)

By Aliza Marcus

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Representative Henry Waxman pledged Congress will investigate a range of allegations that drugmakers are ``profiteering" by overcharging federal health programs.

``If even half of them are true, billions of federal dollars that should be buying needed care are instead adding to drug company profits," Waxman, Democratic chairman of the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, said at a hearing today on alleged fraud and abuse in drug pricing.

Democrats promised more aggressive oversight of government practices when they took control of Congress in January, and the hearing was an initial effort to apply such scrutiny to health- care costs.

The session at times turned into a debate over the Medicare drug plan for the elderly, which was designed three years ago when Republicans controlled Congress.

``Can you think of any other system that could be designed more expensive than the one designed by the Republicans?" Waxman of California said. He announced he has sent letters to health insurers and drug benefit managers demanding information about the prices they negotiated with drugmakers and how savings are being passed on to seniors enrolled in Medicare drug plans.

Republican Response

``I have to wonder if the goal is to harass'' the companies, said Tom Davis of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. Davis said he took the faster and easier route of asking the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, which collects the information. ``Let's see who gets their answer first.''

The House passed a bill in January that would require the federal government to negotiate with drugmakers for lower prices for Medicare. President George W. Bush has said he would veto the legislation if it passed the Senate in its current form.

Prices of medicines covered by the Medicare program, now in its second year, appear higher than those available at Costco warehouse stores or at Drugstore.com, Waxman said.

``Meanwhile, drug companies are reporting massive increases in their profits,'' he said.

The Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America, which represents drugmakers, said growth in spending on prescription medicine was at its lowest level in years.

``Many studies have also found that medicines help lower health-care costs because they help keep patients out of the hospital and help them avoid expensive emergency rooms visits,'' Ken Johnson, senior vice president, said in a statement.

$5.3 Billion Recovered

The Justice Department has recovered more than $5.3 billion related to pharmaceutical fraud in federal and state programs since 1999, Ronald J. Tenpas, associate deputy attorney general, told the committee.

``It is clear from our experience that drug company violations of the law are causing government health-care programs to pay too much for prescription drugs,'' Tenpas said in a statement submitted to the committee.

Witnesses at the hearing described a complicated system of drug pricing that made it easier for companies to commit fraud.

``Government agencies don't actually know what they are paying for drugs, said Gerard F. Anderson, director of the Center for Hospital Finance and Management at the Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health in Baltimore.

To protect against waste and fraud, prices should be compared among federal programs to find the best deals, Anderson said. The Department of Veterans Affairs, which negotiates for the drugs it provides, pays less than Medicare plans, he said.

Medicaid Allegations

Waxman cited allegations that the federal Medicaid program, which covers about 50 million low-income Americans and spent about $30 billion on drugs in 2005, has been ``repeatedly overcharged for essential medications.''

The price of drugs concerns many Americans, polls have shown.

``This entire issue of health-care policy, and particularly prescription drugs and drug prices, has been in Democrats' craw for at least six years,'' Dennis W. Johnson, a professor of political management at George Washington University in Washington, said in a telephone interview yesterday. ``Now that they are in the majority, this is something they are going to go after.''

Sailor, Family File $150M Claim Against Navy (NAVT)

By Chris Amos, Staff writer

Navy Times, February 10, 2007

ET3 says malpractice at Jacksonville hospital caused baby's brain damage

A Navy family has filed a claim against the Navy for $150 million, alleging that malpractice by Naval Hospital Jacksonville doctors and staff caused their newborn son to suffer severe brain damage that has left him unable to walk, talk or see.

Sean Cronin, a civilian lawyer representing Electronics Technician 3rd Class Joseph Alcorn and his wife, Kendra, said injuries to their son Gavin, the second child born during a twin pregnancy, were caused when he did not receive enough oxygen during delivery in May 2005.

Cronin said hospital records show that Gavin's limbs were blue and that he was not breathing when he was delivered about an hour after his sister.

Gavin's sister had unrelated complications during delivery but has since recovered.

Shortly after delivery, Gavin was transferred to a civilian hospital in Jacksonville, where doctors used an MRI to determine that he suffered brain damage during delivery, Cronin said.

Capt. Raquel Bono, commanding officer of Naval Hospital Jacksonville, said Navy doctors identified Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy as high risk before delivery and took steps, including having extra doctors present during delivery, to prevent complications. She said close attention was paid to the fetal heart rate and to the mother's uterine contractions.

"We monitor this very closely, and it allows us to respond very quickly if the fetus is in distress," she said.

All multiple-birth deliveries are considered high risk, Bono said, adding that other factors, such as the mother's nutritional status, history of smoking, and alcohol or prescription drug use, also can lead to elevated risk levels.

"The prenatal period is very important and delicate time. There are a whole myriad of causes that determine whether a child develops cerebral palsy," she said, adding that only 5 percent of cerebral palsy cases are linked to delivery and that a much larger number — at least 60 percent — begin well before delivery.

But the specific type of cerebral palsy suffered by Gavin, Cronin said, is linked directly to oxygen deprivation during delivery. He added that cerebral palsy developed before delivery would damage large parts of the brain, instead of localized damage that Gavin suffered.

Bono would not say which, if any, prenatal risk factors other than a multiple delivery were present during Kendra Alcorn's pregnancy, but she defended the actions of doctors and staff at the hospital, which she said delivers about 120 babies each month and conforms to national standards set by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists.

"In a high-risk industry such as health care, everything can be done according to standards, and unanticipated outcomes can still happen," she said.

But Cronin said the hospital was attempting to shift blame onto Kendra Alcorn by discussing complications caused by smoking and prescription medicines. While he admitted that Kendra Alcorn smoked, he said there was no evidence linking smoking to the type of brain damage that Gavin suffered.

"There is no evidence that this is a congenital defect," he said. "All evidence indicates that this was caused by asphyxiation. I am extremely disappointed that the hospital is attempting to blame the victim. This is an attempt to smear the family and not be accountable for their own actions."

The Navy has six months to respond to the Alcorn's claim. It can pay the full amount, offer a reduced settlement or pay nothing.

After the six-month period, if the family is not satisfied with the Navy's response, they can file a lawsuit in U.S. District Court.

At that point, Justice Department lawyers would take over the lawsuit's defense.

Naval Hospital Jacksonville has been at the center of several malpractice claims since 2000. As reported by the Navy Times, medical malpractice at the hospital has left at least 12 patients dead and another four disabled or crippled, according to federal court papers.

A recent case involves a $15 million lawsuit filed against the Navy after doctors failed to diagnose bacterial meningitis in a 3-month-old boy in June 2006.

That boy, Justin Michael Shantz, later died.

Bono defended the hospital's record.

"I have every confidence that quality health care is being provided," she said, adding that the national standard for malpractice lawsuits in a year is 2.4 per 100 physicians. Naval Hospital Jacksonville has 1.3 per 100 physicians, she said. While acknowledging that 13 percent of the hospital's patients cannot sue because they are on active duty, she said that even when those numbers were accounted for, the hospital still beats national averages.

Naval hospital doctors also exceed the national rate for being board qualified, she said.

Cronin, a retired Navy commander and former P-3 pilot who says his child was born at Naval Hospital Jacksonville, did not dispute that.

"I have no doubt that they are able to provide quality of care," he said. "I just think they had some failures of quality of care in this case."

Expert Cites Controller Fatigue In Crash That Killed Radio Star (CHIT)

By Matt O'Connor, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 10, 2007

An aviation consultant testified Friday that an air-traffic controller's fatigue was a contributing factor in the midair collision that killed radio star Bob Collins and two others seven years ago.

At a federal trial stemming from lawsuits over the crash, Farrell Smith, a former Federal Aviation Administration official, said records showed that controller Gregory Fowler worked more than seven hours that day without taking a break.

In the hour before the collision, Fowler had been involved in 416 transmissions with pilots, one every 8.65 seconds, Smith said.

"He's vulnerable to fatigue, mental and physical," Smith said of Fowler, whom lawyers for the three victims' families blamed for the collision. "It's critical safety-wise to give them a break, so they're sharp and aware."

DOJ_NMG_0131074

Collins had been Chicago's top-ranked morning-radio personality when his Moravan Z242L struck a Cessna 172P flown by student pilot Sharon Hock as the two aircraft approached Waukegan Regional Airport near the lakefront. Collins' plane crashed onto the roof of Midwestern Regional Medical Center, killing him and passenger Herman Luscher, while Hock died when her plane plummeted onto a Zion street.

On Friday Paul Pieri, a former flight instructor who witnessed the crash, testified that he had been surprised when Collins' plane passed in front of his shortly before the collision. If Collins had accurately reported his position, Pieri said, "He should have already been past me on final approach" to the airfield.

Justice Department lawyers, representing the FAA at the trial, contend that Collins caused the collision.

William Sullivan Lawrence, an expert pilot who rose to colonel in 26 years in the Marine Corps, testified that neither Collins nor Hock had been negligent.

"I think he did the same thing that 99.9 percent of general-aviation pilots would have done," Lawrence said of Collins. He also credited Hock with doing "a fine job."

Lawrence, who did a test run to try to re-create what the two pilots encountered that day, said they were flying west into the sun under hazy conditions, "the worst of all situations."

Contributing to the accident was that Collins was flying a low-wing plane with poor visibility below him as he descended into the rear of Hock's high-wing plane, Lawrence said.

Man Pleads Guilty In Austin Immigrant Brothel Case (AAS)

By Steven Kreytak, AMERICAN-STATESMAN STAFF

Austin (TX) American-Statesman, February 10, 2007

Austin site was part of 13-city prostitution network.

A man who federal authorities say managed brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City in an elaborate multistate immigrant smuggling and prostitution ring pleaded guilty in federal court Friday.

The ring included brothels in 13 cities, including ones across Texas, as far west as Las Vegas and as far east as New York City and Atlanta, according to documents filed with Juan Balderas-Orosco's plea. The operators snuck hundreds of women into the country from Mexico as well as Central and South American countries, and forced them to have sex with as many as 40 men — mostly undocumented immigrants — a day, the documents said.

Their bosses, who moved the women among the brothels in the interstate network, kept all or part of the women's earnings, the documents said.

"The prostitutes reported they were not free to leave the brothels on their own, and the brothel operators were usually armed with firearms," one court document said.

Balderas, 34, faces 10 years in prison at a later sentencing on each of three crimes: transportation for prostitution, conspiracy to smuggle, transport and harbor illegal aliens, and importation of aliens.

Balderas' lawyer, Kristin Etter, declined to talk about the case, other than to say it is a symptom of a broken immigration system.

With limited legal channels for immigrants to the U.S., some immigrants "are pushed into this underground economy and forced into these kinds of jobs," she said outside court.

Balderas, who was the manager of brothels in Austin and Oklahoma City, is the lead defendant in an indictment filed last year in U.S. District Court in Austin charging 12 people in the case with various smuggling and prostitution crimes.

Six people pleaded guilty in the case earlier this week and another defendant, Mohammad Arami, pleaded guilty with Balderas before U.S. Magistrate Judge Robert Pitman on Friday.

Three defendants are fugitives in the case, including one woman accused of running the operation: Cecilia Maria Roberson, aka "Lila." Information about that woman's nationality and possible whereabouts were not included in court documents.

Another woman whom co-defendants and some of the prostitutes identified as a boss of the operation, Maria Camacho-Teran, was arrested in December, and her case is pending. She earned substantial income from the operation, is a citizen of Venezuela and is married to a U.S. citizen, a judge wrote in court documents.

Arami pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit money laundering. He owned a house at 9807 FM 969 that federal agents raided last summer. Court documents say that Arami knew that the rent on that house was paid with proceeds of the illegal operation.

Both men said little more than "yes" at the sentencing hearing. They were responding to a standard list of questions Pitman asked regarding whether they understood the ramifications of their pleas.

Federal Prosecutor Opposes Dismissal Of Charges In 1964 Killings Of 2 Black Men In Miss. (AP)

By Jack Elliott Jr.

AP, February 10, 2007

JACKSON, Miss. - Kidnapping remains a capital crime under federal law and there is no statute of limitations that would justify dismissing charges against a reputed Ku Klux Klansman accused in the 1964 slayings of two black men, say federal prosecutors.

James Ford Seale, 71, has pleaded not guilty to two counts of kidnapping and one count of conspiracy. Seale is being held without bond in the Madison County jail.

Seale could be sentenced to up to life in prison if convicted in the deaths of Charles Eddie Moore and Henry Hezekiah Dee.

Prosecutors said Moore and Dee were seized and beaten by Klansmen, then thrown into the Mississippi River to drown.

In a motion to dismiss the charges last month, Assistant Federal Defender Kathy Nester said the government needed to have charged Seale under the law in effect at the time of the alleged offense. The statute of limitations on the federal crime of kidnapping is five years, meaning the deadline to charge Seale was 1969, she argued.

U.S. District Judge Henry T. Wingate has not ruled on the dismissal motion.

U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton, in a response filed this week, said Seale's defense was misreading the law. He said while the U.S. Supreme Court in 1968 may have eliminated the death penalty for kidnapping, the court did not remove the designation of kidnapping as a capital crime under federal law.

"The limitations period depends upon the capital nature of the crime, and not on whether the death penalty is in fact available for a defendant in a particular case. Because the defendant is charged with offenses deemed by Congress to be capital in nature, he may be prosecuted for those offenses without limitation," Lampton said in the government's response.

Federal Public Defender S. Dennis Joiner, in a reply to the government's position, said once the death penalty was removed as a penalty for kidnapping, kidnapping became a non-capital offense.

Joiner said the 1968 decision gave trial courts no option but to treat as non-capital cases in which the death penalty provision of a statute has been removed. Therefore, the five-year non-capital statute of limitations must apply.

A second white man long suspected in the attack, reputed KKK member Charles Marcus Edwards, 72, has not been charged. People close to the investigation who spoke on condition of anonymity said Edwards was cooperating with authorities.

Seale and Edwards were arrested in 1964. But the FBI - consumed by the search for three civil rights workers who had disappeared that summer - turned the case over to local authorities, who promptly threw out all charges.

The Justice Department reopened the case in 2000.

Feinstein Joins Clamor Over Jailed Border Agents (SFC)

By Carolyn Lochhead, Chronicle Washington Bureau

San Francisco Chronicle, February 10, 2007

2 officers convicted in 2005 shooting of alleged smuggler

Washington -- Sen. Dianne Feinstein intervened Friday in the cases of two Border Patrol agents who are imprisoned for shooting an alleged Mexican drug smuggler and who have become a cause celebre for anti-illegal immigration GOP politicians, conservative media and activists.

The California Democrat, who is a member of the Senate Judiciary Committee, wrote letters to three top administration officials -- Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and Federal Bureau of Prisons Director Harley Lappin -- asking for specific information about their agencies' involvement in the case.

Feinstein is the first prominent Democrat to become involved in the case of the border agents, and her office said she has secured the agreement of Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy to conduct a committee investigation. She said Leahy is open to a hearing on the matter.

Border Patrol agents Jose Alonso Compean and Ignacio Ramos were convicted last March and sentenced Oct. 9 for the 2005 shooting of an alleged drug smuggler, Osvaldo Aldrete-Davila, who had driven a van loaded with 743 pounds of marijuana from Mexico to Texas. The agents shot Aldrete-Davila as he tried to flee back across the border with Mexico, then hid evidence of the shooting and failed to report it, according to the evidence presented at their trial. Compean received a 12-year federal prison sentence, and Ramos 11 years and one month.

Last Saturday, Ramos was injured in a fight with five other inmates at the federal prison in Yazoo City, Miss. Prison authorities said he sustained minor bruises and abrasions.

President Bush has so far refused to pardon the agents, though he has said he would "look at all the facts" and urged others to do the same in a Fox News interview Jan. 31.

"I get asked about pardons in a lot of different cases, and there's a procedure in place," Bush said in the interview. "And what I've told members of Congress who have written me, our call was, just look at the case. Look at the facts in the case. And people need to understand why these folks were sent to trial and why a jury of their peers convicted them."

The case -- and Bush's response -- has enraged conservative Republican House members. Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Huntington Beach (Orange County), invited Ramos' wife to the State of the Union address. This week, he warned there would be calls for Bush's impeachment if either of the agents dies in prison.

Feinstein spokesman Scott Gerber said Feinstein called for an investigation because "she believes there are serious questions." He said she also asked her California state director in San Francisco, Jim Molinari, a former U.S. marshal, to look into the case informally and advise her.

"This was a case of two agents who were pursuing a suspect who turned out to be involved in drug trafficking, and it raises questions about the length of their sentence and how they're being treated in prison," Gerber said. "Certainly, the Department of Justice can conduct investigations, but at the same time the senator thinks there are significant issues that need to be resolved, and the Judiciary Committee is the appropriate venue to look at these questions."

Feinstein told Gonzales in her letter that she strongly believes the agents' sentences are too extreme, given that the victim resisted arrest and was smuggling large quantities of drugs. Further, she wrote, the agents had to her knowledge no prior convictions or aggravating circumstances to warrant such long terms.

The U.S. attorney who prosecuted the case, Johnny Sutton, has maintained that Congress determined the penalty, setting a mandatory minimum 10-year sentence for discharging a firearm during a crime of violence.

Feinstein said she found it even more disturbing that Ramos was beaten in prison. "It is not hard to predict that two federal agents would be targeted in a prison population and that special precautions should have been employed to ensure their safety," Feinstein wrote.

Ramos and the five inmates who assaulted him have been segregated from the general prison population, according to Bureau of Prisons spokesperson Traci Billingsley. She said that the assailants will face disciplinary proceedings and that the bureau will "take all necessary measures to ensure his ongoing safety."

The Justice Department has posted on its Web site a four-page document defending its prosecution by Sutton, the U.S. attorney in the Western District of Texas. It is titled "Myth vs. Reality: The Facts of Why the Government Prosecuted agents Compean and Ramos" at www.usdoj.gov/usao/txw.

Congressman Campaigns To Help Imprisoned Ex-border Agent (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

YAZOO CITY — U.S. Rep. Tom Tancredo of Colorado met today with Ignacio Ramos at the prison where the former U.S. Border Patrol agent was attacked by other inmates.

Tancredo said he offered encouragement and campaigned to get Ramos a change of cells.

Ramos is serving time at Yazoo City Federal Correctional Complex for shooting a drug smuggling suspect in Texas and then lying about it.

“I gave him as much positive information as I could,” Tancredo said after leaving the prison in Yazoo City, Miss., about 40 miles northeast of Jackson. “And it is our hope we can get him moved to another part of the facility that is safe for him but not in a segregated environment ... 23 hours a day in a cell, which he has now.”

A Republican presidential candidate and opponent of illegal immigration, Tancredo has said the Bush administration failed to protect Ramos and has demanded that the agents receive a full presidential pardon.

The congressman said he was allowed to see the prison area where Ramos was beaten and had “observed bruises and abrasions on his body.”

Tancredo, the founder and former chairman of the House Immigration Reform caucus, said Ramos had one bruise that “starts at the top of a shoulder and goes all the way to the elbow. It is very deep, a purplish, red, very deep bruise.”

DOJ_NMG_0131077

Before traveling to the prison that houses low- and medium-security inmates, the congressman said the Ramos family "has had to endure too much already for something as diminutive as a failure to report an incident. Sure it deserves punishment, but not one worse than some murderers."

Tancredo said after today's meeting he believed prison officials would move Ramos from isolation to better, but still safe, quarters elsewhere in the facility.

"I talked with the warden ... at great length and she was very accommodating," he said. "She said she would in fact request a new placement for him."

Tancredo said he understood a meeting would be held next Wednesday to consider the request.

Public information officials at the Yazoo City facility referred all questions to the Federal Bureau of Prisons in Washington, which did not release any new information about a possible Ramos transfer.

Tancredo said he told Ramos that there had been vigils and other demonstrations of support for the agents and that "a lot of people were praying for him."

Prison officials on Tuesday confirmed the beating of Ramos, whose conviction along with that of fellow former agent Jose Alonso Compean drew sharp criticism from some who said the agents were merely doing their job defending the border against criminals.

A federal report was released Wednesday on the shootings, and Senate Committee Chairman Patrick Leahy, D-Vt., agreed to allow Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-California, to hold a hearing on the case.

An Associated Press photographer from Jackson, at the prison Friday to take pictures of Tancredo, was told by a security officer that he had to surrender the digital disk in his camera before he would be allowed to leave the facility. Later, the photographer was allowed to leave with the digital images — scenes of the exterior of the prison.

Ramos and Compean were convicted last year of shooting Osvaldo Aldrete Davila in 2005 at a rural area near El Paso, Texas, and then trying to cover up the incident. Davila was shot once in the buttocks.

In a statement issued Wednesday afternoon, Rep. John Culberson, D-Texas, said Ramos and Compean "may not have followed proper procedure following the shooting, which at most should have resulted in their suspensions from the force, but not criminal procedure."

Ramos and Compean, who reported to prison in January, were each sentenced in October to more than a decade behind bars. Compean is serving his sentence at the Elkton Federal Correctional Institution, a low-security prison in Ohio. There have been no reports of problems with his detention.

Monica Ramos, the agent's wife, told The Associated Press on Tuesday that he called her on his 38th birthday and said: "They got me. They got me good."

Monica Ramos said her husband described being attacked late Saturday, when he "let his guard down" and went to his bed. The attackers, she said, kicked and stomped him for several minutes before running away.

Ignacio Ramos was able to identify one man in the group and is now pursuing criminal charges, Monica Ramos said.

ANTITRUST:

Cousins Get 2 Years In Concrete Scheme (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, February 10, 2007

Prison term nearly twice that of plea-bargaining ringleaders

Two men convicted in November of involvement in an Indianapolis-area concrete price-fixing conspiracy will spend nearly twice as long in prison as ringleaders who cooperated and pleaded guilty.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney on Friday sentenced Chris A. and Ricky J. Beaver, managers at Noblesville-based Beaver Materials Corp., to 27 months in prison for violating antitrust law and lying to the FBI.

The prison terms will be followed by two years of supervised release. Both men were ordered to pay $5,000 fines.

The conspiracy's ringleaders, who testified against the Beaver cousins in November, were sentenced to 14 months in prison.

The Beavers acknowledged attending several secret meetings called to set prices, but they still deny participating in the scheme. Both men agreed, however, they had lied to investigators.

"It's something I'm not proud of," said Chris Beaver, 42. "I was scared they would handcuff me in front of my children."

But, he added, "We did not do any price-fixing."

Ricky Beaver, 43, also denied price-fixing, saying: "I only went to two meetings. I didn't agree to anything."

McKinney was unmoved, saying the jury had spoken, and he agreed the Beavers were active participants.

The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials, the largest fine ever paid by a participant in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy.

The Beavers' defense attorney, Jeffrey A. Lockwood, called the cousins' involvement in the conspiracy "minuscule." But prosecutors asserted the company sold $50 million worth of ready-mix concrete at potentially inflated prices during the conspiracy.

Ready-mix concrete is made on demand and hauled to work sites in mixer trucks for public and private projects, such as sidewalks, driveways, bridges and roads.

The Beavers' sentencing came hours after McKinney sentenced John J. Blatzheim, 52, executive vice president of Fishers-based Builder's Concrete & Supply Co., to nine months in prison and a year of probation, and fined him $5,000.

A charge of lying to the FBI was dropped in exchange for Blatzheim's guilty plea.

"I've disappointed a lot of people," Blatzheim said in court Friday.

He acknowledged attending meetings to fix prices and "policing the agreement."

Friday's hearings closed out the price-fixing cases pending against individual defendants.

In all, nine current or former officials of four area companies have been sentenced to prison in the scheme to overcharge concrete customers from July 2000 through May 25, 2004, when a series of early-morning FBI raids broke up the conspiracy.

"We're pleased the defendants received significant sentences that reflect the seriousness of the crimes," said Scott D. Hammond, a deputy assistant attorney general in the Justice Department's Antitrust Division.

Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing.

Lear Agrees To Buyout Offer Of $2.8 Billion From Icahn (NYT)

By Nick Bunkley

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

DETROIT, Feb. 9 — One of the biggest shareholders of the Lear Corporation, a manufacturer of automotive seats, criticized the company's deal on Friday to sell itself for $2.8 billion to the investor Carl C. Icahn.

The shareholder, Richard S. Pzena, who owns 11 percent of Lear through his firm, Pzena Investment Management, said he believed that the price was too low and that Lear did not need outside help to turn around its business.

Another shareholder, Evercore Asset, which calls itself a relatively small shareholder of Lear, said Friday that it was going to vote against Mr. Icahn's bid. Evercore said the offer price of $36 a share does not reflect the value of Lear.

The deal — the latest in a wave of major investments in the troubled auto parts industry — is worth $5.3 billion, including $2.5 billion in debt that will be assumed by American Real Estate Partners, the investment firm controlled by Mr. Icahn. Mr. Icahn already owns nearly 16 percent of Lear's 76.3 million outstanding shares, which would be valued at $36 each.

That is $3.39 less than the closing price for Lear's stock on Friday; shares fell 1.7 percent after the deal was announced.

Lear, based in Southfield, Mich., expects the deal to close by the end of the second quarter. But the company said it would also consider any other offers submitted within 45 days.

Mr. Pzena sent a letter critical of the proposed buyout to Lear's independent directors this week.

Mr. Pzena said in an interview on Friday that Lear is in the middle of a turnaround. He believes that Lear shares could be worth $60 each within a few years, which would make his stake in the company worth $201 million more than it is valued under Mr. Icahn's offer.

"I don't understand why they felt like they had to sell the company at all," Mr. Pzena said. "I hope that the shareholders send a message to the board that they can't be doing these kinds of things."

In a statement, the chairman and chief executive of Lear, Robert E. Rossiter, said shareholders should be pleased with the buyout terms.

"Following a very thorough review of the proposed transaction, our board unanimously concluded that the A.R.E.P. offer was in the best interests of Lear's shareholders," Mr. Rossiter said.

"We believe that the transaction price, which represents a multiple of about nine times our forecasted 2007 core operating earnings — excluding the interior business — provides shareholders with significant value."

Lear, which lost more than $2 billion in the last two years, agreed in the fall to sell its automotive interiors division to another billionaire investor specializing in struggling companies, Wilbur L. Ross.

An analyst with Lehman Brothers in New York, Brian A. Johnson, said he expected the buyout of Lear to be supported by most shareholders, particularly those who paid less than $30 a share for their interest in the company.

(Mr. Icahn bought nearly 8.7 million Lear shares in November for $23 each, regulatory filings show.)

Lear Holders Call For New Bids (WSJ)

By Terry Kosdrosky

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Management Backs Offer From Icahn; A Fair Valuation?

Lear Corp.'s support of a takeover offer by billionaire investor Carl Icahn has raised questions about whether the auto-parts supplier's board has worked hard enough to get the best deal for shareholders.

Management's welcoming response to the offer also sparked shareholder calls for the company to seek competing bids.

The auto-parts supplier said on Friday its management supported Mr. Icahn's $36-a-share offer, adding that its board voted unanimously in favor of it, even though Lear stock has been trading at about the offer price.

The deal involving Mr. Icahn's American Real Estate Partners L.P., and valued at about $5.3 billion, is the latest move to grab a bigger stake in the auto-parts sector. Companies like Lear have struggled with lower production from U.S. auto makers, high raw-materials costs and pricing pressures. But deep-pocketed investors have been drawn to the sector because of the low valuations of many ailing companies and the belief some will recover.

At least three major shareholders believe Lear shares have the potential to appreciate well beyond the Icahn offer price and said they will vote against the bid. Richard Pzena, whose investment firm owns 10% of Lear, said he plans to push the board to solicit offers from other potential buyers. Mr. Pzena also said he is concerned Lear's management is backing the deal at least in part because it includes raises and other financial rewards.

Chairman and Chief Executive Bob Rossiter would give up the CEO title but would see his base salary increase to $1.15 million in the first two years. In 2005, Mr. Rossiter earned $1.1 million in base salary and no bonus, according to the company's proxy statement. His base salary would be $700,000 in the third year, when he is to become nonexecutive chairman, according to new employment agreements filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission. In his first year, he gets a guaranteed bonus of no less than $1.72 million.

President and Chief Operating Officer Douglas G. DelGrosso would be named chief executive, succeeding Mr. Rossiter, and would have his salary increased to $1.15 million initially and would receive an annual bonus of at least $1.43 million. In 2005, the last period Lear's compensation figures were disclosed, Mr. DelGrosso was paid $705,834 in base salary and no bonus.

Mr. Rossiter said a buyout would leave the company in a stronger position to cut costs and expand in Asia. He said the deal, which requires approval from a majority of holders of Lear common stock, "provides shareholders with significant value."

Lear makes auto seats, interior parts and electronics.

Shares in the Southfield, Mich., company were down 1.7% to $39.39 in 4 p.m. New York Stock Exchange composite trading Friday. The stock reached a 52-week intraday high of $41.14 this week, after Mr. Icahn's proposal was announced on Monday.

Mr. Icahn already owns a 16% stake in Lear. Mr. Icahn's $5.3 billion offer values Lear at $2.75 billion. He would pay about $2.31 billion in cash to buy the shares he doesn't already own and assume $2.5 billion in debt.

If Lear accepts a superior bid, Lear could have to pay a termination fee of more than $85 million, plus as much as $15 million in expenses, according to a filing made with the SEC.

The company said it will solicit other offers over the next 45 days. Wall Street analysts, however, said Friday it is unlikely any other offers will materialize.

Like Mr. Pzena's firm, Pzena Investment Management LLC, Braun, von Wyss & Müller, the Zurich-based investment adviser for Classic Fund Management Aktiengesellschaft, said they would oppose the deal. They each said Lear's value is closer to $60 a share. Brandes Investment Partners LP, which owns a 3.9% stake in Lear, also said it would vote against the deal, arguing the price is far below Lear's long-term fair value.

DOJ_NMG_0131080

One smaller shareholder, however, said he supports the deal. Robert Chapman, managing member of Los Angeles-based Chapman Capital LLC, said $36 is a good price, noting that Lear was trading at about $28 a month ago.

J.P. Morgan Chase & Co.'s J.P. Morgan Securities Inc. served as financial adviser, and Winston & Strawn LLP as legal counsel to a special committee of Lear's board. Bank of America Corp. provided Mr. Icahn's affiliate with debt-financing commitments.

U.S. Inquiry On Bonds At Big Bank (NYT)

By Vikas Bajaj

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

Bank of America said yesterday that it was cooperating with a Justice Department investigation into bidding practices in the municipal bond business in exchange for leniency.

The agreement with the bank may be a significant breakthrough for government investigators who have been looking at how the proceeds of bonds issued by cities, school districts and other municipal authorities are invested between the time the money is raised and when it is spent on projects like new water systems and school gymnasiums.

Investigators are examining whether there was collusion among some financial institutions in bidding to handle the bond revenue during those interim periods.

Last November, the Justice Department issued subpoenas and raided the offices of several firms that served as go-betweens for municipalities and large financial institutions.

The investigation is the biggest in municipal finance since the 1990s, when the Securities and Exchange Commission accused some Wall Street firms of "yield burning" — or profiting by overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings. The current investigation is unusual because it appears to involve possible criminal charges.

Bank of America said the Justice Department had agreed not to bring criminal charges against the bank because it was the first institution to volunteer information before the subpoenas were issued. Furthermore, the agreement limits the civil penalties that prosecutors can pursue against the bank to actual damages, rather than the treble damages it can pursue against others.

The deal, which the bank said would not be available to other financial institutions, is contingent on continued cooperation by Bank of America.

"If a company has participated in industrywide practices, its cooperation can prove invaluable," said Kathleen F. Brickey, a law professor at Washington University in St. Louis who specializes in white-collar crime. as prosecutors investigate other companies. "This will be unwelcome news for others" in the industry.

In a separate settlement with the Internal Revenue Service, Bank of America said yesterday that it would pay $14.7 million to the federal government for its role in the use of contracts that provided guaranteed investment returns on proceeds from bond pools issued by multiple municipalities. The I.R.S. has been examining whether such pools are being used to generate profits from tax-free municipal bonds.

"They are related only in that the two are happening at the same time and involve the municipal arena," said Shirley Norton, a Bank of America spokeswoman.

A spokeswoman for the Justice Department confirmed that it had reached an agreement with Bank of America but would not answer questions about the deal. A spokesman for the I.R.S. declined to comment.

Municipal bonds are a big business for Wall Street — about $385 billion of bonds were issued last year, according to the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association. The bonds provide a steady source of fees and are a relatively safe, and tax-free, investment.

In recent years, several government agencies, including the Securities and Exchange Commission, have focused on how the proceeds of the bonds are handled in the months or years before they are spent. Because the money is tax-free, municipalities cannot generate a higher return on the money by investing it than what it costs to raise the money. If they do earn more, the balance is due to the United States Treasury.

To get around those limits, consultants to municipalities and major financial institutions like Bank of America have used guaranteed investment contracts that limit the return cities and other agencies can earn from their bond proceeds.

Investigators are looking into whether some financial institutions have colluded when bidding for those contracts, which are structured in a way that appeared to satisfy the I.R.S. rules but in reality provide excessive fees or returns to banks and advisers involved in the transactions.

"Municipal bond proceeds are supposed to be spent for tangible purposes, not to earn interest in arbitrage," said Charles Anderson, a retired I.R.S. field inspector who now has a private consulting practice. "You want a transparent and above- board process of people getting investment contracts."

In November, Bloomberg News reported that federal agents raided and seized documents from the offices of three brokers that specialized in municipal finance and Justice Department lawyers subpoenaed documents from two insurance companies and General Electric.

Shares of Bank of America slipped 33 cents, to $52.99.

Bank Of America To Cooperate With Justice Department (AP)

By IEVA M. AUGSTUMS, AP Business Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

CHARLOTTE, N.C. -- Bank of America Corp. said Friday it has entered into a "leniency agreement" with the Department of Justice related to an investigation into the municipal derivatives industry.

The Charlotte-based bank said the agreement will keep the department from bringing any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in the matter in return for its continuing cooperation.

The bank said it was receiving the special treatment because it went to the department with information about bidding practices in the bond industry before the government began its investigation last year.

Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to a number of Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports.

Tax-exempt municipal bonds are sold to fund state and local projects, including sewer systems, bridges and stadiums.

Bank of America spokesman Shirley Norton declined comment, citing the bank's of not commenting "on ongoing investigations."

The bank will continue to fully cooperate with the investigations being conducted by the Justice Department, the SEC, and the Internal Revenue Service, Norton said.

Separately, the bank agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS over the bank's role in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements related to "blind pool" bond transactions. Guaranteed investment contracts are issued by insurers and offer guaranteed rates of return for specified periods. Many retirement plans include them.

Bank of America did not admit to any liability under the Internal Revenue Code, it said in a statement.

Bank of America shares closed down 33 cents, or 0.62 percent, at $52.99 on the New York Stock Exchange. In the past 52 weeks, shares have traded in a range of $43.30 to $55.08.

Cooperation Gives BofA Leniency In Inquiry, Bank Says (CO)

By Rick Rothacker

The Charlotte Observer, February 10, 2007

Bank of America Corp. said Friday that it won't face criminal prosecution for anti-trust matters in the U.S. Justice Department's ongoing investigation of bidding practices in the municipal bond industry.

The Charlotte bank said it reached a leniency agreement with the agency, in return for its continuing cooperation. The announcement shed new light on the bank's role in a wide-ranging probe that became public late last year.

Under the Justice Department's leniency program, amnesty is available to a company that first reports information to the agency before the government has started its own investigation, the bank said.

Separately, Bank of America said it had agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS related to certain bond transactions. Under the agreement, the bank said it did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code.

State and local governments issue municipal bonds to raise money for projects ranging from schools to transportation systems to housing projects. In return, investors receive tax breaks on the interest they receive from the bonds.

In 2006, investment banks raised about $379 billion through municipal bond issues, the second best year on record, according to Thomson Financial. Bank of America was the ninth-biggest underwriter.

The industry faced scrutiny in the 1990s over the marking up of bond prices and now faces renewed examination. Late last year, the Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission issued subpoenas to Wall Street firms seeking information about a variety of municipal bond industry practices, according to published reports.

At the time, the Justice Department said it was looking at "anti-competitive practices." The reports also said the IRS was examining whether consultants and underwriters were evading taxes in certain transactions.

An inquiry into the municipal bond business is "long overdue," said Mark Schwartz, a former investment banker who is now a critic of the industry.

"It's a club," said Schwartz, a Philadelphia-area attorney. "There's a lot of trading going on: `I'll give this, if you put us in that deal.' "

DOJ_NMG_0131082

One of the areas under scrutiny is so-called "blind pool" transactions in which underwriters issue bonds for unspecified projects, he said. The incentive for the investment banks is lucrative fees produced by the deals.

The IRS gets concerned because investors are getting a tax break for buying bonds for projects that may not come to fruition, he said. "The treasury doesn't want to be subsidizing deals that aren't needed," Schwartz said.

In addition, the underwriters, with no specific municipal project on deck, will often re-invest the proceeds from blind-pool bond issues. This can raise questions about whether these investments, arranged under so-called "guaranteed investment contracts," were properly bid out.

Bank of America said the IRS settlement related to its role "in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements in connection with certain blind-pool bond transactions." Bank spokeswoman Shirley Norton said she could not comment further because the investigation is ongoing.

The bank said it continues to cooperate with investigations by the Justice Department, the SEC and the IRS. A Justice Department spokesman confirmed Bank of America is cooperating in its probe of "anti-competitive practices in the municipal derivatives industry."

Industrywide Municipal Bond Investigation

· What happened? The U.S. Justice Department has given Bank of America immunity from criminal anti-trust prosecution under an amnesty agreement. The bank also reached a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS.

Bank Of America To Cooperate In Muni Bid-Rig Probe (Update4) (BLOOM)

By William Selway And Martin Z. Braun

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Bank of America Corp., the second- largest U.S. bank, said the Justice Department agreed not to press antitrust charges against the bank in exchange for its assistance with a criminal probe of the municipal bond market.

The bank also agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the Internal Revenue Service in connection with its role in providing investment contacts to some state and local governments, the bank said in a statement.

Bank of America is the first to announce an agreement with the U.S. government in connection with an antitrust probe of bid-rigging of investment contracts that are sold to states and municipalities. The settlement may help speed the pace of the probe, which has roiled an almost 200-year-old market where local governments have $2.3 trillion of bonds outstanding.

``It's a positive step when you see settlements because it does tend to expedite the process," said Carol Lew, the president of the National Association of Bond Lawyers and a public finance attorney at Stradling Yocca Carlson & Roth in Newport Beach, California.

Gina Talamona, a Justice Department spokeswoman, wasn't immediately available for comment. Shirley Norton, a spokeswoman for Bank of America, declined to comment. Nancy Mathis, an IRS spokeswoman, declined to comment.

`Roadmap'

The agreement came after Charlotte, North Carolina-based Bank of America gave information to investigators before they initiated the probe, the bank said in its statement. The bank said offers of amnesty are available from the Justice Department to the first who reports behavior that is later investigated.

``If you're the first one in the door, you get credit for that from the government, said John Fahy, a former U.S. prosecutor now in private practice in Rutherford, New Jersey. ``You are educating the prosecutors. You are giving them a roadmap as to how particular fraud occurred."

Bank of America shares fell 33 cents to $52.99 at 4:16 p.m. in composite trading on the New York Stock Exchange.

More than a dozen banks, insurers and brokers have been subpoenaed in the investigation, which also includes the Securities and Exchange Commission. The Justice Department's probe follows the IRS in looking into whether there were conspiracies to rig the bidding for so-called guaranteed investment contracts, where local governments invest money raised at bond sales until it is needed to pay for schools and other projects.

Yield-Burning

Local governments are required to rebate to the IRS much of the earnings they reap by reinvesting funds raised from tax-exempt bond sales. The IRS is concerned that unfair bidding on investment contracts may have deprived the federal government of money, much like the so-called yield burning scandals of the 1990s, when Wall Street banks overcharged municipal borrowers for Treasury bond investments.

The Justice Department has declined to comment on the probe, saying only that it was investigating anti-competitive practices in the industry. Subpoenas issued in the investigation sought information on several financial products, including derivatives.

``We have little public information about the scope and magnitude of the investigation,'' Lew said. ``That type of climate can hurt the entire municipal bond industry.''

Blind Pools

Bank of America, second only to Citigroup Inc. as the biggest bank by stock market value, said the settlement with the IRS stems from its sale of investment contracts and other products to agencies that sold bonds for so-called blind pools, sums of money that were to be made available to local government borrowers for projects like low-income housing and schools. In some cases, such transactions did nothing for the public while generating millions in fees for the banks and advisers that put them together, according to an Oct. 4 article by Bloomberg News.

Five days before companies disclosed receiving subpoenas from the Justice Department in connection with its probe, George K. Baum & Co., a Kansas City, Missouri-based investment bank, said it settled allegations with the IRS that it illegally diverted profits on municipal bond deals. That settlement covered more than $2 billion of so-called blind-pool deals between 1997 and 2001.

Bank of America provided the guaranteed investment contract on at least one of the Baum transactions targeted by the IRS, a $100 million issue sold in 2000 by Rural Enterprises of Oklahoma Inc., bond documents show. Rural Enterprise of Oklahoma Inc. disclosed in July 2003 that a ``significant,'' hidden payment was made to Baum by the provider of the investment agreement.

Atlanta Deal

Questions about bid rigging were also raised in connection with a $453 million guaranteed investment contract that Bank of America won from the city of Atlanta. That bidding for that agreement was handled by CDR Financial Products Inc., a Beverly Hills, California adviser to local governments that was raided in November in connection with the Justice Department probe.

The IRS in 2005 told Atlanta officials that the city may have overpaid for a $453 million guaranteed investment contract from Bank of America Corp. The IRS asked whether banks arranged to submit ``courtesy losing bids'' at an auction held to win the city's investment business, according to a Feb. 5 2005 letter obtained by Bloomberg News.

CDR has previously defended its work in response to the investigation. A spokesman for the firm, Allan Ripp, declined to comment today on Bank of America's agreement.

Bank of America in 2002 fired the employee in its municipal derivatives department who handled the Atlanta contract after he told his manager that he paid a total of $182,393 to CDR, another broker, and two rival banks on transactions in which they played no role, according to records from the NASD and North Carolina's state court in Mecklenburg County, as reported in a Bloomberg article on Oct. 4.

The payments to CDR were described as a bid to build its relationship with the broker, according to an e-mail contained in court records.

Bank Of America Faces Probe On Muni Bonds (MRKTWTCH)

By Steve Gelsi

Market Watch, February 10, 2007

NEW YORK (MarketWatch) -- Bank of America late Friday disclosed it's participating in a government probe into illegal activity surrounding proceeds from municipal bonds and how the money is invested prior to spending on public projects such as schools and bridges.

Separately, the Bank of America (BAC) has agreed to a $14.7 million settlement with the IRS relating to its role in providing guaranteed investment contracts and other agreements in connection with certain "blind pool" bond transactions.

The pact by the nation's second-largest bank with the U.S. Justice Department could mark a breakthrough as the government investigates practices in the multi-billion dollar municipal bond industry.

Bank of America said it's inked a leniency agreement in connection with the department's investigation into bidding practices in the municipal derivatives sector.

"This amnesty grant was a result of the company voluntarily providing information to the Department before the Department began its investigation, as well as the company's continuing cooperation," Bank of America said.

In return for the company's cooperation, the Justice Department will not bring any criminal antitrust prosecution against the company in connection with matters that the company reported to the Justice Department, Bank of America said.

The company said it's cooperated and continues to fully cooperate with the industry-wide investigations being conducted by the Justice Department, the Securities and Exchange Commission, and the Internal Revenue Service.

Under the agreement, Bank of America did not admit to any conduct that would be subject to liability under the Internal Revenue Code.

The investigation marks the largest in municipal finance since about 15 years ago, when the SEC Wall Street institutions of overcharging state and local government agencies in debt refinancings.

FirstGroup To Buy U.S.'s Laidlaw For $3.6 Billion (Update11) (BLOOM)

By Tracy Alloway

Bloomberg, February 10, 2007

Feb. 9 (Bloomberg) -- Britain's FirstGroup Plc agreed to buy Laidlaw International Inc., owner of the largest U.S. school-bus company and the Greyhound bus service, for $3.6 billion to triple revenue in North America.

Laidlaw investors will receive $35.25 in cash for each share, Aberdeen, Scotland-based FirstGroup, the U.K.'s biggest train operator, said today in a statement. That's 11 percent more than the closing price of $31.72 yesterday.

FirstGroup will merge its Ryder U.S. student buses division, acquired in 1999, with Laidlaw's fleet to give it a 13 percent share of the North American school bus market. Laidlaw's Greyhound Lines Inc. unit, the largest inter-city bus company, is ``a less obvious strategic fit'' and will be reviewed, FirstGroup said.

``Being able to combine the two companies will create cost benefits that will flow through relatively quickly,'' said Gert Zonneveld, an analyst at Panmure Gordon in London with a ``buy'' recommendation on the stock. It ``also effectively removes one major competitor from the market, which makes a lot of strategic sense.''

Shares of FirstGroup rose 34.5 pence, or 6.2 percent, to 595.5 pence in London. The stock has risen 45 percent in the past year, boosting the company's market value to 2.3 billion pounds ($4.48 billion). Laidlaw shares rose $2.86, or 9 percent, to $34.58 at 4:04 p.m. in New York Stock Exchange composite trading.

`Cost Benefits Created'

Laidlaw, founded in 1924, filed for bankruptcy in 2001 after almost 20 years of expansion. It bought hundreds of small school bus operators during the 1990s, culminating with the acquisition of Greyhound in 1998.

Greyhound now accounts for 40 percent of Laidlaw's sales. Its school transportation division makes up about 50 percent of the Naperville, Illinois-based company's revenue.

``What's new in this transaction is the Greyhound business,'' said Chief Executive Officer Moir Lockhead in a meeting with analysts today in London. ``We'll do the strategic review and then we'll take it from there.'' He said he did not know how long the review would take to complete.

Greyhound, which serves some 2,200 destinations, is the result of 93 years of expansion and acquisition. Founded in 1914, the company diversified in the 1970s and owned stakes in everything from Dial Corp. deodorant to a meat-packing business.

``You would hope they're more committed to keeping 100 percent of what they've bought,'' said Alistair Gunn, an analyst at Arbuthnot Securities in London with a ``neutral'' rating on the stock. ``It wouldn't surprise me if they did retain Greyhound and if they don't they'll get a good price for it.''

U.S. Business

Most of FirstGroup's U.S. business consists of contracts to operate and manage bus services on behalf of local authorities. The market for management of public buses is estimated by FirstGroup to be worth $15 billion, of which only $2 billion is outsourced to private companies.

``FirstGroup is familiar with the school bus and transit markets in which Laidlaw operates and has followed Laidlaw in an acquisition context for over two years,'' it said in the statement.

The enlarged group will employ more than 71,000 workers in the U.S., FirstGroup said, and operate about 63,000 school buses. The acquisition will generate about $70 million in savings a year, according to the company.

`A New Focus'

``This gives us a new focus,'' said Lockhead. Half of the FirstGroup's sales will now come from the U.S., Finance Director Dean Finch estimated at the meeting. Just under a third of revenue currently comes from North America.

In the U.K. FirstGroup runs one out of every five local bus services and carries some 2.8 million passengers a day. Its Scottish train service handles 95 percent of passenger train services in Scotland, according to its Web site.

``There are likely to be some competition issues,'' said Zonneveld. ``That's one thing that needs to be addressed,'' he said. The deal is subject to a U.S. antitrust review, FirstGroup said.

Gina Talamona, a U.S. Justice Department spokeswoman, said it hasn't been determined whether her agency's antitrust division or the Federal Trade Commission will review the deal.

The acquisition will be financed through debt facilities of $3.75 billion and the issue of 375 pounds worth of new shares, including 200 million pounds worth of new shares placed today.

DOJ_NMG_0131085

The price is 8.4 times FirstGroup's 2006 operating profit. Its last major acquisition in the U.S., that of Ryder Public Transportation Services, was 6.6 times 1998 operating profit.

Credit-Default Swaps

Credit-default swaps-based on 10 million euros of FirstGroup debt rose 11,000 euros to 71,000 euros, according to CMA Datavision. Credit-default swaps are based on corporate bonds and are used to speculate on a company's ability to repay debt. An increase indicates a reduction in credit quality.

Fitch Ratings said today it may lower FirstGroup's credit ratings, following the announcement that had it agreed to buy Laidlaw. The ratings firm ranks the company's debt BBB+, its eighth-highest investment grade ranking. Standard & Poor's grades the debt one level lower at BBB, and it put FirstGroup on a ``watch negative," indicating it may lower its rating.

FirstGroup has 550 million pounds of bonds outstanding, according to data compiled by Bloomberg. The extra yield, or spread, that investors demand to hold FirstGroup's 300 million pounds of 6.875 percent bonds due April 2013, compared with government bonds of a similar maturity, widened 1 basis point to 89 basis points today. A basis point is 0.01 percentage point.

New EPA Rules For Gasoline Limit Benzene, A Carcinogen (WP)

By Juliet Eilperin

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Environmental Protection Agency issued rules yesterday that will dramatically cut toxic fumes from cars and trucks over the next 25 years.

The regulations, which will reduce the amount of cancer-causing benzene in gasoline and set tighter emission standards for autos in cold temperatures and for fuel containers, will help reduce toxic emissions from passenger cars by 80 percent from 1999 levels by 2030.

"Americans love their cars," EPA Administrator Stephen L. Johnson said in a statement. "By clearing the air from tons of fuel and exhaust pollution, President Bush and EPA are paving the road toward healthier drivers and a cleaner environment."

Among air pollutants, benzene -- which naturally occurs in crude oil and is increased through refining to boost gasoline's octane rating -- poses the second-biggest cancer risk to Americans, after diesel emissions. In 2004 it constituted 1 percent of U.S. gas on average; under the new rule benzene levels will drop to an average of 0.62 percent.

The EPA will allow oil refineries to trade pollution credits among themselves as long as the industry as a whole stays below the limit, but the agency imposed an absolute cap of 1.3 percent benzene in any given product. The rule also sets tougher emission standards for cars operating at temperatures of 20 degrees Fahrenheit or below, as well as for fuel evaporation from tanks, fuel lines and gas cans.

Environmentalists, who had successfully sued EPA for failing to issue a benzene ruling by 2004, hailed yesterday's move but questioned the decision to allow refineries to trade emission credits.

"We're happy that EPA has addressed this important public health issue at last, even if it did take a federal court case to make the agency act," said Marti Sinclair, a volunteer for the advocacy group Sierra Club. "But it is disappointing that EPA would undermine its own program by adopting this dangerous trading scheme."

But Frank O'Donnell, who heads the advocacy group Clean Air Watch, said the new regulation would help improve air quality nationwide: "Benzene levels everywhere are going to drop."

In an interview, William Wehrum, acting assistant administrator for EPA's air and radiation office, said the agency is protecting Americans' health by capping benzene levels. EPA estimates that the rule, which will take effect in 2011 for gasoline, will cost $400 million to implement in 2030 and produce $6 billion in health benefits.

"We want to achieve good environmental outcomes in the cheapest way possible," he said. "We do expect some minor variations from place to place."

Charles T. Drevna, executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, which represents oil refineries, said facilities in the Rocky Mountains and Pacific Northwest "are going to have to do a lot more than we anticipated" to meet the new standards.

"What's the impact on supply and cost, that's my concern," said Drevna, who added that his members are already having to change their processes to meet low-sulfur diesel standards and other federal rules. "This is, as Pink Floyd would say, another brick in the wall."

Some environmentalists are still pushing to eliminate two other air toxics that improve gasoline performance, toluene and xylene, as well as to clean up diesel fuel. "This is a missed opportunity to clean up the air and save lives," said Reid Detchon, executive director of the Energy Future Coalition.

But Wehrum said the administration had tried to produce a practical and effective rule. "The single most important thing we can do to reduce the risks associated with toxic emissions is to focus on benzene," he said.

E.P.A. Limits The Benzene In Gasoline By 2011 (NYT)

By Felicity Barringer

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 9 — The Environmental Protection Agency is requiring significant reductions in the amount of cancer-causing benzene and other toxic hydrocarbon gases in gasoline and released into the air during storage and use, under a rule released Friday.

The final rule, issued under a court-ordered deadline set after environmental groups filed suit about two years ago, provides more uniform reductions around the country than the agency had originally proposed.

It was greeted with praise from environmental groups usually critical of the Bush administration in this area and with considerably less enthusiasm by the organization representing the country's 149 refineries.

The rule puts a ceiling on the total benzene content of any gasoline produced after 2011.

The rule limits opportunities for those refineries that are not meeting the benzene limit to meet their obligation by buying credits from other refineries whose gasoline more than meets the standard.

"Benzene content in gasoline is going to go significantly down everywhere in the country," said William Wehrum, the agency's acting assistant administrator of air and radiation programs. "Are there going to be variations from place to place? Yes."

The original proposal would have given refineries more leeway to average the benzene content across their entire gasoline supply. That would have left some regions, particularly parts of the Pacific Northwest and the Rocky Mountain States, with benzene levels well above the levels permissible elsewhere, because their gasoline has historically contained more benzene. Objections by Senator Ron Wyden, Democrat of Oregon, played a role in the agency's decision instead to limit the trading program, Mr. Wehrum said.

In addition to the new benzene limits for gasoline, the new rule also orders cuts for benzene levels in tailpipe emissions and pungent benzene vapors escaping from gasoline cans.

The new standard will cut 19,643 tons of benzene from gasoline when the controls on refiners take effect in four years. In addition, several other rules currently in force will have the side effect of cutting benzene from all of these sources, reducing benzene from its 1999 level of 250,000 tons, the most recent figure available.

The agency estimated that the new rule, called the Mobile Source Air Toxics rule, would result in 33,000 tons of reductions by 2015. Those reductions, combined with the additional reductions that were side benefits of other rules, would cut the benzene levels down to 108,000 tons.

"Cars and trucks put out a whole toxic soup of pollutants," Emily Figdor of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group, one of the two groups that sued the agency, said in an interview. "The administration is going after one of them. Benzene poses a whole host of health risks. It's a good thing that they strengthened the standard."

But Charles Drevna, the executive vice president of the National Petrochemical and Refiners Association, said the agency had "thrown a curve" by insisting on a ceiling on the amount of benzene in any refinery's gasoline, which limits the refinery's ability to use allowances.

"Certain areas are going to have a much more difficult time," Mr. Drevna said, including those refineries in the Pacific Northwest and the Rocky Mountains.

California's current standard for benzene is already below the new national standard, so that state's 13 refineries are not affected. Highly industrialized areas like the Northeast and the Chicago area are already required to produce what is known as reformulated gasoline, and so their benzene levels have been reduced somewhat in recent years, though not as much as they will be under the new rule.

Mr. Drevna said that a spate of new rules, including a rule making steep cuts in the sulfur content of diesel fuel and a separate rule reducing the sulfur content of gasoline, have put a burden on refiners.

Mr. Wehrum, of the federal agency, said the trading program was designed "to allow the flexibility for industry to find the most cost-effective place to spend."

For Mr. Drevna, it was not flexible enough.

For Marti Sinclair of the Sierra Club, which was also a plaintiff in the lawsuit, it was too much.

DOJ_NMG_0131087

"We are happy that E.P.A. has addressed this important public health issue at last," Ms. Sinclair said in a statement, adding, "It is disappointing that E.P.A. would undermine its own program by adopting this dangerous trading scheme."

Frankenfood? (WP)

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

EVER SINCE the Food and Drug Administration officially vouched for the safety of food derived from cloned animals last month, Americans have given themselves a long and unnecessary national stomachache. Citing concerns over everything from safety to ethics, many of them told pollsters that they are apprehensive about milk and meat from clones entering supermarkets. Members of Congress are preparing to push legislation requiring food from clones and their progeny to be labeled as such. And, The Post's Rick Weiss reported recently, a new controversy is brewing over whether food providers can label products from the offspring of cloned animals as "organic," even if ranchers follow federal criteria for such labels.

All of which is to say that there is a lot of misunderstanding about the issue of cloning livestock for food production. One of the most common -- and commonly exploited -- misconceptions is that once the meat and milk industries begin selling food from clones and their offspring, animal products from clones will flood supermarkets. In fact, cloning animals is very expensive; ranchers would not clone an animal only to slaughter it. Instead, ranchers will clone animals with desirable traits, such as leaner meat, and breed the resulting genetic copies with other animals, bettering herds over the course of generations.

The process is almost identical to time-tested methods of animal husbandry, and it is very similar to modern crop breeding. The result for consumers is consistently better meat and other animal products from the progeny of clones, which experts agree are safe to eat, not from clones themselves, which are also safe but which contain subtle genetic differences from parent animals that anti-cloning activists exploit to stoke public outcry. High-quality animal products will probably also become more abundant and, therefore, cheaper.

As the debate over cloned food intensifies -- expect a battle involving the cloning industry, anti-cloning advocates, the FDA and Congress this year -- it is important for the public not to overestimate the differences between cloning livestock for the purpose of breeding and what American ranchers and breeders already do to better their flocks and herds. The facts are less threatening than many Americans realize.

U.S., Latin American Authorities Pledge United Front Against Gangs (LAT)

By Patrick Mcgreevy, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

An international summit on transnational gangs wrapped up in Universal City on Friday with an agreement between U.S. and Latin American law enforcement leaders to begin crafting four initiatives, including one to improve intelligence sharing on criminals who move back and forth over borders.

Three other proposals to be discussed when the officials meet again in April in El Salvador include:

· Creating an international prevention campaign using sports celebrities and singers to urge kids to stay out of gangs.

· Developing an exchange program in which U.S. mid- and high-level law enforcement officials would be embedded in Central American and Mexican agencies and Latin American officials would spend time in the U.S.

· Creating a "Top 20" fugitive program that would identify the worst of the worst transnational gang members so border guards could be on the lookout for them in all of the countries.

"We have arrested people here who were deported five times, so we want to put some of them on the list so we look harder at the border for the worst of the worst," said Robert Loosle, special agent in charge of the criminal section of the FBI's Los Angeles office.

More than 100 federal agents, police chiefs and prosecutors from the U.S. and law enforcement officials from Belize, Honduras, Guatemala, Mexico, Canada and El Salvador attended the three-day summit at the Universal City Hilton to discuss the problems that occur when hardened gang criminals enter the U.S. illegally and then are deported back to Latin America.

"There was agreement that we need to vary our way of sharing information with special operating mechanisms not only on the law enforcement side but also on the prevention piece," said Rodrigo Avila-Aviles, director general of the El Salvador National Civil Police.

Officials from Interpol and the U.S. National Gang Intelligence Center provided expertise at the summit on ways to develop databases that can share information on gangs throughout the region.

Augusto Del Pino, deputy attorney general from the Mexican state of Chiapas, said the conference was important because it opened lines of communication and created relationships that can assist all of the nations.

"To me this was a very important summit because we were able to gather information, exchange it, and make a review of the system and judicial and police operations," Del Pino said.

The group also discussed ways to alert Mexican authorities when a gang member in the U.S. adopts an alias that he then tries to use upon returning to Mexico.

"We will be able to identify the people we have caught and we have in prison [when] they change names and pretend to be somebody else," Del Pino said.

Also aiding the effort was the announcement this week by U.S. Atty. Gen. Alberto R. Gonzales that the federal government would accelerate implementation of the Central American Fingerprinting Exploitation system, which will help track gang members.

Los Angeles Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa and Police Chief William J. Bratton said they planned to travel to El Salvador in April to continue talks on ways to cooperate with their Central American counterparts.

"Many of the gangs that start here — from 18th Street to MS to the Crips and the Bloods — started here in Los Angeles, went across the country, and in the case of the first two have gone to Mexico, Latin America and beyond," Villaraigosa said. "So we are coordinating our efforts."

FBI Laud$ Anti-drug Work By City Police (PHDN)

By Christine Olley

Philadelphia Daily News, February 10, 2007

The Philadelphia division of the FBI gave the Philadelphia Police Department a pat on the back yesterday for its work in trying to cripple the city's lucrative drug trade.

Special Agent in Charge J.P. Weis lauded the efforts of Police Commissioner Sylvester Johnson, Deputy Commissioner Richard Ross and leaders of the Narcotics Bureau, and presented them with a commemorative plaque and a check for approximately $2 million, which represented a portion of the money they had seized jointly during the 2005-06 fiscal year.

He said of the relationship between the two agencies, "It illustrates the camaraderie between these two units that transcends mere cooperation."

Last year, Weis said, drug seizures and monetary forfeitures in the city totaled close to $3 million.

Just this week, police stopped a tractor-trailer with a Texas license plate on Aramingo Avenue in Port Richmond and found 100 kilos of cocaine with an estimated street value of $10 million.

Forfeitures as large as Monday's are what Weis describes as a powerful tool against drug acitivity.

"Forfeitures are a way to disrupt and dismantle criminal activity," he said.

"Why should the subjects still have access to the proceeds of their illegal activities?" he asked.

Husband Of Former FBI Tech Admits To Conspiracy Over 'ice' (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, February 10, 2007

The spouse of a former FBI technician has admitted to conspiring with others to possess with intent to distribute more than 500 grams, or 1.1 pounds, of methamphetamine.

Eric "Babu" Moniz, 35, of Waialua pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court to the charge, punishable by a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison.

Moniz was one of 23 individuals indicted by a federal grand jury in April after an internal FBI investigation. The FBI began surveillance of employee Charmaine Moniz, wife of Eric Moniz, and her activities at work. They discovered she had been accessing a confidential database and reviewing documents relating to her husband's longtime friend Damien Kalei Hina, an alleged drug dealer in Waialua, as well as Jonathan Kimo Luna and Jess Lundgren.

Charmaine Moniz pleaded guilty earlier in federal court to accessing the FBI's database to obtain information about active investigations involving her husband's associates and warning her husband to stay away from them. She is awaiting sentencing.

Three police officers, including Bryson Apo, who also pleaded guilty yesterday to conspiracy, were among the people indicted in April.

In a plea agreement filed in court yesterday, Eric Moniz admitted that from 2002 until 2004, he agreed to hold "pound quantities" of methamphetamine for Hina.

He also admitted that during the same period he occasionally received lesser quantities of methamphetamine that he distributed to others, and also held onto Hina's drug proceeds.

In exchange for Moniz's plea and his willingness to cooperate and testify against others if asked, the government is expected to dismiss a drug possession charge against him that is contained in a second indictment, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni.

Moniz will be sentenced Aug. 6.

Spouse Of FBI Former Technician Pleads Guilty (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

HONOLULU (AP) _ The spouse of a former FBI technician pleaded guilty Friday to conspiring with others with the intent to distribute more than 500 grams of methamphetamine.

Eric ``Babu'' Moniz of Waialua, Hawaii, admitted to the charges in U-S District Court.

Moniz faces a mandatory minimum of 10 years in federal prison when sentenced August 6th.

The F-B-I's investigation of Eric's wife, Charmaine Moniz, led to a two-year drug and gambling probe that resulted in charges filed against more than 35 people.

The F-B-I had said Moniz divulged sensitive information to drug dealers on Oahu's North Shore in 2003 and 2004.

In a plea agreement filed in court yesterday, Eric Moniz admitted that from 2002 until 2004, he agreed to hold ``pound quantities'' of methamphetamine for an alleged drug dealer.

Police Officer Pleads Guilty In Gambling Scheme (HONADV)

By Ken Kobayashi, Advertiser Courts Writer

Honolulu Advertiser, February 10, 2007

A second Honolulu police officer has pleaded guilty in a scheme to protect an illegal cockfight and gambling operation in Waialua.

Bryson Apo, 31, admitted yesterday that he provided the operators information about when police would raid the illegal activities and also acknowledged that he would bet on the cockfights "from time to time" during the 2004 to 2005 cockfighting season.

"I did provide inside information to the gambling operation in Waialua," he told U.S. District Judge Susan Oki Mollway.

Apo, an eight-year veteran of the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiring to obstruct the enforcement of criminal laws, a charge that carries a prison term of up to five years. But federal advisory sentencing guidelines call for a lesser prison term.

Apo remains free on bond and is scheduled to be sentenced by Mollway on May 29.

Police officer Glenn Miram pleaded guilty to the conspiracy charge last year and is scheduled to be sentenced this year.

The two are among three Honolulu officers charged last year in connection with the cockfight, card game and dice operation across the street from Waialua Elementary School. The charges were the result of a massive FBI wiretap operation into gambling, drug and other illegal activities.

Kevin Brunn, the third officer, is awaiting trial.

Others charged as a result of the FBI probe are officers Barry Tong, charged with illegal possession of a firearm, and John Cambra IV, who was charged with trying to prevent the FBI from recovering cockfight gaffs. They are awaiting trial.

Also charged in an extortion case were former Aloha Stadium security chief Herbert Naone and former Honolulu Liquor Commission inspector James Rodenhurst. Both pleaded guilty and are awaiting sentencing.

About 30 others also were charged with offenses ranging from gambling to drug violations.

Apo yesterday admitted to the case against him as outlined by Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni. The prosecutor told the judge that Apo conspired with Miram and the operators of the cockfight and gambling enterprise to help protect the activities by telling them when police would raid the place.

Apo admitted that on one occasion, in January 2005, he told one of the leaders to shut down the Waialua cockfights because he got the information "straight from the horse's mouth."

On another occasion, in December 2004, he learned that the gambling detail "would hit Wai'anae tomorrow" so the Waialua cockfights could be held without "law enforcement intervention," Apo acknowledged.

Apo declined to comment after the hearing.

Officer Warned Cockfighters (HSB)

By Debra Barayuga

Honolulu Star-Bulletin, February 10, 2007

Apo pleads guilty to telling gamblers on the North Shore of likely police raids

A Honolulu police officer has admitted he warned operators of cockfighting and gambling operations in Waialua of impending law enforcement raids.

Bryson Apo, 31, pleaded guilty yesterday in U.S. District Court to conspiring with more than five others, including members of a large landowning family in Waialua and two other police officers, to obstruct the enforcement of state laws prohibiting illegal gambling, specifically cockfighting, craps and card games.

"As a police officer, I provided inside information to gambling organizations in Waialua," Apo said yesterday during questioning by U.S. District Judge Susan Mollway.

"I was not supposed to give out the information," he said, but did so to assist the activities and despite knowing that they were illegal.

Apo, a member of the Windward Crime Reduction Unit who is currently on paid administrative leave, was charged in an indictment along with co-defendants, Officers Kevin Brunn and Glenn Miram. The indictment stemmed from a two-year federal investigation that began in 2003 into illegal gambling and cockfighting in the rural North Shore town.

The illegal businesses flourished mainly on private property across from Waialua Elementary School on Waialua Beach Road that is owned by the family of co-defendant Charles Gilman.

According to a plea agreement, Apo admitted to receiving or obtaining "on a regular basis" between November 2004 and March 2005 information about when the gambling detail was going to raid the Waialua cockfights.

He provided the tips to operators of the cockfights and co-defendants Gilman, John Saguibo, Douglas Gilman Sr., Douglas Gilman Jr., Micha Terragna and William Gilman.

The information, which included dates of impending raids on Waialua and Waianae operations, was obtained from one or more gambling detail officers whom Apo did not identify.

Those officers knew, however, that Apo was going to provide it to the operators of the cockfights, which operated continuously for more than 30 days and had gross revenues of $2,000 in any single day, according to the plea agreement.

Had the case gone to trial, prosecutors would have presented evidence of telephone conversations obtained from wiretaps federal agents placed on the phone lines of Apo, Saguibo and Charles Gilman, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Florence Nakakuni.

Calls between Saguibo and co-defendant Terragna were also intercepted in which they discussed payment to Terragna and her husband, Officer Kevin Brunn, a 21-year police veteran, Nakakuni said.

Apo and his attorney, First Assistant Federal Defender Alexander Silvert, declined to comment further on the case.

Apo, the second officer to plead guilty in this case, faces a maximum of five years in federal prison and up to a $250,000 fine when sentenced May 29. He remains free while awaiting sentencing under bail conditions imposed earlier by the court.

Miram, who resigned last year after seven years on the police force, pleaded guilty to conspiracy in December. He will be sentenced April 2.

Colombia Receives Drug Suspect Sought By U.S. And Jailed In Cuba (NYT)

By James C. McKinley, Simon Romero

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MEXICO CITY, Feb. 9 — The leader of a Colombian drug cartel that American prosecutors say flooded New York City streets with cocaine remained in custody in Colombia on Friday awaiting extradition, after Cuba turned him over to the authorities there.

Cuba's decision to send the suspect, Luis Hernando Gómez Bustamante, to Colombia surprised American authorities, law enforcement officials said. Cuba's government has no diplomatic relations with the United States, and some people charged with crimes on American soil have found a haven in Havana.

Not Mr. Gómez Bustamante. He arrived in Bogotá late Thursday on a Colombian Air Force plane after Cuban authorities handed him over to Colombian antinarcotics agents.

Mr. Gómez Bustamante, the reputed boss of the Norte del Valle cartel who is known as Rasguño, had been held in Cuba since 2004, when he was arrested on immigration charges. He is wanted in New York City on charges of money laundering, racketeering and drug smuggling.

During the 1990s, his organization was one of the most violent, lucrative and extensive cocaine-smuggling rings in the world, accounting for at least 30 percent of the cocaine being imported into the United States, Justice Department officials said.

Cuban officials gave no reason for their decision Thursday, and prosecutors in the United States declined to comment on the matter.

Last year, Mr. Gómez Bustamante told a Colombian reporter that he wanted to be released from his Cuban prison, even if it meant standing trial in the United States. Mario Iguarán, Colombia's attorney general, suggested that the extradition stemmed from the prisoner's wishes. A spokesman for the Justice Department confirmed that the United States was seeking to bring Mr. Gómez Bustamante to the United States for trial.

His extradition would be a major victory for federal investigators and prosecutors in New York City, who built a case against him over a decade. Investigators started out looking into businesses in Queens that wired money to Colombia.

Those modest inquiries eventually led to the indictment of Juan Alberto Monsalve, who prosecutors charge was the cartel's boss in New York. In May 2002, he pleaded guilty to drug trafficking and murder. He is now serving a life term.

Two years later, Mr. Gómez Bustamante was indicted on racketeering charges along with eight others, and Colombian authorities seized $100 million worth of Mr. Bustamante's assets. He fled to Cuba but never got past customs and immigration.

Investigators Hired By New York City For Out-of-state Gun Stings Could Be Breaking The Law (AP)

By Samantha Gross, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 10, 2007

(AP) - NEW YORK-Private investigators hired by the city to conduct sting operations on out-of-state gun shops could be breaking the law, and the dealers they caught making illegal sales will not be prosecuted, federal officials said.

City officials have sued more than two dozen dealers after hiring investigators to pose as buyers attempting straw purchases, in which one person fills out the paperwork for the gun but is buying for someone else. The scam is often used by convicted felons and others barred from owning firearms.

The city argues that the shops - in Georgia, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina and Virginia - are responsible for many of the illegal weapons that end up in New York, and the suits have led seven dealers to agree to more scrutiny.

The federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives announced in May it was reviewing whether the city acted legally.

"Potential legal liabilities" arise when civilians do the work of law enforcers, Department of Justice spokesman Bryan Sierra said Thursday. The department has decided charges are not warranted against dealers in the sting cases, he said.

It was unclear whether the private investigators could face charges.

After the Justice Department decided not to base criminal prosecutions on the stings, Deputy Mayor Ed Skyler said that "the preferred solution" is getting legal agreements with the shops to monitor their sales practices but that the city also plans to retain its right to continue the operations.

Some of the gun sellers have asked a judge to dismiss the lawsuits, saying the city is out of bounds because the dealers are not doing business in New York.

Gun rights advocates have criticized the sting operations, and the Second Amendment Foundation issued a statement Thursday calling the Department of Justice's findings a "significant victory."

IMMIGRATION:

U.S. Gives Tour Of Family Detention Center That Critics Liken To A Prison (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

TAYLOR, Tex., Feb. 9 — Responding to complaints about conditions at the nation's main family detention center for illegal immigrants, officials threw open the gates on Friday for a first news media tour.

They portrayed the privately run converted prison, open since May, as a model facility "primarily focused on the safety of the children."

Once all the barbed wire comes down, Gary Mead, an Immigration and Customs Enforcement official, said, "it's going to look more like a community college with a very high chain-link fence."

Among other things, critics have complained about the prisonlike conditions, the food and the limited amount of schooling and recreation provided for children.

Inside the fluorescent-lighted corridors, plastic plants had been hurriedly installed and some areas repainted, lawyers for some detainees said, and officials acknowledged that pizza was on the lunch menu for the first time. The detainees could not be interviewed.

DOJ_NMG_0131092

The facility, the T. Don Hutto Family Detention Center, is operated for the government by the Corrections Corporation of America, under a $2.8-million-a-month contract with Williamson County. It is named for a founder of the company, which runs 64 facilities in 19 states.

It now holds about 400 illegal immigrants, including 170 children, in family groups from nearly 30 countries, Mr. Mead said. He called it a humane alternative to splitting up families while insuring their presence at legal proceedings.

There is only one other family detention center in the country, the smaller Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, a former nursing home, in Leesport, Pa.

Critics said the picture presented on Friday conflicted with what they had observed.

"At Hutto, we found prisonlike conditions imposed on families with no criminal background, including asylum seekers," said Michelle Brané, a lawyer for the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children and the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service who co-authored a report on family detention to be released on Feb. 22.

Barbara Hines, clinical professor of law at the University of Texas at Austin who runs an immigration clinic and has visited clients inside, said Friday that "I don't think children should be incarcerated at all."

The law required the government to hold families in the least restrictive conditions possible, Ms. Hines said, adding, "I was shocked, and I have been doing this 30 years."

The American Civil Liberties Union has also been studying conditions as it considers filing a lawsuit contending that the government was violating a 1997 settlement on the treatment of detained juveniles.

"To call it a family residential center is to mask what's going on," said Vanita Gupta, a lawyer with the A.C.L.U. "They may be cleaning up conditions, but at the end of the day it still begs the question of why they are using such a Draconian system."

Another A.C.L.U. lawyer, Lisa Graybill, legal director, said after visiting, "I can't describe how depressed people are in there."

Outside the blocky buildings with thin slit windows, protesters from a local group called Texans United for Families held up signs saying, "Don't Jail Children for Profit."

"If they can put an ankle bracelet on Martha Stewart so she doesn't run off to Jamaica," said a protester, Jose Ortan, a computer technician, "they can find ways to do it for immigrant families."

Some of the harshest criticism of the center came last week from members of a Palestinian family held there for three months for overstaying a visa. They were released after an immigration appeals board unexpectedly reopened their plea for amnesty based on new conditions — danger from the Hamas takeover in the Palestinian territories.

Hamzeh Ibrahim, 15, said his father was sent to a facility in West Texas while his pregnant mother shared a cell-like room with the family's 5-year-old girl; two other girls, 7 and 13, shared another room. He said they had to clean their rooms and the communal shower. "I cleaned for me and my mom because she is pregnant and her back hurt," he said.

Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials who traveled from Washington to lead the tour with company staff members showed off one of the 11 dormitory areas, or pods, lined by bare pastel-tinted detainee rooms, each with a metal bunk bed, a sink and a toilet.

The rooms are not locked at night, but a laser beam alerts guards if anyone leaves a room after bedtime — 9 p.m. for children and 10 for adults. The detainees wear outfits of green and blue, which Danny Coronado, a spokesman for the corrections company, likened to scrubs but critics described as prison garb.

Officials say stays at the center are now averaging a little more than a month.

In the dining area, which has plastic tables with stools attached, Mr. Mead said, "All of our meals are planned by dietitians with calories of 3,200 a day, 3,500 for children."

Disputing claims by some lawyers that many detainees had lost weight there, Dr. Leroy T. Soto, the chief physician on duty, said a study had actually documented weight gains. There is a medical staff of 20.

Lawyers said detainees were rushed through meals in 15 or 20 minutes. Mr. Mead acknowledged "they can't linger," but said it was because of classes or other activities.

Showing off a classroom with computers, Jean Bellinger, assistant administrator for programs, said children were divided into three age groups comparable to elementary, middle and high school for four hours' a day of instruction plus an hour's recreation and lunch. But she acknowledged that for several months a staff shortage limited class time to an hour a day.

That was far too little, said Scott Medlock, a prison rights lawyer for the Texas Civil Rights Project.

Media Gets Look At Immigrant Center (DMN)

By Paul Meyer

The Dallas Morning News, February 10, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0131093

TAYLOR – It looks like a maximum-security daycare. Razor wire, strung high atop security fences, surrounds a "Backyard Adventures" swing set. Fake trees soften entrances to sunless cellblocks. And Sony PlayStations entertain immigrant children where Texas criminals once served hard time.

Depending on whom you ask, this former jail turned immigration detention facility is either a national human rights blight or the newest and most humane way to keep track of families facing deportation.

On Friday, amid mounting criticism, federal officials offered the media a first look inside Central Texas' T. Don Hutto Family Residential Facility, one of two detention centers in the country for immigrant families, mostly mothers and children.

The center, just northeast of Austin, has been home to three North Texas Palestinian families in recent months, including members of the Ibrahim family, whose controversial detention sparked a new round of criticism last week.

The federal government opened Hutto in May, responding to complaints about the government's "catch-and-release" policy that allowed illegal immigrants to remain free until their hearings. In many cases, they would skip the hearings and go unapprehended.

But human rights observers and civil rights advocates have condemned the decision to keep children in Hutto, citing abuses that include inadequate education, weight loss and psychological trauma. The government, they say, has a responsibility to find less-restrictive environments when the incarceration of minors is necessary.

The government denies the abuses.

"I think the criticisms are unfounded and based on limited anecdotal information," said Gary Mead, assistant director for the detention and removal operations of Immigration and Customs Enforcement.

Mr. Mead, who led Friday's carefully choreographed tour, painted a picture of a place far removed from a penal environment – a place where children receive five hours of academic education daily, use a computer lab, play in a gymnasium and receive attentive medical care.

The 512-bed Hutto center, run for the government by the privately owned Corrections Corp. of America, houses mostly Latin American families from countries other than Mexico.

AP / Department of Homeland Security Family detainees walk down the hall at the T. Don Hutto Residential Center in a photo provided by the Department of Homeland Security.

Others suggested that Friday's tour was nothing more than a staged charade, held after days of prettying up the former prison to make it seem less harsh.

"The Hutto facility in particular is still very much of a prison setting," said Michelle Brané of the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, a national advocacy group.

"It's a former prison, and it still looks like a prison. We don't believe that a prisonlike facility is appropriate for housing families."

Ms. Brané is co-author of a study, set for release on Feb. 22, critical of the government's new family detention practices and the Hutto facility specifically. She has visited Hutto and the nation's other family detention center, a former nursing home in Pennsylvania.

Barbara Hines, a University of Texas at Austin law professor and director of the law school's immigration clinic, confirmed this week that the clinic is exploring legal action to stop the detention of children in Hutto, in conjunction with the American Civil Liberties Union.

But on Friday, workers inside Hutto defended their attempts to provide a safe and humane environment, replete with certified teachers who work with nine classrooms of students from as far away as El Salvador, Iraq and Somalia.

"They care ... and they've been hurt by the press," said Jean Bellinger, assistant administrator of programs for CCA.

Irving resident Nazmieh Juma Hazahza said there is only one way to describe her experience at the Hutto facility where she lived with her 11-year-old son, Mohammad: like being in hell.

"A prison is a prison, no matter what. ... For me it was very hard, being there day after day, each day worse than the next one," said Mrs. Hazahza, who was released from the detention center Wednesday evening, after spending more than three months in custody.

The Hazahzas are one of three Dallas-area Palestinian families recently detained inside Hutto. While one family has been deported to Jordan, the Hazahzas and the Ibrahims have been released.

AP Fake plants are among the items recently added to the facility.

Salaheddin Ibrahim, who was being held apart from his family at a facility near Abilene, was released Friday, a day after an immigration judge set his bail at $30,000, said his brother, Ahmad. Mr. Ibrahim's wife and fourchildren, ages 5 to 15, were released Feb. 3 from Hutto, where they had been held since their arrest Nov. 2.

"It's just ridiculous to hold young children," said the Hazahzas' attorney, Michelle Saez-Rodriguez. "No. 1, they're lacking education, and there's no way a facility like that can provide proper education for children."

"If you have one adult member of the family [detained], that should be enough leverage."

Mrs. Hazahza and her son were sent to Hutto on an outstanding deportation order after the family's political asylum request was denied. Like many others from Palestinian areas, they have been unable to obtain travel documents to leave the U.S.

Mrs. Hazahza's account of ill treatment inside Hutto is similar to that of other former detainees interviewed by The Dallas Morning News and by lawyers of clients inside the facility.

"The way we were treated is not good for any child or woman," she said. "I feel like I lost my mind. I could not eat the food, it was so bad."

Mrs. Hazahza said she had medical problems, with back and neck pain, but when she asked for assistance, all she got was over-the-counter pain medicine.

Thomas Hochberg, the U.S. Public Health Service administrator in charge of Hutto, defended the facility's medical care Friday, citing a staff that includes a doctor, full-time dentist and two mental heath professionals.

Mrs. Hazahza said that about two weeks ago, she started noticing efforts by the center officials to make the facility look better.

Mohammad said he now knows why: "The only reason they did it was because they were going to bring cameras in."

Mr. Mead said Hutto represented a well-thought-out effort to keep families together while better enforcing immigration laws. He said it also serves as a deterrent to smugglers using children as shields to escape arrest and deportation.

Hutto houses about 380 detainees. Less than 10 percent of the population is male and the average stay for immigrants not facing asylum cases is about 40 days, Mr. Mead said. One detainee seeking asylum has been in Hutto for 205 days, he confirmed.

"Everything we do here begins with the safety of children," he said.

Ms. Brané and others, however, say the human toll is greater than whatever immigration enforcement benefit the facility may represent.

"I think one of the primary things we're concerned about is the psychological effect [on children]", she said.

Immigration's Net Binds Children Too (LAT)

By Nicole Gaouette, Miguel Bustillo

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

TAYLOR, TEXAS — Khadijah Bessuges is confined by metal gates and razor wire. She wears a uniform. She sleeps in an 8-by-15 cell, and stands by her cot four times a day when the guards count heads. She has only two pairs of panties. Her favorite teddy bear was confiscated. But she has her father, Sebastien, who sleeps in the cell with her.

Khadijah is 9 years old.

She is one of 208 children being held with their parents at the T. Don Hutto family detention center, the Department of Homeland Security's answer to the problem of families caught living in or entering the country illegally.

"It's not a good place for people," Khadijah said in a recent telephone interview. "People here get sad, and they don't want to be here. They want to be with their families."

Hutto, which opened in May 2006, is a pillar of the Bush administration's effort to crack down on illegal immigrants and detain them until their appeals can be heard. It holds detainees who cannot easily be sent home, as Mexicans can. Hutto has families from 29 countries, most from South America.

The center is touted by the Homeland Security Department as a major achievement, and may be a model for future facilities. Hutto also illustrates the administration's bind as its pursuit of border security collides with the reality that many illegal immigrants are minors.

On Friday, a majority of Hutto's 383 inmates were children.

Immigrant advocates and human rights groups ask why Khadijah and the others are jailed for their parents' actions.

"Children being in jail with their parents is what is morally and ethically wrong with this picture," said attorney Frances Valdez of the University of Texas Immigration Law Clinic, who has clients at Hutto.

A former prison northeast of Austin, Hutto is run by a for-profit company with a controversial record. And though the facility is meant for detention measured in days, many immigrants are detained for months.

The average stay is about 55 days for asylum seekers, 40 for others, officials said.

The longest any family has stayed is 205 days. At Immigration and Customs Enforcement's other family facility, in Pennsylvania, the average stay is 59 days, activists say.

Attorneys say children at Hutto lose weight because of substandard food and suffer from untreated medical problems. Adults and children are given an hour of recreation a day, and chances to venture outdoors are rare.

DOJ_NMG_0131095

The adults may be seeking asylum or may have been charged with violating immigration laws, like Khadijah's father. They have not been charged with other crimes. Sebastien Bessuges, 30, a Frenchman who last year married an American, was arrested for overstaying his visa; Khadijah, a French and Mexican citizen from a previous marriage, had overstayed her visa too.

Immigrants make up the fastest-growing group of people incarcerated in the U.S., according to the American Bar Assn. The immigration agency holds more than 200,000 people over the course of a year at more than 300 sites.

For the administration and attorneys, family detention is largely uncharted territory. "Standards for family detention do not exist in the U.S.," said Michelle Brane of the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children. "That's just one of our concerns."

Immigration officials have asked Brane's group and others to discuss creating standards for family detention.

Congress did not have Hutto in mind when it directed Homeland Security in 2005 and 2006 to stop separating families and house them in nonpenal, homelike environments. It suggested methods such as electronic monitoring, which is being tested in eight cities. Advocates for immigrants point to a San Diego family shelter run by nuns as another possible model.

Concerns about Hutto are rising. A government commission issued a "report card" Thursday that gave Homeland Security a failing grade on its treatment of asylum seekers. A Texas legislator has introduced a resolution condemning the jailing of children, local groups have held vigils outside Hutto, the American Civil Liberties Union is considering a lawsuit, and a Latino advocacy group has demanded an investigation.

"We want to know what's going on there," said Rosa Rosales, president of the League of United Latin American Citizens. "Putting immigrants in concentration camps should not be happening in the United States."

Officials play down the complaints. "I don't think the criticisms are fair," said Gary Mead, assistant director for Immigration and Customs' detention and removal operations. "This is run as a family shelter; it's not run as a jail. There is medical care; the meals are nutritious. Do people complain? They probably do — they're being detained. They were here illegally and now they're facing, in some cases, certain removal."

In November 2005, Homeland Security officials announced the Secure Border Initiative, an effort to end illegal border crossings. Secretary Michael Chertoff had identified families as a particular problem because the department lacked facilities to detain them. Human rights groups protested separations.

"We could let families go or split them up," Mead said. "Hutto became very important to ending that."

The facility is run by the Corrections Corp. of America, a government contractor paid $95 per person a day. Watchdogs have found mismanagement at Corrections Corp. facilities, including inadequate medical care, failure to control violence, and substandard conditions.

In the two weeks since Sebastien and Khadijah Bessuges arrived, Homeland Security has upgraded Hutto. Razor wire has been removed from the entrance. Artificial plants camouflage the iron entry gates. Walls and doors are plastered in brightly colored paper, cheerful stickers and big letters. But the decor, installed before a media tour Friday, cannot disguise the fact that Hutto is a prison.

"We have tried to soften the facility as much as possible," said Mead, who led the tour.

The Homeland Security Department also has tried to improve the food, say immigrants' advocates, who attribute the changes to media attention. The department has expanded Hutto's academic programs from an hour a day to four, and plans to introduce a curriculum based on Texas standards.

Last week, inmates staged a hunger strike to protest the food and other conditions. Sebastien Bessuges said Khadijah had lost 4 pounds at Hutto.

Homeland Security officials countered Friday with a study showing that 81% of Hutto detainees gained weight during their stay.

Advocates and attorneys concerned about the facility say the medical care is insufficient and there is no pediatrician.

Lawyer Griselda Ponce said one client's untreated leg injury eventually required emergency surgery, and a 4-year-old girl's lips cracked and bled before medical staff would respond to her mother's requests for balm.

Children and parents can blow off steam an hour a day in a gym. The rest of the time, they are kept in pods of several cells. Some locks are disengaged, then armed at night with lasers and alarms.

Bessuges said Khadijah had quarreled with other children and guards had told him he must hold her in check or damage his chances of avoiding deportation.

"Yesterday, I … found out she was removed from school in Arizona because of all the time she's missed," he said, his voice quieting.

"But I can't tell her that. That would break her heart."

Bessuges had visited a federal immigration center last month to see what forms he needed to extend his stay in the U.S. The next day, immigration agents raided his suburban Phoenix home and detained him and Khadijah.

DOJ_NMG_0131096

The following day, Bessuges said, immigration officials gave him a choice: He and his daughter could stay in Arizona in separate detention centers, or they could board a plane for the Texas detention center and be together.

"I would never leave her," Bessuges said. "It's fine to make me pay for the mistakes I have made. But … no child deserves this."

Policy On Asylum-Seekers Faulted (WP)

By Darryl Fears

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The U.S. Commission on International Religious Freedom has issued a report that sharply criticizes federal immigration authorities for rounding up asylum-seekers at the border, detaining them for months in prisonlike facilities and quickly dispatching them back to the countries they fled.

Thursday's report by the bipartisan panel was a follow-up to one two years ago that reported similar findings about detention and expedited removal. It said the Department of Homeland Security and two of its agencies -- the U.S. Border Patrol and Immigration and Customs Enforcement -- did not act on its recommendations and made little effort to help asylum-seekers.

In more than half of arrests, immigration officials did not advise asylum-seekers to ask for protection if they were afraid of returning home, even though they are required to do so, the report said. Sworn statements were often not verbatim but were used against asylum-seekers when they appeared before immigration judges. Asylum-seekers have a right to review their sworn statements to correct errors but were rarely given the chance, the report said.

"We're distressed that we gave the Department of Homeland Security some very good information two years ago and they've done virtually nothing to address the problem," said Mark Hetfield, a former researcher at the federal commission who recently joined the Hebrew Immigration Aid Society. "Homeland Security is not even following its own procedures. As a result, asylum-seekers are being mistreated."

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman (I-Conn.), chairman of the homeland security committee, pledged to introduce legislation that would force officials to follow procedures. In a statement Thursday, he and Sen. Edward M. Kennedy (D-Mass.) praised the report as detailed and thorough.

"The commission's timely report exposes the flaws and inconsistencies in the expedited removal process," the senators said. "We urge members of Congress to act on the commission's findings and the shameful abuses of the current system, and reject any proposals that would make it even more difficult for persons fleeing human rights abuses to seek safe haven in the United States."

The commission's report includes recommendations from two years ago and a report card that gives failing grades to the Border Patrol for not implementing them. The recommendations called on immigration officials to have testers verify that procedures are followed, to make sure that sworn statements are verbatim before immigration hearings and to not jail law-abiding asylum-seekers.

Last year, a three-member panel of immigration judges in San Diego ordered the release of a Sri Lankan asylum-seeker who had been detained since 2001 because the government said it had secret information that linked him to the Tamil Tigers guerrilla group. The decision was among the first to challenge the Bush administration's assertion that it may hold suspects indefinitely on terrorism charges.

In recent weeks, Homeland Security officials have come under fire for interpreting anti-terrorism laws in a way that hurts people seeking asylum and refugee status in the United States. People who were forced to aid terrorist groups, and were even abused in some cases, have been labeled as sympathizers and deported. The agency has since started reviewing individual cases and issuing waivers.

Homeland Security officials say they are following strict anti-terrorism laws created under the USA Patriot Act and the Real ID Act, which place the burden on immigrants to prove that they were jailed or otherwise persecuted in their country of origin.

Stabler Selling Ono Island Home For Taxes (MR)

By Brendan Kirby, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), February 10, 2007

Former football great and University of Alabama broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed to put his longtime house near Orange Beach up for sale to pay off tax debts, court records indicate.

DOJ_NMG_0131097

Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the U.S. Department of Justice asked a federal judge in Mobile this week to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell. Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. was out of the office Thursday and Friday and did not rule on the request, but judges typically grant such motions when none of the parties opposes it.

The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000.

Stabler's lawyer, Robert Galloway, said Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money. Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case.

"We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it," he said. "This is the time of the year that houses sell."

The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001. The federal government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000.

The civil action accuses Stabler of moving money from the company to his personal account to avoid paying corporate taxes. It states that he transferred nearly $1.4 million from the Stabler Co. to himself in the form of "loans" in 1998 and 1999. At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint.

"If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations," the suit states.

Galloway disputed that Stabler was trying to hide any assets. He suggested that confusion over income generated by the company caused the tax problems. Money essentially got taxed twice, once as business income and then again as personal income to Stabler, Galloway said. He added that he does not know why Stabler created the company rather than charge payments directly for his appearances.

Galloway said Stabler has not been accused of failing to file returns.

"He's been filing returns and didn't always have the money to pay the taxes," he said.

As the house sits on the market, Galloway said, he will continue to negotiate with the IRS over the precise amount of money his client owes.

Stabler, 61, graduated from Foley High School, earning the nickname "Snake" for a long, winding touchdown run he made for the Lions. He went on to lead Paul "Bear" Bryant's University of Alabama football team to the 1965 national championship. He later starred in the NFL for 15 seasons, earning the league's most valuable player award in 1974 and directing the Oakland Raiders to their first Super Bowl in 1977.

Stabler filed for divorce from his wife in 2002. Court records in the divorce, which remains pending in Baldwin County Circuit Court, list Rose Stabler's address as the home on Ono Boulevard that the parties have agreed to sell. Kenny Stabler's address is listed on North Joachim Street in Mobile. The government has placed liens on both properties. It named Rose Stabler as a defendant because she may have a claim on the Ono Island property.

Her attorney, John Crowley, said his client does have an ownership interest in the house. He joined the request to put the tax proceedings on hold but declined further comment.

"The motion speaks for itself," he said.

Kenny Stabler Selling Home On Alabama Coast For Taxes (AP)

AP, February 10, 2007

Former football star and Crimson Tide broadcaster Kenny Stabler has agreed with the IRS to sell his Ono Island house on the Alabama coast to pay his tax debts exceeding $500,000, according to federal court records.

Attorneys for Stabler, his estranged wife, Rose Burch Stabler, and the Justice Department asked a judge in Mobile to put a lawsuit against the Stablers on hold for six months to give the property a chance to sell.

Senior U.S. District Judge Charles Butler Jr. did not immediately rule on the request filed this week.

The Justice Department in August sued the Stablers and the 61-year-old former quarterback's one-man business, the Stabler Co., seeking the seizure of the house on Ono Island, near the Alabama-Florida border, and property in Mobile to satisfy a tax debt exceeding $500,000.

Stabler lawyer Robert Galloway told the Press-Register on Friday that his client continues to dispute the amount of taxes calculated by the IRS but concedes he does owe some money.

Galloway said he is confident Stabler's half of the proceeds from a sale will be enough to resolve the case.

"We reached an agreement with the IRS that we're going to sell the house rather than have the IRS seize it," he told the Mobile newspaper for a story Saturday.

The lawsuit claims Stabler owed $241,565 in back income taxes, interest, fees and penalties as of Aug. 7. The period covered ran from 1999 to 2001.

The government claims that his company, which arranges his public speaking and consulting engagements, owed $303,282 in back income and employment taxes, interest, fees and penalties for the period between 1995 and 2000.

At the time, Stabler had complete control over the company's finances and was its only shareholder and officer, according to the complaint.

"If it had not been for the improper control exerted by Stabler over Stabler Company, the corporation would have been able to satisfy its tax obligations," the suit states.

Galloway disputed that Stabler was trying to hide any assets. He suggested that confusion over income generated by the company caused the tax problems. Money essentially got taxed twice, once as business income and then again as personal income to Stabler, Galloway said.

The attorney added that he does not know why Stabler created the company rather than charge payments directly for his appearances.

Galloway said Stabler has not been accused of failing to file returns.

"He's been filing returns and didn't always have the money to pay the taxes," he said.

Judge Rips Prosecutors Over Plea Deal (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 10, 2007

Tax preparer faces prison time, even after the U.S. Justice Department's tax division called for none

A federal judge says prosecutors ignored their own policy when they gave a lenient plea bargain to a Bountiful accountant who prepared fraudulent tax returns.

U.S. District Judge Paul Cassell refused to go along with the deal, which called for no incarceration and no restitution for Lance W. Mercer. Cassell instead ordered Mercer to spend five months in home confinement, then five months in prison and pay $11,378 to the Internal Revenue Service.

Cassell scolded the U.S. Justice Department's tax division for agreeing not to ask for any enhanced sentences under federal sentencing guidelines.

Mercer, a tax preparer with a master's degree, had a special skill that he used to cheat the government, Cassell wrote in his order. The accountant used his knowledge of what figures would appear reasonable to make returns "fly through" IRS processing, Cassell wrote.

However, prosecutors not only declined to request a sentence enhancement based on the special-skill circumstance, they actually objected to any increase, Cassell said.

The judge noted that in 2003, then-Attorney General John Ashcroft said any sentencing recommendation by the Justice Department "must honestly reflect the totality and seriousness of the defendant's conduct and must be fully consistent with the guidelines."

About the same time in 2003, Cassell noted, the Justice Department argued

to Congress that judges' failure to comply with the guidelines had resulted in reduced sentences and an erosion of the deterrent value of federal sentencing policy.

“The court firmly agrees with the generally stated position of the department that a sentencing system that involves ignoring the obvious facts is 'neither desirable nor capable of sustaining long-term public confidence,' ” Cassell said.

He stressed his criticism is not aimed at the U.S. Attorney's Office in Utah or the trial attorney assigned to defend Mercer's plea bargain.

Assistant Attorney General Eileen J. O'Connor said Thursday that the tax division adheres to "principles of federal prosecution, including DOJ policies concerning sentencing."

According to court records, the IRS became suspicious of Mercer Consulting Group because so many clients were receiving refunds or claiming an earned income credit, but had little net income.

In May 2002, one undercover agent met with Mercer and another met with his father, Lynne F. Mercer, the firm's operator. The agents allege the two prepared inaccurate tax returns for them and they launched an investigation that led to charges against the men.

Father and son both entered plea bargains. Lynne Mercer was sentenced Monday by U.S. District Judge David Sam to 18 months in prison. Lance Mercer was sentenced Jan. 10 by Cassell.

California CPA Accused Of Misrepresenting Facts (NPLT)

By John Lindenberger, The North Platte Telegraph

North Platte (NE) Telegraph, February 10, 2007

Lowell Baisden, the California accountant currently under investigation for tax fraud, is being accused of misrepresenting facts in his opposition to a preliminary injunction from the U.S. Department of Justice.

Court documents filed by Baisden's attorneys in December indicated that IRS attorney Kathryn Meyer had verified the legality of Baisden's actions and that she informed IRS agents Baisden had done nothing illegal.

However, Meyer's official declaration, which was filed Feb. 2 by Justice Department attorney Jacqueline Brown, indicate Meyer never made any statement or suggestion that Baisden's scheme was legal.

"To the contrary ... I determined that Mr. Baisden's scheme is without merit, results in a substantial understatement of his clients' federal income tax liabilities, and that an injunction against Mr. Baisden's continued use of this scheme is essential," Meyer stated in her declaration.

Thomas Cheung, the IRS agent assigned to investigate Baisden, also stated in an official declaration filed last week that he never told Baisden his tax methods were correct. Yet, Baisden has allegedly hindered the IRS investigation by telling others that Cheung and Meyer had agreed Baisden's methods were proper.

In a reply to Baisden's opposition to the preliminary injunction, Brown said Baisden has admitted to the IRS in prior interviews that he has never requested a formal determination as to the validity of his tax plan. Furthermore, Brown said the IRS has notified Baisden on several occasions that his methods are inaccurate.

"Despite such notification and rather than researching the validity of his tax promotion, he obstinately continues to advocate positions in direct contradiction with the internal revenue laws," Brown said.

Baisden has also provided false information on the tax returns he has prepared, according to Brown. Court documents indicate Baisden has filed numerous returns from 2000 to 2006 using an invalid Employer Identification Number. So far, the IRS has been unable to find any individual or company with the EIN used by Baisden.

Brown claims Baisden continues to provide false advice to his clients, as well, resulting in material harm to the clients because they, not Baisden, are the ones who are subject to penalties, interest and additional tax.

"Despite Baisden's arguments, an IRS investigation does not constitute reasonable cause for a taxpayer's complete failure to file required income tax returns, and Baisden's tax advice is incorrect," Brown states.

In response to Baisden's claim that his clients have continued to pay their estimated tax deposits even though their tax returns have not been filed, Brown said Baisden is the one who determined how much his clients should be paying. Brown said that amount is well below what his clients actually owe.

"The IRS is unable to determine whether any customers have made all of their required deposits of their actual tax liability because Baisden has not filed their tax returns, and failed to provide requested documentation," Brown said.

Even if the estimated tax deposits are correct, Brown said Baisden's clients will nevertheless owe penalties for failing to file their tax returns. These penalties can be up to 25 percent of their actual tax liabilities.

Finally, Baisden has argued that the corporations he has established for his clients have been properly created under state law and are therefore valid. Brown said the legality of these corporations is not being disputed.

"Yet, even if a corporation is validly created under state law, it must nevertheless pay all federal taxes due and cannot be used as a means by which to unlawfully underreport one's individual income," Brown said.

In the end, Brown said it is apparent from the tax returns Baisden has prepared that his goal was to create as many deductions as possible in order to unlawfully reduce his clients' reported tax liabilities.

The hearing to determine whether to grant a preliminary injunction against Baisden has been scheduled for Friday, March 2 in U.S. District Court.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Oversight Hearings Rankle Republicans (WT)

By S.A. Miller

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

Rep. Henry A. Waxman's oversight committee spent the week delving into government waste that ranged from spending in Iraq to federal drug program pricing -- inquests Republicans say mainly provided entertainment but no legislative action.

Some of the hearings of the Committee on Oversight and Government Reform were strictly "a show," said Rep. Darrell Issa, a California Republican on the panel.

He cited the hearing Wednesday with tearful testimony by family members of three civilian security workers killed and mutilated by a Fallujah mob in a widely televised attack in March 2004.

The families, who are pursuing a wrongful-death lawsuit against security contractor Blackwater USA, accused the firm of "war profiteering" and poorly equipping its bodyguards.

Mr. Issa said he hoped the committee would move beyond these hearings and make proposals to curb wasteful government spending, such as rewriting contracting and procurement rules.

But the initial hearings -- including one focusing on criticism of how U.S. officials accounted for Iraqi money spent after the fall of dictator Saddam Hussein -- rankled Republicans.

"So far it has been fairly polarizing along ideology lines," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III of Virginia, the committee's ranking Republican. "This stuff gets so polarized so fast."

He said he was ready to "enter a serious discussion" with Mr. Waxman about revising government contracting standards, issues he has worked on for years and where he said the government has made significant improvements since the 1980s.

"There is still a lot of waste that goes into the government business model," Mr. Davis said.

Mr. Waxman, California Democrat and the committee's chairman, has promised to continue the probes for the next two years, and yesterday at the hearing into accusations that drug companies overcharge Medicaid, Medicare and other federal health programs, he said the findings had set the stage for even more hearings.

"This committee will have an aggressive oversight agenda when it comes to pharmaceutical manufactures and other companies that engage in wasteful, fraudulent or abusive tactics that affect federal health care programs," Mr. Waxman said.

"This testimony we hear today will help us establish additional investigative priorities for the next two years."

Mr. Davis cautioned that the Democrat's persistent call for "more transparency" in government contracting could produce more bureaucracy and more inefficiency that further squanders taxpayer dollars.

Rep. John L. Mica, Florida Republican, said the committee was conducting a "bash-and-dash" hearing Thursday that focused on errors in a $24 billion Homeland Security contract for a new U.S. Coast Guard fleet -- problems revealed by a government audit in 2003.

He said Democrats were making a case to replace private contractors with more bureaucracy.

"The government is more effective than the private sector, that's what I'm hearing from the other side," Mr. Mica said. "I can't believe it."

Several Republicans requested proposals for corrective action from those testifying about contracting deficiencies, proposals that may be the subject of future hearings.

Rangel, McCrery Introduce Small-business Tax Cuts (HILL)

By Klaus Marre

The Hill, February 9, 2007

Ways and Means Committee Chairman Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) and ranking member Jim McCrery (R-La.) said Friday they have reached a deal on a package of tax cuts for small businesses that could smooth the path of a federal minimum wage increase to $7.25.

"This bill strengthens opportunities for small businesses and serves as a symbol of what can happen when Democrats and Republicans work together," Rangel said in a joint statement. "This tax relief will help small businesses continue to grow and hire new workers to keep our economy strong. This is a bipartisan bill providing critical momentum for the bipartisan effort to raise the minimum wage."

The revenue-neutral bill would provide nearly $2 billion in tax relief, McCrery said.

DOJ_NMG_0131101

"I believe it is important to couple a minimum wage increase with tax cuts to help businesses that will be hurt by higher costs," the lawmaker said, adding that "unlike in the Senate bill, much of that relief will be immediate - helping business when costs are rising, not just down the line."

Reacting to the announcement of the deal, Senate Finance Committee ranking member Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) said he is happy that "House Democratic leaders changed their minds about getting a minimum wage/small business tax relief package passed.

"Now we need to make sure their bill actually does something at the same time the minimum wage is increased," he added.

In January the House passed a "clean" minimum wage increase, and the Senate passed an increase with a small-business tax package that was much larger than what Rangel and McCrery have now proposed.

House Bill Would Prevent Rich From Shifting Assets To Kids (WSJ)

By Sarah Lueck

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

WASHINGTON -- To help fund legislation giving small businesses more than $1 billion in tax breaks, House tax writers propose blocking wealthy people from shifting income to their children.

But the House bill would give a pass -- at least for now -- to big deferred-compensation plans and corporate tax shelters that have been targeted by a similar, but more expansive, Senate bill that would also boost the federal minimum wage.

The House bill, scheduled for consideration in the Ways and Means Committee Monday, is likely to pass the full House this coming week. It would extend for one year a tax credit for businesses that employ disadvantaged workers and extend a provision allowing small firms to more quickly write off store upgrades and technology purchases.

The bill is a step toward breaking a logjam with the Senate over a phased-in, $2.10-an-hour increase in the federal minimum wage that passed both chambers. The Senate's minimum-wage bill included small-business tax breaks that totaled more than $8 billion over 10 years, and until now House Democrats have been reluctant to do the same in combination with the minimum-wage boost.

In a provision aimed at helping restaurants, the House bill would increase a credit that businesses receive in exchange for paying payroll taxes on income from tips. Without such a change, a higher minimum wage would reduce the value of the existing credit. The bill also would end limits under the alternative-minimum tax that prevent many small businesses from claiming credits for hiring disadvantaged workers and taxes paid on cash tips.

The bill would pay for the changes -- as required under new House budget rules -- by denying the dependent children of wealthy people the lowest capital-gains and dividend rates, 5% this year and falling to zero next year. The low rates, available to people in the 10% and 15% tax brackets, "presumably" were meant to benefit low-income people, according to a House Ways and Means summary. But because they also are available to children of wealthy people, those parents can reduce their own taxes by shifting assets to their children.

The House bill also would give the Internal Revenue Service more time to notify taxpayers about violations even while interest and penalties mount. The value of each of the tax breaks and offsets weren't yet available.

House Republicans Take To The Airwaves (HILL)

By Jeremy Jacobs

The Hill, February 9, 2007

House Republicans are taking to the airwaves, hoping that a weekly radio address will help them spread their message.

Minority Leader John Boehner (Ohio), Minority Whip Roy Blunt (Mo.) and Republican Conference Chairman Adam Putnam (Fla.) officially announced Friday that House Republicans will be taping an address this week that will be distributed to hundreds of local and national radio stations across the country.

"A weekly radio address will give House Republicans yet another opportunity to communicate directly with the American people," they said. "This represents a broad-based effort to engage the millions of Americans who listen to the radio on their way to work, on their lunch hour or on their way home to their families."

GOP leaders will use the radio address to outline House Republican positions and respond to the Democratic agenda. Each week, a member of the Republican leadership will tackle a different issue facing Americans.

"We're going back to what we did so well in the mid-1990s by communicating common sense and fiscally responsible solutions directly to American families and tax payers," a spokesman for the Republican Conference, Ed Patru, said.

"Having a direct dialogue with Americans that live outside the Beltway will be a refreshing change from a few elite Democrats in the House passing legislation behind closed doors, shutting everyone out of the process," he added.

Boehner is using the inaugural radio address to support President Bush's fiscal year 2008 budget proposal.

"Republican pro-growth policies have strengthened our economy, and the federal deficit is declining rapidly. Congress must make an important choice: We can use the increased revenue from economic growth to balance the budget, keep taxes low and begin to address the long-term challenge of runaway entitlement spending," Boehner said. "Or we can blow it by squandering the money on pork, unnecessary new programs and bigger government."

He also empathized with Americans who are disappointed that the U.S. has not made more progress in Iraq but stressed that cutting off funds for U.S. troops is not the answer.

"Next week, the House will debate the issue of Iraq, and the president's new strategy. All Americans are frustrated we haven't seen more success in Iraq more quickly, but one thing is clear: We must oppose any effort to cut off funds our troops need to succeed in their mission," Boehner said.

Traditionally, the president gives a weekly radio address every Saturday and the opposition party airs a rebuttal afterward.

Pelosi Airliner Tempting Target For Miffed GOP (WT/AP)

By Darlene Superville

The Washington Times, February 10, 2007

For most of the past five weeks, House Republicans could do little else but watch as majority Democrats passed major legislation without giving them a chance to propose changes or offer alternatives.

So when they finally got a chance Thursday to vent pent-up frustrations over how Democrats were running things, the Republicans decided to make some noise -- and how.

They aimed high, all the way to House Speaker Nancy Pelosi.

The California Democrat went before the House Science Committee in the morning to champion her commitment to do something about global warming, a rare appearance for a leader of the House.

She did so as reports swirled on Capitol Hill that she had requested a bigger, swankier government airplane than her Republican predecessor had used for trips back to her home district when Congress isn't meeting.

For Republicans, feeling muzzled and still down over losing control of the House, the irony was too good to ignore.

A waste of the taxpayers' money, some said, estimating that her trips would cost $15 million a year if she used planes such as the military version of the Boeing 757-200. In its commercial configuration the 757-200 usually seats 175 to 190 passengers.

Mrs. Pelosi should lead by example, others argued, because a bigger plane consumes more fuel and contributes more to the global warming she expresses concern about.

"The jet that Pelosi has produces 10,000 pounds of carbon dioxide an hour, far more than the previous speaker used," said Rep. Patrick T. McHenry, North Carolina Republican. Mrs. Pelosi's predecessor was Rep. J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican.

"By commandeering a huge government plane for her personal transport to California, this is totally contradictory to the alarm bells we heard her ringing in the Science Committee just a few hours ago," said Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, California Republican.

Democrats said the debate about the plane, which occurred during a Republican amendment to a bill to promote ethanol and other alternative fuels, was "silly." White House spokesman Tony Snow also weighed in, also calling the plane controversy "silly."

The Republicans' amendment to the alternative fuels bill amounted to a dig at Mrs. Pelosi; it specifically mentioned passenger planes "capable of transcontinental flights."

"I do not question the imperative of providing for the safety of the speaker of the United States House of Representatives," said Rep. Mike Pence, Indiana Republican. "On the subject of whether this is a silly debate, I think it is silly to question the right of the minority to question public expenditures."

And so it went for nearly two hours. The bill passed 400-3, with the amendment included.

During the hubbub, House Sergeant-at-Arms Bill Livingood, who is charged with the speaker's security, issued a statement saying it actually was he, not Mrs. Pelosi, who had requested that the military provide the larger plane so Mrs. Pelosi could fly nonstop to San Francisco.

After the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, the Pentagon agreed to provide the House speaker, who is second in the line of presidential succession behind the vice president, with a military plane for added security during trips home. Mr. Hastert flew in a commuter-size Air Force jet.

"The fact that Speaker Pelosi lives in California compelled me to request an aircraft that is capable of making nonstop flights for security purposes, unless such an aircraft is unavailable," Mr. Livingood said in a statement. "I regret that an issue that is exclusively considered and decided in a security context has evolved into a political issue."

DOJ_NMG_0131103

The Pentagon informed Mrs. Pelosi's staff this week that she would get a plane, based on availability, and that nonstop service could not be guaranteed.

Mrs. Pelosi said Thursday that she would be happy to fly commercial.

"We never asked for a larger plane. This is a myth that [the Republicans] are talking about on the floor," she said. "They have nothing to say to the American people about the war, the economy, global warming and the rest. So they have this game they're playing."

Back on the House floor, 83-year-old Rep. Ralph M. Hall, Texas Republican, offered that it probably would be cheaper if he rode the bus home to Dallas every weekend, but that issue could be debated some other time.

"The only airplane I'm thinking about," he said, "is the one I wanted to be on at 12:30, heading for Texas."

FBI Probes California GOP Congressman's Land Deals (WP)

By Sonya Geis

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

LOS ANGELES, Feb. 9 -- A Republican congressman from California defended his reputation this week, as FBI investigators look into charges that he improperly delayed paying taxes on several lucrative land deals.

Rep. Gary G. Miller told fellow House Republicans behind closed doors Tuesday that he "has done nothing wrong, his business dealings have all been above-board and that these allegations are baseless and have no merit," his spokesman Scott Toussaint said.

The FBI investigation follows an article in the Los Angeles Times and a complaint from the nonprofit Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics alleging that Miller, a wealthy real estate developer, unlawfully avoided paying taxes on a land deal.

According to the newspaper's account, confirmed by Miller, he sold 165 vacant acres to the city of Monrovia, Calif., in 2002, after trying for years to build housing on it. He then delayed paying taxes on $10 million in profit by claiming that he sold under threat of eminent domain.

Miller used money from the sale to buy two other pieces of land in nearby Fontana, Calif., from a campaign contributor. He sold both to the city of Fontana, and once more delayed paying taxes by claiming the city threatened to take the land.

The threat of eminent domain allows a landowner to invoke Section 1033 of the federal tax code, which delays the payment of capital gains taxes if profits are reinvested within two years.

For all three of the land deals, Miller requested and obtained a letter from the city referring to eminent domain, a spokesman for the congressman said. But city officials later said the letters were meaningless because they did not actually threaten to take Miller's land.

"Eminent domain was not initiated," Monrovia Mayor Rob Hammond said in an interview, referring to the land deal in his city. "Was it discussed? Yes. Do you make a decision [about whether to sell the land] based on what was discussed? That's a question for the IRS."

"All I do is real estate transactions, and I've never heard of anything like this ever happening. It doesn't make a lot of sense," Los Angeles real estate and taxation lawyer Stephen Fainsbert said of Miller's multiple 1033 exemptions. "Even once it's something. But to see it three times -- well, as they say, the smell test is violated."

FBI investigators have interviewed current and former Monrovia officials, and reviewed video of a City Council meeting in which Miller asked the city to buy his land, city officials have said.

Last week, Miller sent a letter to Monrovia officials threatening a lawsuit for telling reporters that the city never intended to use eminent domain to take his land. "He felt that city officials had been speaking out of both sides of their mouths" by giving him a letter referring to eminent domain, then denying to the news media that they planned to take the land, Toussaint said.

Toussaint said Miller paid taxes on all three land deals in quarterly installments over 2005 and 2006. He did not say how much Miller paid, and did not provide documentation of payment.

Miller has not been contacted by the IRS or the FBI, Toussaint said. Miller voluntarily turned over documents related to his business to the House ethics committee and to Minority Leader John A. Boehner (R-Ohio).

A spokesman for Boehner, Brian Kennedy, said he did not know whether Boehner reviewed the documents.

In response to a question, Kennedy said: "I don't know that there's been any discussion of removing" Miller from his seat on the Financial Services Committee, in which Miller is the ranking GOP member of the subcommittee on oversight and investigations.

Melanie Sloan, executive director of Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics, said Miller is "doing what Duke Cunningham and Bob Ney did before him. He's going to the Republican Conference and proclaiming his innocence."

"This is just the last thing in the world" House Republicans want, said Barbara Sinclair, a University of California at Los Angeles political science professor.

"The whole ethics business did play a part in the Republicans' disastrous performance in the 2006 elections. That makes it even more of an important story. Clearly Republicans do not want this to be an ongoing problem and continue on to 2008."

Follow That Lobbyist (NYT)

By Randy Evans

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

THE Democratic majority in Congress has made ethics reform a centerpiece of its agenda — and not a moment too soon. The list of members of Congress from both parties who have either pleaded guilty to or are under F.B.I. investigation for crimes involving their offices is embarrassing.

Unfortunately, the latest reforms (some adopted in the House by rule and others proposed by the Senate in legislation) tighten restrictions without actually addressing the real reasons that Congressional ethics rules have been ineffective in the past. The result is tougher rules that will rarely, if ever, be enforced. Here's why.

First, regardless of what anyone might claim, there remains no mechanism for policing those at the heart of Congress's ethics problems: lobbyists willing to violate the rules.

Under the new ethics reforms (as well as under the previous rules), the House Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the Senate Ethics Committee and the Federal Election Commission do not have the jurisdiction to detect, investigate and punish lobbyists who give prohibited gifts to representatives, senators or their staffs.

The Congressional ethics committees can regulate the conduct of, and punish, only lawmakers and their staffs. Lobbyists can be investigated by the Justice Department, but only under restrictive bribery statutes that require proof of a direct link between payments or gifts by lobbyists and actions by public officials. Consequently, unethical conduct by lobbyists that does not reach the point of bribery or an illegal campaign contribution (which does fall under the Federal Election Commission's jurisdiction) will remain unregulated.

Second, even with the new rules, only members of Congress or someone with a member's permission can file a complaint with the House ethics committee. But limiting who can file a complaint effectively precludes any meaningful enforcement.

Whenever a Congressional ethics scandal erupts, Americans wonder why nobody said anything. Why, for example, did someone like Randy Cunningham, the disgraced representative from California, routinely violate Congressional gift rules with seemingly little concern about an ethics investigation? The answer, in my experience, is that most members of Congress are so afraid of being accused of taking (knowingly or unknowingly) banned gifts themselves that they would never allege that a colleague had done so — no matter how clear the violation. No one wants to set the standard by which he might someday be judged.

This problem will persist even under tighter restrictions like the new gift ban. After all, the problem in recent years wasn't that the gift limit — $50 per gift — was too high; it was the absence of effective oversight and enforcement of that limit. As long as these new rules, like the old ones, rely only on lawmakers to report violations, nothing will change.

Simply put, there will continue to be an unchecked circle of improper gifts by lobbyists (who cannot be punished) to lawmakers (who have no incentive to report them). As in the past, only when gift-giving reaches the level of a crime will the F.B.I. or the Department of Justice step in and start an investigation. Nothing in these touted ethics reforms solves this problem.

So what's the solution?

Ultimately, the most effective deterrent against ethics violations is public scrutiny, based on accurate and timely information. That's why it's imperative that ethics reform begin with full disclosure by lawmakers, their staffs and lobbyists.

Each member of Congress should keep a log of every gift received by his office and file it electronically at least quarterly. The same requirement should apply to Congressional staffers. Lobbyists should electronically file monthly public disclosures of all lobbying expenses, specifying who used what tickets, who ate what meal, who played how many rounds of golf. All these disclosures should be posted on the Internet.

Along with transparency, the best way to prevent, detect and punish corruption is to enforce rules against all violators, whether they work inside the Capitol or on K Street.

It is therefore imperative for Congress to establish an independent commission, akin to the Federal Election Commission, with jurisdiction to regulate the conduct of lobbyists just as the Congressional ethics committees regulate the conduct of members and staffs. The commission must be responsible for enforcing the new gift ban, ensuring that all disclosure requirements are met, and setting and imposing penalties for rule violations.

But even an independent commission empowered to investigate violations won't be effective without significant modifications to the reporting process. It will have nothing to investigate.

Thus, any person should be able to file a complaint. (Subject to some time restriction, of course — say, 60 days before an election, in order to prevent abusive filings for political gain. Anyone who files a complaint found to be frivolous should be subject to a penalty.) Complaints should be acted on promptly, and either be dismissed or investigated.

Effective ethics reform in Congress requires real changes in the reporting requirements for lawmakers and their staffs, enhanced disclosure requirements for lobbying activities, better transparency, public participation via the Internet, and an independent commission to enforce the rules against both the donor and the recipient of improper gifts. Anything less is just cosmetic.

Marine Corps Grounds V-22 Osprey Aircraft (WP)

By Renae Merle

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Marine Corps said yesterday it was temporarily grounding its fleet of V-22 Osprey tilt rotors after discovering a glitch in a computer chip that could cause the aircraft to lose control.

The order affects 54 of the helicopter-airplane hybrids -- 46 owned by the Marines and eight belonging to the Air Force -- and could last weeks, Marine Corps officials said. It was an unexpected setback for the program; the military last grounded the fleet in 2000 after two fatal crashes that killed 23 Marines.

While none of the aircraft has been sent into the combat despite more than 20 years in development, the Osprey has regained support in the military in recent years. The Marine Corps expects to declare its version combat-ready this summer, and the Air Force version is expected to reach that point in early 2009.

The latest glitch should not affect those plans, said James Darcy, spokesman for the program.

The aircraft's contractors, Bell Helicopter and Boeing, notified the government of the problem on Tuesday after an onboard diagnostic computer pointed to an issue with a chip in the flight control computers, which control all of the aircraft's moving parts. Testing showed that in below-freezing temperatures, the computers could lose their redundancy features -- a safety net if one of the computers is damaged by enemy fire, according to the Marine Corps. That could cause the pilot to lose control of the aircraft.

"It's unacceptable," Darcy said. "This aircraft has to be able to go anywhere in the world." The Marine Corps wants an aircraft that can operate in temperatures as extreme as 65 degrees below zero, he said.

It is unclear how much it will cost to fix the problem, Darcy said.

"Bell and Boeing will work together to get the issue resolved as quickly as possible so the aircraft can return to flight," said Jack Satterfield, a Boeing spokesman. "We expect to be able to do that quickly."

The military plans to buy 360 of the aircraft for the Marine Corps, 50 for the Air Force and 48 for the Navy. The price per aircraft ranges from about $70 million to $89 million, excluding development costs.

Despite recent progress, including flying across the Atlantic Ocean this summer, the program continues to have its critics. "This plane has been in production for over 25 years, costs more than $100 million each, and is scheduled to go into combat this summer," said Todd Bowers, defense investigator for Project On Government Oversight, a watchdog group. "I guess we are seeing the results of the extremely weak testing done on this aircraft, which is disconcerting since it will possibly be carrying troops in Iraq and Afghanistan. If it can't stand a little cold weather how can it handle a war zone?"

Air Force Academy Probes Alleged Cheating By Cadets (WP)

By Alan Cooperman

The Washington Post, February 10, 2007

The Air Force Academy is investigating allegations of cheating by 28 freshmen and has restricted all 4,300 cadets to campus over the weekend, asking them to meet in small groups to consider "their self-image and the image of the institution," Air Force officials said yesterday.

In addition to the cheating, the academy's superintendent, Lt. Gen. John F. Regni, cited other recent disciplinary problems in a stern speech this week to the entire student body, faculty and staff.

Forty-three cadets lost their Internet privileges in January because they had downloaded pornography or visited pornographic Web sites, and there have been recurring incidents of alcohol abuse, academy spokesman Johnny Whitaker said.

Nineteen percent of the freshman class was failing academically at the end of the fall semester, giving it the lowest collective grade-point average in 20 years, he added.

Regni's speech on Wednesday challenged the cadets "to get introspective about this, to look in the mirror -- 'Is this the kind of institution that we want to be?' " Whitaker said. "He told them he was disappointed with them, that honor is the heart of what we do."

DOJ_NMG_0131106

Several members of Congress were briefed on the cheating investigation Thursday during a teleconference with the academy's 15-member Board of Visitors.

Sen. Wayne Allard (R-Colo.) said there have been bigger cases of mass cheating at other military academies, including a 1992 incident involving 134 seniors at the Naval Academy, which resulted in the expulsion of two dozen midshipmen.

But Allard said the Air Force Academy is determined to act quickly and firmly, having learned a lesson from two scandals in recent years, one involving sexual assaults on female cadets and the other stemming from incidents of religious intolerance on the Colorado Springs campus. The academy began mandatory training on religious diversity in 2005 after complaints that evangelical Christian faculty members, staffers and students had pressed their beliefs on cadets of other faiths.

Restricting all cadets to campus and requiring them to discuss the recent disciplinary problems is "good preventive medicine," Allard said. "That's how we got in trouble with the sex harassment scandal -- they just kept sweeping it under the rug and not dealing with it. This time, they're trying to catch the problems early."

In a brief statement this week, the academy said that 19 cadets, so far, have admitted cheating on a Jan. 31 "fourth-class knowledge test," a routine exam on military affairs given weekly to all 1,200 freshmen. Among the 28 cadets under suspicion of cheating are 19 intercollegiate athletes, the academy said. None of their names has been released.

Whitaker said the disproportionate number of varsity athletes is an issue in the investigation. But the 19 athletes play for four different teams, and at this point "it does not appear that there was any conspiracy by a particular group," he said.

The 1992 cheating scandal at Annapolis also involved a large number of athletes. Of the 24 expelled, six were varsity football players. In the wake of the expulsions, some members of Congress questioned whether the recruitment and preferential treatment of academically lackluster athletes was a contributing factor.

Some Air Force cadets pointed in a different direction this week. They noted that the cheating took place on a weekly test that typically includes questions about the chain of command and military jargon. If a student fails one of those tests, he or she is required to stay in the dorm over the following weekend. A second failure can result in the grounding of the upper-class cadet who is the designated leader of a group of freshmen, putting intense pressure on students to pass, they said.

The cheating was reported by classmates, and the investigation is being led by cadets, a standard procedure under the academy's honor code. Academy officials said the punishment has not been determined, but Allard said "it wouldn't surprise me if a fair number got dismissed" from the academy.

Cadets said they have been ordered to go through their computer files this weekend and erase any improper data, including illegally acquired music and videos as well as pornography. They said they will also be required to attend a luncheon discussion and hear a speaker. The academy had originally planned to cancel regular activities on Monday, but that order was rescinded, cadets said.

"I called my parents last night to tell them they would hear some bad publicity on the academy, and my father said, 'You just keep your nose clean,' " one freshman said.

Another cadet said Regni's speech landed hard. "He said 99 percent of us are doing our job, but a few bad apples can ruin it for the rest of us," the cadet said on the condition of anonymity because he had not received clearance to speak to a reporter.

Regni, who has been superintendent since 2005, said in a brief interview that he was confident the number of students implicated in cheating would not rise above the 28 already under investigation.

He declined to discuss his speech, saying only: "We talk to the cadets, and we make sure the cadets understand that actions have consequences."

Air Force Cadets Grounded Over Cheating (AP)

AP, February 9, 2007

AIR FORCE ACADEMY, Colo. (AP) — All 4,000 Air Force cadets will be confined to campus this weekend following a scandal in which 28 freshman are suspected of cheating on a test, school officials said Thursday.

The entire corps will remain on school grounds to reflect on the Air Force Academy's honor code, which forbids lying, cheating, stealing or tolerating those who violate it. Plus, the only bar there will be closed.

"This is a pretty disappointing time for us," said Superintendent Lt. Gen. John Regni, who ordered the lock down and bar closure.

The alleged cheating was reported on Feb. 2 on a basic-knowledge test that does not count toward cadets' grade point average, but is required for first-year cadets. Some cadets admitted obtaining answers to a test and forwarding them through an Internet social group and private computer messages.

Cadets caught cheating can be expelled or placed on probation. No individual punishments have been handed down.

Bad Faith On Social Security (NYT)

DOJ_NMG_0131107

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

In 2005, President Bush put his political capital where his mouth was, and lost. He went all-out to convince Congress and the American people that privatizing Social Security would be good and necessary. It's neither — and his plan was justifiably and soundly rejected. This year, with his political capital on empty, Mr. Bush is talking about a bipartisan effort to reform Social Security. But his actions suggest that he has no intention of making any serious compromises.

In his new budget, Mr. Bush allocates $29.3 billion to establish private accounts in 2012, totaling $637 billion through 2017. That suggests that either Mr. Bush still hasn't figured out that private accounts are a political nonstarter, or he's hoping to use them as a bargaining chip in future negotiations. Either way, that attitude virtually ensures that Social Security reform will stall in this Congress, just as it did when the Republicans were in charge.

Mr. Bush is proving similarly tone-deaf when it comes to choosing members for the Social Security board of trustees.

There are six trustees, four of them administration officials and two outsiders. The job of the two outsiders — nominated by the president and confirmed by the Senate — is to represent the public's interest in decisions about the program. Last year Mr. Bush nominated the same two men who had served in his first term. That violated the rationale for having public trustees, which is to bring fresh perspectives. So Congress refused to consider the nominees, but Mr. Bush appointed them for another year while Congress was in recess. He has now renominated them for new four-year terms.

Mr. Bush won't get his way. But he is alienating Congress and creating delays that will make it harder for the next two public trustees — whoever they are — to participate fully. Given all that, it's not surprising if the public and Congress decide that Mr. Bush is not to be trusted on Social Security.

Three Steps To Better Healthcare (LAT)

By Henry J. Aaron

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

HEALTHCARE analysts have long deplored the linkage between health insurance and employment. It makes no sense for one's health insurance to end if one leaves a job. Various state reform plans, including that of California Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger, deal with the healthcare system as a whole. But President Bush's proposed fix does not go far enough.

The workplace-healthcare connection arose primarily because of a tax quirk. Premiums paid by the employer are excluded from the employee's personal income and payroll taxes. If employees buy the insurance themselves, they pay for it with income that has been taxed. The president proposes to eliminate that differential and replace it with a deduction for insurance, however it is financed. If coverage meets certain standards, the worker would receive a tax deduction — $7,500 for singles, $15,000 for couples and families.

This change is a step toward "leveling the playing field." But is it an improvement if that is all that is done? The answer is no. To replace employment-based health insurance, it is necessary to have something else that works. In particular, it is necessary to have a well-functioning market in which individuals can buy insurance at a reasonable price. Currently, the individual health insurance market is a disaster.

It's a mess because it does not adequately pool risks. Pooling risks means grouping people with high and low expected health outlays. Premiums are then based on the average of the group. When people seek coverage as individuals, an insurer that wants to stay in business has to charge a premium that covers the costs each particular customer is likely to generate, plus enough extra to cover selling costs and profits. For healthy 30-year-olds, those costs are very low. For the cancer patient in remission or the 60-year-old whose parents died in their 40s from heart attacks, those costs are dramatically higher. The premiums for the latter may be so high that few can afford them.

Pooling makes health insurance affordable for the average person. The workplace serves that function — not ideally but adequately. Workplace pooling works best for large companies, for those with relatively high average wages and for those with stable labor forces. For a small company, one very sick employee can drive up costs. High turnover raises administrative costs. And where wages are low, typical premiums for family coverage equal the total earnings of a full-time minimum-wage worker.

So, what is right and what is wrong with the president's plan? What is right is that it would extend to individually purchased insurance a tax break similar to the one now available only on employer-financed coverage. It would do so in a way that would not add to the federal deficit measured over 10 years, although it would boost deficits initially. Unfortunately, the plan would continue the incentive of bigger tax breaks for high earners even though most of the uninsured are low earners.

A better plan would be a tax credit that offered the same tax relief per dollar of insurance to people at all income levels. Better still would be offering larger credits to low-income households, which need help, rather than to high-income households, which don't.

The bigger problem with the Bush plan is that it would not ensure that people would be able to find insurance at a reasonable price. The plan would produce millions more such shoppers because it would make it much easier for employers, bedeviled by rising premiums, to stop sponsoring coverage. Generous employers might give employees a raise equal to what the employer had been paying for insurance, but employees would still have to find a plan they could afford.

To be sure, the Bush plan would permit states to shift some funds to help subsidize high-risk patients. But it does not ensure that high-risk individuals would be able to find an affordable plan. As a result, it is likely to leave some older and sicker people, who now have insurance by grace of employer coverage, uninsured and unable to afford care.

The Bush plan could have provided that assurance by allowing working-age Americans to buy insurance from the plans offered to federal employees at the same prices that federal employees pay. Or it could have permitted them to buy Medicare coverage at a premium determined on a communitywide basis. To make insurance affordable for low earners still would have required additional help. However, the plan enacted by the Massachusetts legislature and Schwarzenegger's proposal clearly show that there are ways to do this.

If Bush's one-step plan were enacted, the nation would step into a very deep hole. Two additional steps are necessary for genuine reform: measures to make the individual health insurance market work, and assistance to low-income households that makes insurance affordable. The nation should not be satisfied with one step that makes things worse when two more would make them so much better.

Judgment Pay (WSJ)

By Paul A. Volcker

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Anyone appearing before a judge in a federal courtroom -- plaintiff, defendant, juror -- will feel apprehensive. There are big issues at stake. Personal reputation and family fortunes, even imprisonment, may be at risk. Business practices can be questioned. The actions of government itself, even the constitutionality of its laws, can be challenged.

What we have a right to ask -- what we must demand -- is that the cases be decided fairly, by capable judges acting in a context of high professional standards and personal independence. It is those qualities that the framers of our Constitution sought to protect by providing lifetime appointment for federal judges and forbidding reduction in their compensation. Yet those qualities can also be eroded, not consciously, not by design, but by an insidious neglect. The simple fact is that judicial compensation has not kept pace with reasonable requirements.

The historical pattern is unambiguous. The last comprehensive review of government salaries, including the judiciary, took place in 1989. Twenty years after the previous full-scale realignment of federal salaries in 1969, the concept and goal set out were clear: the substantial past shortfall -- relative to the cost of living and private-sector pay over the previous 20 years -- would be at least partly corrected. Thereafter, pay was to be annually adjusted based on increases in private-sector wages in order to keep pace with those changes and inflation.

The approach has failed. Congress has simply refused to make good on its expressed goal, and has not even provided cost of living adjustments. It has now been 16 years since this last judicial pay raise took full effect. Since that time, average American workers' wages, when adjusted for inflation, have risen 18.5%. During that same period, federal judges' real, inflation-adjusted pay has declined 10.8%, while the pay of most other federal workers, when adjusted for inflation, has risen by 15.1%. The decline in real pay of district judges has dropped by 25% since the earlier 1969 review.

Political inhibitions over time, gradually and for a while imperceptibly, exact a real cost. Specifically, a judicial system designed to attract men and women of broad experience and independence of judgment will be weakened by the reality of strained personal economic circumstances. And now there is evidence from many of the 100 federal judges who have left the bench in recent years that financial considerations were factors in their decisions.

The force of that concern was brought home to me a few years ago. Instead of feeling any apprehensiveness about appearing before a federal judge, I found myself in a reversal of roles. I was chairman of the National Commission on the Public Service -- a group of men and women with long service in both Democratic and Republican administrations deeply disturbed by the strong evidence of eroding trust in government. In that capacity, I received a request from then Chief Justice William Rehnquist and Associate Justice Stephen Breyer to appear before the commission. They urgently wanted to express their concern about the erosion in judicial compensation and the impact it was having on recruiting and keeping federal judges. Now, that concern has been forcibly reiterated and amplified by present Chief Justice John Roberts in his annual report on the judiciary.

No one, not the two chief justices, not their judicial associates, not I, not my fellow commissioners, certainly not the American public or its elected representatives, argue that judicial salaries need to approach those of successful legal practitioners in the private sector (it has recently been reported that remuneration of partners in the nation's large law firms now typically exceeds $1 million a year). At the other extreme, it is surely anomalous that federal district court judges make less than the salary plus bonuses of newly minted lawyers in those same prestigious firms in New York, Washington and other big city firms.

The judiciary should -- and historically has -- drawn upon distinguished academics or lawyers serving in different branches of government. Others, over a long career in private practice, have attained financial independence while family responsibilities have diminished. But even among those groups, compensation has become a relevant consideration. More acutely, there are the active practitioners in private law "at the top of their game" -- men and women potentially attracted to public service but with families to raise -- unable or unwilling to accept so small a fraction of their current and potential earnings. And, in fact, the number of appointees from those ranks has been declining.

So what is the reasonable level of judicial compensation? Consider the district courts where the greatest number of judgeships are. While judges cannot expect to equal the salaries of partners in large law firms, the National Commission determined that their compensation should be comparable to that of law school deans, senior professors and other nonprofit leaders. Today, at $165,200, district judge salaries fall more than 50% below what many law school deans or their top professors make. Moreover, unlike those academics and the leaders of nonprofit institutions, there is very limited possibility of earning other income.

And consider this: if the salary of district court judges had increased from their actual salary in 1969 by the same percentage as the total percentage change in American worker wages from 1969 to 2006, district judge compensation would be $261,300. That number is consistent with the recommendation of the National Commission on the Public Service.

Three years ago, the National Commission on the Public Service pointed to judicial pay as "the most egregious example of the failure of federal compensation policies." That failure was not been repaired; Congress did pass legislation in 1999, effective Jan. 20, 2001, to double the president's salary to $400,000 from $200,000. Now, at long last, my sense is that Congress and the president may finally be prepared to take a new look at judicial salaries, to deal with the political resistance and to recognize what is ultimately at stake.

The truth is there should be no shortage of men and women interested in federal judgeships. Those positions satisfy an urge for public service. They convey (or should convey) a sense of honor and prestige in the community. They can (or should) provide along with intellectual stimulus a sense of independence conveyed by lifetime appointment and financial stability.

The authors of the Constitution took care to protect those qualities by providing a reasonable assurance of financial security for our federal judges. Plainly, the time has come to take heed of the deep concerns of two chief justices and to honor the constitutional intent.

Mr. Volcker was chairman of the Federal Reserve from 1979-1987 and twice chaired a National Commission on the Public Service.

ABA Should Keep Judges Clean (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 10, 2007

THE AMERICAN BAR ASSN. is having some sound second thoughts about weakening a key provision of its Model Code of Judicial Conduct, which traditionally has served as a guide to state court systems in setting their own ethics rules.

An ABA drafting panel had been criticized — including by this editorial page — for proposing changes that would have diluted a provision saying that judges should avoid even the "appearance of impropriety." But now the panel is expected next week to accept a "friendly amendment" to its own proposal at an ABA meeting in Miami, one that would undo the damage.

Canon 2 of the current ABA code says that judges "shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities." The panel's proposed revision would have kept the admonition about avoiding the appearance of impropriety, but it would have added language suggesting that a judge could be disciplined only if he committed an actual impropriety. The effect would have been to make the "appearance" provision nonbinding.

Advocates of the proposed change had argued that "appearance of impropriety" was too spongy and subjective a standard. But the current code makes it clear that "the test for appearance of impropriety is whether the conduct would create in reasonable minds a perception that the judge's ability to carry out judicial responsibilities with integrity, impartiality and competence is impaired."

That language is adequate to protect judges from being punished for behavior that only an eccentric or self-interested individual would find suspicious. It tracks language in California's Code of Judicial Ethics saying that "a judge shall avoid impropriety and the appearance of impropriety in all of the judge's activities."

Critics of the proposed rule change, such as the American Judicature Society, acknowledge that judges are usually removed or disciplined for conduct that goes beyond creating an "appearance" of impropriety. But the "appearance" language has served the additional purpose of making judges think twice about potentially compromising situations and err on the side of preserving public confidence in the court.

Avoiding the appearance of impropriety should remain a commandment for judges, not be demoted to a mere suggestion. The ABA should make clear next week that it has gotten that message.

Investors Are Showing Unease About The Climb In Blue Chips (WSJ)

By E.S. Browning

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Investors have been floating in a steadily rising sea of tranquility for seven months.

That is what the stock market has looked like since July, and, in some ways, since the spring of 2003.

But investors, a nervous lot, are getting uneasy. They are worrying that things have been too good for too long, which helps explain why the market turned a little jittery this past week.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average pulled back 72.66 points, or 0.57%, to 12580.83 in the week that just ended, including a decline of 56.80 points, or 0.45%, Friday. The blue-chip average still is up almost 1% for the year.

Despite the week's small decline, the Dow hasn't shown much weakness in months. It remains less than 95 points below its latest record close, 12673.68, hit Feb. 1. It is up 17% since July 14, and has seen 27 record closes since the start of October.

What really has startled market analysts is that, since last summer's turbulence, neither the Dow nor the Standard & Poor's 500-stock index has fallen as much as 2% from a high. That seven-month period is the Dow's longest without a 2% pullback since 1954. In fact, it is the second-longest since the average was launched in 1896, according to Ned Davis Research in Venice, Fla. It is the third-longest such period ever for the S&P 500.

By other measures, this resilience has been a characteristic of the current bull market. Neither the Dow nor the S&P has fallen as much as 10% from a high since the spring of 2003. That is the second-longest period either has gone without a 10% "correction." (The longest was during the 1990s.)

The current bull market -- defined as a period without a 20% decline -- dates from 2002, making it the sixth-longest in history for either index.

Such resilience is a sign of strength, but it can't last forever. That is why many analysts think the market is overdue for at least a 10% correction. The market's unnatural calmness "is a cause for concern, but it is not in and of itself a reason to get out of the market," said Tim Hayes, Ned Davis's chief investment strategist.

The S&P 500 Friday fell 0.71%, or 10.25 points, to 1438.06, still up 1.4% this year. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 1.16% Friday, or 28.85 points, to 2459.82, ahead 1.8% in 2007.

Weighing on the market Friday, Micron Technologies said it was hurt by a decline in memory-chip prices. BMC Software issued a profit forecast that disappointed analysts.

Another problem was the continuing rise in crude-oil futures. After breaking $60 a barrel during the day, they settled in New York up 18 cents at $59.89, the highest finish this year.

Treasury-bond prices fell, and yields rose, after the presidents of the Federal Reserve Banks of St. Louis, Dallas and Cleveland suggested that inflation probably is under control, but didn't rule out the possibility of an interest-rate increase later.

Outside the U.S., stocks advanced in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. stocks, rose 0.3% to 248.82.

In major U.S. market action:

Bond prices declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 14/32, or $4.38 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.784%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 121.68 yen, up from 121.08. The euro fell against the dollar to $1.3006 from $1.3039.

Fed Officials Still Wary Of Inflation Pressures (WSJ)

By Michael S. Derby

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Inflation pressures have clearly not moderated enough to quell Federal Reserve officials' repeated warnings they may yet have to raise rates again.

Several policy makers said Friday that while they are optimistic inflationary pressures will wane this year, they nonetheless stand ready to cure too-high price pressures with rate increases, if needed.

DOJ_NMG_0131111

The Fed officials spoke ahead of testimony by Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, who will go before committees of the Senate on Wednesday and the House of Representatives on Thursday, to deliver the central bank's semiannual report on the economic outlook and monetary policy. That highly anticipated address is likely to prove a defining event in shaping financial markets' expectations for interest rates over the next several months.

The Fed officials who spoke Friday counted one voting member of the rate-setting Federal Open Market Committee -- St. Louis Fed President William Poole -- and two who are not -- the Dallas Fed's Richard Fisher and the Cleveland Fed's Sandra Pianalto.

Mr. Poole told a group in St. Louis that he believes the current level of the Fed's overnight target rate is "well positioned." He said inflation "is likely to fall into a reasonable range this year."

But the veteran Fed official also said that "if we get an upside surprise on [gross domestic product] growth, then monetary policy may have to be tightened somewhat."

Meanwhile, Mr. Fisher said in Dallas, "I am pleased with the current direction of inflationary impulses." But he warned, "I wouldn't rule out further increases in the federal funds rate if inflationary winds gain the upper hand."

Cleveland's Ms. Pianalto was also hopeful on inflation, saying the recent cooling in price pressures is an "encouraging sign." Still, she cautioned, "I am not yet convinced that the inflation trend is shifting down," adding, "some additional policy firming may be needed."

To a modest degree, Friday's speeches mark a small evolution in the thinking of the Fed. Through much of the final months of last year, policy makers argued that inflation remained the chief threat and that if it did not fall, monetary policy would need to be tightened. But over the past couple of months, price pressures have finally waned to a degree the Fed has felt comfortable in acknowledging that development.

Still, for observers, the implications of Friday's addresses for monetary policy are minimal. "The main take away is that Fed rhetoric isn't preparing the way for a shift to a neutral policy stance," said Michael Feroli, economist with J.P. Morgan Economics.

Bies Quits Fed, Gives Bush Second Vacancy (WSJ)

By Benton Ives-Halperin

The Wall Street Journal, February 10, 2007

Federal Reserve governor Susan Bies, who has held her position since 2001, announced Friday that she will leave at the end of March.

The Fed said that she will not attend the March 20-21 meeting of the Federal Open Market Committee.

Ms. Bies joined the board of governors in December 2001, and headed various committees at the Fed, including head of the Committee on Supervisory and Regulatory Affairs. She also spearheaded the Fed's efforts to update and modernize the Basel capital-management standards, dubbed Basel II.

Ms. Bies said she plans to spend more time with her family.

"Sue's invaluable contributions to both monetary and regulatory policy at the Federal Reserve have been aided by her unique perspective as both an economist and a banker," said Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke, in a statement.

"I will miss her counsel and wish her all the best in her new endeavors," he added.

Ms. Bies, 59 years old, served in various capacities at First Tennessee National Corp. before joining the board. She also taught economics at Rhodes College and Wayne State University.

She is married and has two adult sons.

President Bush, who appointed all current members of the board, now has two vacancies to fill. Mark Olson stepped down from the board last summer to become chairman of the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board.

Congressman's Imam Is Taking A Lead In Interfaith Efforts (NYT)

By Samuel G. Freedman

The New York Times, February 10, 2007

MINNEAPOLIS — On the evening after Minnesota's Democratic primary last September, Makram El-Amin picked up his ringing cellphone to hear the raspy, exhausted voice of Keith Ellison. The men had known each other for a decade, long enough for Mr. El-Amin to become the imam of a mosque in their North Minneapolis neighborhood and Mr. Ellison to win a seat as the area's state representative.
